

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

AT a time when the systematic study of English history is every day attracting the interest of an ever-widening circle of readers, it is somewhat remarkable that there should be no convenient handbook to the whole subject. The present publication is an attempt to supply this deficiency, so far as it can be supplied by a work which is intended to be useful rather than exhaustive. It is scarcely possible that everything relating directly or indirectly to a subject so vast and so ill-defined as the history of a great people and a great empire could be included within the compass of eleven hundred moderate-sized pages. The compiler of a concise historical dictionary must be content to make a selection from the materials at their command. The present work is not an exception, and the editors are aware that many things are omitted from it which might have been included, had its limits been wider, and its aim more restricted. But they hope that the general reader, as well as the special student of the history of the British Empire, will find this volume a convenient auxiliary to his studies, and they are sanguine enough to anticipate that it will fill a gap on his shelves not at present occupied by any single book of reference. Dictionaries of biography already exist in abundance; handbooks of dates and chronology are common and familiar things; manuals of English history, political and constitutional, of all sizes and all degrees of merit, are at the easy command of the reading public; and it is possible, by diligent search, to discover works on English bibliography, and even on the bibliography of English history. But if a great book is a great evil, a great many books are assuredly a greater. The most earnest student cannot be expected to read his history with a dozen manuals and works of reference at his elbow, in case he should be in doubt as to a fact, or should require to verify a date, to gain some information on a constitutional point, to satisfy himself as to the sequence of events at one of the epochs of our annals, or to find out the authorities for a particular period. To produce a book which should give, as concisely as possible, just the information, biographical, bibliographical, chronological, and constitutional, that the reader of English history is likely to want, is what is here attempted.

In deciding what should or should not find a place in these pages, the Editors were tried to keep in view the probable needs of modern readers. Practical convenience has guided them in the somewhat arbitrary selection they have been compelled to make; and with a view to this end they have not hesitated to make some slight changes of plan which suggested themselves in the course of the work. In the biographical department names of purely personal and literary interest have been omitted, and the biographies have been written throughout from the historical standpoint. No attempt is made to supplant other Dictionaries devoted solely to biography; but the reader will, it is hoped, find sufficient information about every prominent personage to be of use to him in his historical studies, while the references to authorities which accompany all the more important articles will show him where to go if he desires to pursue his inquiries further. In the older "Helps to English History," such as that of Heylin, space equal to the whole of this work is devoted to genealogies and to the lists of the holders of public offices and dignities. In the present volume relatively little space is given to these subjects. The genealogies of the great families and the order of official succession are very fully worked out in many well-known and easily accessible works. A modern student is likely to have more occasion for the accounts of the growth of English institutions, and for the summaries of great epochs in our history, and of the relations of the country with foreign powers, which occupy a considerable portion of these pages. In these instances it is hoped also that the bibliographical notes supplemented by the special article on AUTHORITIES ON ENGLISH HISTORY (page 105), will be found of considerable value, even by those who can lay claim to some historical scholarship.

It is perhaps necessary to say that though "English" on the title-page of this work is to be understood in its widest and least exact sense: and though the doings of Englishmen, Scotsmen, Irishmen, and Welshmen at all places and periods nostræ est farrago libelli, yet that very much more attention is devoted to the history of England than to that of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the Colonies. Selection being inevitable if the book were not to sacrifice its chief recommendation, that of practical utility, it is felt that the rule adopted, though illogical, is that likely to promote the greatest convenience of the greatest number of readers. It has been thought advisable to bring the book down to our own day; but very recent events have been treated more briefly than those of more remote periods, and only those living and recently deceased statesmen have been included concerning whose right to figure in a Dictionary of English History there can be no reasonable doubt. For obvious reasons no articles on living historians have been given, though it is hoped that full justice is done to their works in the bibliographical notes.

To save space, and to secure somewhat more adequate treatment, it has often been thought better to group the various divisions of a large subject into one article, rather than to discuss them separately in a number of short ones. Here, again, the rule followed is somewhat arbitrary. But a reference to the Index will generally show the reader where to look in case he does not find the title he is in search of in its proper place according to the alphabetical order.

Such merits as this volume may be found to possess are due in great measure to the able staff of contributors who have given it their invaluable aid. To all of them the Editors have to render their grateful thanks. For many useful suggestions and much kindly interest displayed in the progress of the work, they have to acknowledge their obligations to Professor Creighton; Professor Rowley, University College, Bristol; Mr. Arthur L. Smith, Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford; Mr. Lloyd Sanders, M.A.; Mr. W. J. Ashley, B.A., and Mr. T. A. Archer, B.A. Their special thanks are due to Mr. T. F. Tout, M.A., Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford, and Professor of History at St. David's College, Lampeter, whose assistance throughout has been of the greatest value, and who has constantly and most kindly placed the benefits of his extensive knowledge of modern history at the service of the Editors.

THE DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH HISTORY.

Abbeville, TREATY OF (May 20, 1259), was concluded between Louis IX. of France and Henry III. of England, after the abortive attempt of the latter to recover the provinces which John had lost. By this treaty the English king relinquished all claims to Normandy, Anjou, Touraine, Maine, and Poitou; but was guaranteed the possession of Guienne, which he was to continue to hold as a fief from the French crown. His territories in the south of France were to be further increased by the three bishoprics of Limoges, Perigueux, and Cahors; and he was to receive from Louis a grant of money sufficient to maintain five hundred knights for two years.

The text of the treaty is given in Rymér, Fœdera, i. 975 (ed. of 1704). See also ib. 698; and Pearson, Hist. of Eng. during the Early and Middle Ages, ii. 122, 123.

Abbey. [MONASTICISM.]

Abbot (abbas, literally "father") was a title of respect applied in early times to all monks, but was afterwards specifically restricted to the superior of a monastery. The abbot was elected by the brethren of the monastery, subject to varying and ill-defined rights of the crown and the bishop; but, on the whole, as the position of abbot was one of comparatively small political importance, freedom of election was allowed to a degree very rare in bishoprics, and the power and influence of the great orders freed them also in most cases from episcopal jurisdiction. Thus chosen, the abbot held office for life, unless canonically deprived by the bishop. In the earliest days of the English Church, the abbots, like other monks, were very commonly laymen, but later it became usual for them to receive priest's orders; and an early instance of a series of presbyter abbots is to be found in the great foundation of Iona. In Ireland, abbots were either themselves bishops, or usurpers of episcopal functions. In the monastic cathedrals which form such a peculiar feature in English Church history, the bishop was also abbot. The power of the abbot varied with the order to which he belonged, but it was always very high. In theory, as the name denotes, it was paternal; and, in early times, this paternal authority is the same as absolute power. The abbot was to be feared as lord as well as loved as father. No one was allowed to act without his orders, and the whole management of the monastery ultimately depended on him. But Benedictine abbots were restricted in various ways by their obligation to observe the rule of their founder. The practical limitations to the power of the abbot were: (a) the prior; (b) the decani and centenarii chosen by the monks; (c) the general chapter of the monastery (by the rule of St. Benedict, the abbot was obliged to take counsel with all the monks, junior as well as senior, though the final right of decision rested with him, and not with the brethren); (d) the bishop, though exemption, after the 12th century, generally took away this check; (e) the advocatus, an influential layman, who was appointed owing to the inability of the abbot to interfere in person in civil suits, and who consequently largely limited the power of the abbot over the property of the abbey and secular matters generally. But, with all these deductions, the abbot held a most imposing position. As practical landlord of a large district, he had much social influence and political consideration. In England the position of the abbot was especially important; for, introduced by monks, English Christianity had from the first a monastic aspect. Thus half the English cathedrals became Benedictine abbeys, of which the canons were monks and the bishop abbot. As magnates, or as king's chaplains, a few abbots sat in the Witenagemot: and, after the Conquest, many of them attended the Great Council, as holders of feudal baronies, and were ranked after the lords spiritual. Under the early Norman kings, Norman abbots were set over the English monasteries, and in many cases met with determined resistance from their monks. They organised the monastic system more strictly than before; and each new order found a home in England during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Some abbots were called mitred, because they received from the Pope the right of wearing the mitre and other vestments proper to the episcopal office. This did not, however, affect their constitutional position, for abbots were summoned to Parliament as holding baronies under the crown. The smaller abbots felt attendance at Parliament to be a strain on their resources, and during the fourteenth century many of them executed deeds declaring that they did not hold their estates by any tenure that involved the duty of parliamentary attendance. In Edward I.'s model Parliament of 1295 there were present 67 abbots and priors; but this number rapidly declined, and in 1341 the number had become 27, which seems to have remained fixed. The abbots summoned in 1483 may be mentioned as showing the chief amongst the body. They were: Peterborough, St. Edmunds, Colchester, Abingdon, Waltham, Shrewsbury, Cirencester, Gloucester, Westminster, St. Albans, Bardney, Selby, St. Benedict of Hulme, Thorney, Evesham, Ramsey, Hyde, Glastonbury, Malmesbury, Crowland, Battle, Winchcombe, Reading, St. Augustine's, St. Mary's York, and the priors of Coventry and St. John of Jerusalem. As the average number of lay lords attending Parliament was about 40, the proportion of 27 abbots was large. The monasteries, however, represented the influence of the papacy as against the bishops, and were left unmolested both by pope and king. The elections of abbots were rarely interfered with by the crown, and in the later middle ages abbots did not take much part in political affairs. They were chiefly busy with the administration of the secular business of their monasteries. When once the work of civilisation had been accomplished, monasticism drifted apart from the general current of national life, and its abuses became increasingly manifest. The religious reformers found little difficulty in calling attention to the sloth and uselessness of the smaller monasteries, and in 1536 the temporalities of all that did not exceed £200 a year were given by Act of Parliament to the king: their number was computed at 380. The greater monasteries followed by process of compulsory surrender, and by 1540 all had been suppressed. They took no common action to avert their doom; the abbots in the House of Lords did not raise their voices against the measure for vesting in the crown the property of monasteries which should be suppressed. With the disappearance of the abbots from the House of Lords, the preponderance of lay over spiritual peers was established, and the subsequent work of the Reformation of the Church was rendered more easy. Lay abbots, or advocati ecclesiarum, were common in the abbeys of Irish origin from the 8th to the 12th centuries. They were commonly the descendants of the founder or of a neighbouring lord, and were originally the lessees of the abbey lands. In some cases, the coarb, or abbot, chosen by the monks retained his spiritual position, but, in temporal matters, he was quite superseded by the advocatus. [CATHEDRAL; MONASTICISM.]

The ecclesiastical and social position of an abbot can best be gathered by reference to the history of some monastery, such as Walsingham's Gesta Abbatum Monasterii S. Albani, ed. Riley, 1863-72. The constitutional questions concerning abbots are discussed in the Lords' Report on the Dignity of a Peer, 1829. See also art. Abbot, by Mr. Haddon, in the Dict. of Christian Antiquities; Montalembert, The Monks of the West; and, for the Celtic abbots, Skene, Celtic Scotland, vol. ii., and Dr. Reeves, Adamnan. [M. Abbot, CHARLES. [COLCHESTER, LORD.]

Abbot, GEORGE (b. 1562, d. 1633), Archbishop of Canterbury, 1611-1633, was born of humble parents in Guildford; studied at Balliol College, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1582; was elected Master of University College in 1597, and made Dean of Winchester in 1599, Bishop of Lichfield in 1609, and translated to the See of London, 1610. He owed his appointment as archbishop (1611) to his union of Calvinistic theology with a desire to maintain the authority of the crown in ecclesiastical matters. Such a position coincided with the wishes of James I.; but Abbot, though a man of earnest piety, was narrow-minded, stern, and lacking in geniality. He was in theological matters the conspicuous opponent of Laud, who represented the reaction against Calvinism. His conscientiousness was shown by his determined refusal to comply with the wishes of the king in forwarding the divorce of the Countess of Essex from her husband, that she might marry the favourite, Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset. In 1621, at a stag hunt at Bramhill Park, Abbot accidentally shot a keeper. This raised the question among canonists whether, in consequence of having shed blood, he had become legally incapacitated from the episcopal office. A commission of bishops and judges appointed to determine this point were divided in opinion, but advised the king that it was desirable that the archbishop should ask for pardon. Though Abbot was greatly shaken by this untoward event, he still was bold enough to express his disapproval of the Spanish marriage of Prince Charles. On the accession of Charles I., Abbot found that his influence at court was gone, and that Laud was the favourite. In 1627 he incurred Charles I.'s displeasure by manfully refusing to license a sermon by Dr. Robert Sibthorpe, in favour of passive obedience. He was ordered by the king to betake himself to his house at Ford, in Kent, and there remain in confinement, while the archbishopric was put into the hands of a commission, with Laud at the head. He was, however, restored to some degree of royal favour next year; but, suffering from disease, and embittered in temper, he was helpless against the influence of Laud. His last years were spent in the indolence of sickness and despair, and his death made way for the undisputed power of his rival. He was buried in Trinity Church, Guildford, where his monument still remains. Abbot was munificent in his benefactions, and built a hospital at Guildford, which bears his name. He was a worthy man, but had neither knowledge, large-heartedness, nor tact sufficient for his office.

Abdication. [CROWN.]

Abel, THOMAS (d. July 30, 1540), chaplain to Catherine of Arragon, strongly opposed the divorce of that princess; and was attained for his share in the affair of Elizabeth Barton, and found guilty of misprision of treason. He was subsequently imprisoned and executed for denying the king's supremacy, and affirming the legality of the marriage with Catherine. He carved the famous punning inscription (an A upon a bell) on the walls of the Beuchamp Tower in the Tower of London.

Abercorn, PEERAGE OF. In 1603 James Hamilton, Master of Paisley, grandson of James Hamilton, second Earl of Arran and Duke of Chatelherault [DOUGLAS; HAMILTON], was created Baron Abercorn, and in 1606 Earl of Abercorn. John James, ninth Earl, was created Marquis of Abercorn in 1790, and his successor James (b. 1811), Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1866—68, and 1874—76; was created Duke of Abercorn and Marquis of Hamilton, Aug. 10, 1868. The title is derived from the CASTLE OF ABERCORN in Lincithgowshire, a stronghold of the Douglasses, taken by James II. in the Douglas rebellion of 1455. Abercorn was the seat of one of the earliest monasteries in Scotland, and of a Pictish bishopric.

Abercromby, SIR RALPH (b. 1734, d. 1801), born at Tullibody, Clackmannanshire, entered the army as cornet in a dragoon regiment in 1756, and was gazetted to a colonelcy in 1781. He had, however, seen scarcely any active service, on account of his opposition to the government while in the House of Commons, and the sympathy he manifested for the American Colonies. In 1793 he commanded a brigade under the Duke of York in Holland, and was wounded at Nimeguen. In the winter of 1794—5 he showed great skill in protecting, as far as possible, the British forces during their disastrous retreat. After the close of this expedition, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in the West Indies. He returned in 1797, and held the chief command in Ireland during that and the following year. There he showed much talent in re-organising an undisciplined army, as well as statesman-like tact. Thwarted, however, by the Irish government, he reluctantly resigned his office, and accepted the chief command in Scotland, whence he was called to serve again in the disastrous expedition to Holland under the Duke of York. In 1801 he was appointed to command the expedition against the French in Egypt. With wonderful skill and daring he disembarked his forces at Aboukir in the face of the French army. On March 21, the two armies met near Alexandria. Abercromby gained a complete victory; but the battle, which saved Egypt from the French, cost the English the life of their commander. In acknowledgment of Sir Ralph Abercromby's services, his widow was created a Peeress of the United Kingdom, with the style and title of Baroness Abercromby of Aboukir. The title descended to her eldest son. Her third son, James, Judge-Advocate-General, 1827, Speaker of the House of Commons, 1835—39, was created Lord Dunfermline of Dunfermline in 1839. [ALEXANDRIA, BATTLE OF.]

[W. R. S.]

Aberdeen, was an important place even before its elevation to a city in the twelfth century. It was made a royal burgh by William the Lion, and received a charter from Robert Bruce in 1319. The University was founded in 1494 by Bishop Elphinstone, and Marischal College by George Keith, Earl Marischal, about a century later. They were united in 1860. In 1336 the greater portion of the town was burnt by the English, and when rebuilt was called New Aberdeen.

Aberdeen, PEERAGE OF. In 1682 Sir John Gordon of Haddo, Lord Chancellor of Scotland, was created Earl of Aberdeen in the peerage of Scotland. George, fourth Earl, was made a peer of the United Kingdom in 1813, and in 1818, on his marriage with Lady Catherine Hamilton, assumed the additional surname and arms of Hamilton.

Aberdeen, GEORGE HAMILTON-GORDON, 4TH EARL OF (b. 1784, d. 1860), in 1801 began his diplomatic life as attaché to Lord Cornwallis at Paris when engaged in negotiating the peace of Amiens. In 1806 he was elected a representative peer of Scotland. In 1813 he was employed on a mission to induce Austria to break with Napoleon, and in this he was highly successful. He followed the allied armies; was present at Lutzen, Bautzen, and Leipzig; was employed to detach Murat from Napoleon; and was the colleague of Lord Castlereagh at the Congress of Chatillon. He took no further share in public life until 1827—28, when he was offered the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster by the Duke of Wellington with a seat in the Cabinet, and shortly after was promoted to the Foreign Office. In this capacity he took a prominent share in the management of the Greek question, and the formation of the Hellenic Kingdom, recognised by the Porte in 1829. In general, however, he was in favour of a policy of neutrality in continental questions. He recognised Louis Philippe immediately; he refused to employ the English power to dispossess Don Miguel of the crown of Portugal; and he strongly objected to the Quadruple Alliance which Lord Palmerston negotiated. His first tenure of office ended in 1830. He was Colonial Secretary under Sir R. Peel in 1834–35, and Foreign Secretary to the same statesman in 1841. He assisted in carrying the repeal of the Corn Laws and the commercial reforms of Peel, and on the death of that statesman he became the acknowledged head of his party. When in succession both Whigs and Tories had failed to carry on the government, and there was no course left but to apply to the Peelites, Lord Aberdeen was invited to form a government, 1852. He formed a coalition ministry, embracing "men of all parties, from the extreme Tory to the extreme Radical." It was his misfortune to be met by the complications in foreign politics which led to the Crimean War. It was thought at the time, and the opinion has been frequently expressed since, that a greater display of vigour on the part of the ministry might have averted the war. The mismanagement of the campaign completed the unpopularity of the ministry. On January 25th, 1856, Mr. Roebuck moved for a select committee to inquire into the state of the army and the conduct of the war. On the motion being carried Lord Aberdeen resigned, and during the remainder of his life took no further share in public affairs. In his home policy Lord Aberdeen represented the advanced section of the Conservatives, regarding Catholic Emancipation and the repeal of the Corn Laws as advantageous measures rather than as necessary evils. In foreign politics he was the advocate of the principles of friendship with foreign powers, and non-intervention, which he perhaps attempted to apply too indiscriminately. Lord Aberdeen, "the travelled thane, Athenian Aberdeen," of Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, was an accomplished scholar, specially learned in Hellenic antiquities.

The policy and administration of Lord Aberdeen are discussed in Kingslake, Invasion of the Crimea, esp. ii. 62.

Aberdeen Doctors, was the name given, in 1638–9, to six clergymen of Aberdeen—John Forbes, Robert Bacon, Alexander Ross, William Leslie, Alexander Scrogie, and James Sibbold—who strenuously opposed the compulsory administration to all persons of the oath to preserve the Solemn League and Covenant.

Abergavenny, PEERAGE OF. Nov. 23, 1392, William Beauchamp was summoned to Parliament by writ as Lord Bergavenny or Abergavenny. The peerage passed to a branch of the Neville family on the marriage of Sir Edward Neville (second son of Ralph Neville, Earl of Westmoreland, by Joan, daughter of John of Gaunt) with Elizabeth, heiress of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Worcester, Baron Bergavenny. George, fifteenth Baron, was created Earl in 1784, and William, fifth Earl, was advanced to the dignity of Marquis in 1876. [NEVILLE.]

Abergavenny, GEORGE NEVILLE, 3rd BARON (d. 1536), was one of the nobles arrested in 1502 on suspicion of being engaged in a conspiracy with Edmund de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk. He was, however, soon restored to liberty, and eventually came into great favour with Henry VII. and Henry VIII. During the Cornish revolt of 1497, it was partly owing to Lord Abergavenny's local influence that the insurgents met with no encouragement from the people of Kent.

Abergavenny, HENRY NEVILLE, 4th BARON (d. 1587), who was supposed to favour the insurgents in 1554, finally declared for Mary, and defeated the rebels at Wrotham Heath (q.v.). He was one of the commissioners at the trial of Mary, Queen of Scots, in 1586.

Abhorrrers (1679), was the name given to the adherents of the court party, who, on petitions being presented to the king, praying him to summon Parliament for January, 1680, signed counter-petitions, expressing abhorrence for those who were attempting to encroach on the royal prerogative. [See PETITIONERS.] It is said that the names Whig and Tory, as party designations, were first used in the disputes between the Petitioners and Abhorrrers.

Abingdon Abbey Chronicle, THE, is a well-preserved record which narrates the history of the great Benedictine monastery of Abingdon. It extends from the foundation of the abbey in 675 to the accession of Richard I. in 1189. It is specially useful for the light it throws on social history, on the relations of the clergy to the laity, on the state of society before the Norman Conquest, and on the details of the changes produced by that event.

The Chronicon Monasterii de Abingdon has been printed in the Rolls Series, 1856, with valuable introductions by Mr. Stevenson.

Abingdon, PEERAGE OF. In 1572 Sir Henry Norris, who was ambassador to France the preceding year, and son of the Sir Henry Norris beheaded in 1536 for alleged criminality with Anne Boleyn, was created Baron Norris of Ryecote. He was the father of the distinguished military commander, Sir John Norris. His grandson, Francis, was created Earl of Berkshire in 1620, but died the same year, and the Berkshire peerage expired. The Norris peerage descended by the female line to James Bertie, who was created Earl of Abingdon in 1682. This nobleman commanded the Oxfordshire Militia against the Duke of Monmouth on the latter's invasion of England. He, however, opposed James II.'s action in religious matters, and was the first English peer to join William.

Abinger, JAMES SCARLETT, LORD (b. 1769, d. 1844), the second son of Robert Scarlett of Jamaica, after gaining great reputation as an advocate, entered Parliament in 1818 as member for Peterborough. He resisted the plans of Castlereagh and Vansittart for increased taxation, and supported Romilly and Mackintosh in their attempts to ameliorate the Penal Code. He also unsuccessfully endeavoured to bring in a bill for amending the Poor Laws. In 1827, when Mr. Canning sought the assistance of the Whigs, Mr. Scarlett became Attorney-General. He now gradually drifted over to Conservatism. He retained his office under Lord Goderich, and, on the dismissal of Sir Charles Wetherell by the Duke of Wellington, took office again under the latter. In 1830 he resigned with his party. In 1834 he was made Chief Baron by Sir R. Peel, and raised to the peerage.

Abjuration Oath, THE (1701), was a pledge of renunciation of the exiled Stuart dynasty, exacted from time to time after the Revolution of 1688. It first appears in 1690, embodied in a proposed "Act for the further security of his Majesty's person, and for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other pretenders and their abettors." Every person who held any office, civil, military, or spiritual, was to solemnly abjure the exiled king; the oath of abjuration might be tendered by any justice of the peace to any subject of their Majesties; and, if it were refused, the recusant might be sent to prison, to lie there as long as he continued obstinate. The influence of William caused this bill to be rejected, as well as a less severe measure, imposing a declaration on all office-holders that they would stand by William and Mary against James and James's adherents. In the last year of the reign, after Louis XIV. had acknowledged the Pretender, it was again introduced in the "Act for the further security of his Majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the Protestant line." After a long debate in the Commons, the abjuration oath was made compulsory; but the provision was only carried by a majority of one. William gave his assent to the measure on his death-bed. On the accession of Anne a new Act was passed, applying the oath to the new reign. The oath was taken freely by the Tories, and even by noted Jacobites, the Pretender having, it was said, sent instructions to that effect to his adherents. It was renewed on the occasion of the union with Scotland, when the Scottish clergy petitioned against it, but without result. The bill was subsequently re-introduced on the accession of George I., and on the death of the old Pretender (1766). The oath was not finally abolished until 1858. "The definition of persons required to take the Abjuration Oath," says Mr. Burton, "is an attempt, and a successful attempt, to exhaust the gentry and the educated community." It includes the holders of all public offices, members of the universities, and all teachers, clergymen, and legal practitioners; and as a general remedy of omissions, the oath might be tendered "to any person or persons whatsoever."

Abjuration Oath for Scotland, THE (1662), was imposed on all persons holding public office, and consisted, among other abjurations, of a declaration that the Covenant and League "are of themselves unlawful oaths, and were taken by and imposed upon the subjects of this kingdom against the fundamental laws and liberties of the same." The oath was modified in 1716, when it became a simple declaration of allegiance to the Hanover settlement and a renunciation of the Stuarts. [COVENANT.]

Abjuration of the Realm, was the oath to quit the country, which might be enforced on any person guilty of felony who had taken advantage of the privilege of sanctuary. Such a person was bound to leave the kingdom within thirty days, and if he returned he might be put to death. The practice was abolished, in company with the privilege of sanctuary, by James I., cap. 28. [SANCTUARY.] By a statute passed in the 35th year of Elizabeth, Protestant Dissenters who had failed to attend divine service, and Roman Catholics, might be compelled to abjure the realm, and if they refused, or returned without license, they were adjudged felons, and might be hanged. Dissenters were relieved of the necessity of abjuration by the Act of Toleration; but so far as regards Roman Catholics, it was not finally removed from the Statute Book till 1791.

Absenteeism, owing to the partial character of the conquest of Ireland, early became the crying evil of that country. In 1331, Edward III. called on all absentees to follow him to Ireland and defend their estates. When Lionel of Clarence went out in 1361, the same demand was made. In 1374, too, they were called up to go in person or send substitutes. The first statute on the subject was passed in 1379 in an English Parliament, ordering all proprietors who were absentees to contribute two-thirds of their means to the defence of Ireland. In 1413 all Irishmen were, with the same object, ordered to leave England, and were excluded from the Inns of Court. In Henry VI.'s reign, legislation against absenteeism was also frequent. James II. in 1689 summoned all absentees to join him. Under George I., absenteeism having much increased, in 1729 an absentee-tax of four shillings in the pound was imposed on all moneys paid out of Ireland; but the king being allowed to grant exemptions, it did not do much good. In 1767, this law was renewed, and the exemptions done away with, or, at least, only maintained for members of the royal family and distinguished officers. But an attempt to increase the tax in 1773 had to be given up, owing to the opposition it aroused in England. In 1783, a like attempt failed in Ireland. In 1796, an absentee-tax was defeated in the Irish Parliament by English influence, and after that no such measure was mooted, though the evil continued to increase. In 1779, Arthur Young estimated the amount of rent annually sent out of the country, at £732,000.

Almost every Irish historian, statesman, and economist, has had something to say on the subject of absenteeism. The reader will find it referred to, at some length, in Froude, The English in Ireland, passim; Lecky, Hist. of Eng., vol. ii.; the works of Swift and Arthur Young; and The Report of the Select Committee on the State of Ireland, 1828.

Abyssinian Expedition, THE (1867). Theodore, King of Abyssinia, fancying that he was slighted by the British Government, who had refused to assist him against the Egyptians, had seized and imprisoned in his fortress of Magdala all the British subjects within his reach. Among others was Mr. Cameron, British Consul at Massowah. An embassy was sent to the king, headed by Mr. Rassam, British Assistant-Resident at Aden, to expostulate. The mission was at first well received and cajoled by the crafty king, but eventually seized and imprisoned with the rest. Lord Stanley's remonstrance being disregarded, war was declared. It was waged from India, and the expedition was despatched from Bombay in the winter of 1867 under Sir Robert Napier. The campaign was conducted under difficulties, which arose from the varying nature of the climate and the natural impediments of the ground. The difficult task of transporting the military stores and artillery in a country where roads were unknown, and which bristled with lofty and rugged mountains, was performed with complete success. The baggage-elephants were especially useful, and greatly facilitated the progress of the expedition. Little resistance was experienced from the natives. There were one or two straggling skirmishes, and a wild battle was fought, in which the reckless bravery of the Abyssinians proved ineffectual against the serried masses of the English bayonets, and the deadly fire of the English artillery. Theodore, at last, sent back all the prisoners, and offered to treat. Napier, however, refused to listen to any terms short of a total surrender, and to this the king refused to agree. He shut himself up in his citadel of Magdala, which was perched upon a lofty rock, and defended not only by the natural difficulty of the ascent, but also by walls of great thickness, and gateways strongly fortified. The English, with great bravery, surmounted the difficulties of the ascent, forced their way through the gate at the top, and fought from post to post till the position was won. Theodore was found dead inside the gate, slain by his own hand. The town and fortress were destroyed, and within a week the troops were on the sea returning home. Sir Robert Napier for his services was created Lord Napier of Magdala, with a pension, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament.

Accord, THE, is the name given by some Scotch writers to the Treaty of Leith (q.v.).

Acree, or St. JEAN D'ACRE, a town on the coast of Syria, anciently called Ptolemais, is connected with three episodes in English history:—(1) THE SIEGE OF ACRE. In June, 1191, Richard I. arrived before the town, which had already been besieged by the Crusaders for more than two years, with the loss, it is said, of over 120,000 men. A series of assaults was immediately made on the town, but these were seriously impeded by the attacks of Saladin on the Christian lines. At length, however, the garrison offered to treat; they were allowed to retain their lives, and (July 12) the Crusaders marched into the town. (2) THE DEFENCE OF ACRE. On March 16, 1799, Bonaparte's Egyptian army appeared before Acre. The town was held by a Turkish garrison, under Yussuf Pasha, aided by Sir Sidney Smith, who commanded the English squadron in the roads, and a French engineer, Philippoteaux, who had once been a school-fellow of Bonaparte. Animated by these leaders, the Turks held out with great bravery for sixty days of open trenches; and on May 20 the French were compelled to retreat. "That miserable fort," as Napoleon called it, was thus the means of causing his Syrian expedition to be abandoned, and his great projects of Oriental conquest to be altogether hopeless. Alluding to Sir Sidney Smith, he is said to have frequently remarked: "That man made me miss my destiny." (3) THE BOMBARDMENT OF ACRE, Nov. 3, 1840. After the refusal of Mehemet Ali to agree to the terms of the Quadrilateral Alliance, 1840, a combined Austrian, Turkish, and British squadron (the latter, consisting of 6 line-of-battle ships, and 10 smaller vessels, commanded by Admiral Sir R. Stopford) sailed to the coast of Syria, and bombarded Acre, which fell in total ruins after enduring a tremendous fire for three hours.

Act of Parliament. [STATUTE.]

Acton Burnel, PARLIAMENT OF (1283), was the name given to one of the sessions of Edward I.'s great council, reinforced probably by the merchants who had previously met in the Parliament at Shrewsbury. The presence of so many representatives of the commercial classes was taken advantage of by the king to issue the ordinance known as the Statute of Merchants.

Adamnan, Sr. (b. 624, d. 704), Abbot of Iona, was converted, while on a mission to Aldfrid of Northumbria in 688, to the custom of the Roman Church with regard to the observance of Easter—a conversion which embroiled him in disputes with the monks of Iona. In 692 he attended the Synod of Tara, and successfully urged, on part of the Irish Church, the necessity of conformity to the rest of the Church. Between the year 688 and his death, Adamnan wrote the Life of St. Columba, a work which, although containing some elements of legend, still comprises a good deal of valuable historical information. He also wrote a work, De Situ Terræ Sanctæ.

Forbes, Kalendar of the Scottish Saints. The Life of St. Columba was edited by Dr. Reeves in 1887 for the Irish Archaeological Society.

Adams, JOHN (b. 1735, d. 1826), second President of the United States, was a lawyer in Boston, and took an active part in the measures of the colonists to defend their rights against the English Government. In the Philadelphia Congress of 1774 he was delegate for Massachusetts, and he was one of the members of the "Continental Congress" of 1775. In this assembly he advocated immediate and vigorous hostile measures against the mother country, being convinced that any further attempts at reconciliation were hopeless. Adams was a skilful practical lawyer, as well as an earnest student of the philosophy of politics and jurisprudence; and much of the shape which the national and state constitutions assumed, as well as the curious basis of speculative legal theory on which the acts of the earlier congresses were grounded, was largely due to his influence. He was a declared opponent of the "pure democracy," advocated by a large section of the American leaders, and favoured the system of government by double chambers and "checks and balances," which was often stigmatised as aristocratic. In 1777 he was sent as diplomatic agent of the new government to Paris, and for the greater part of the next ten years was engaged in political and financial missions to the courts of France, Holland, and England. On his return to America in 1788 he was chosen Vice-President of the Union, and was immediately involved in the bitter party contests between the federalists, who followed Hamilton, and the republicans, who were now led by Jefferson. In 1797 Adams was chosen President by a slight and doubtful federalist majority. His term of office was not altogether a successful one. The southern federalists were only lukewarm supporters, and the republicans bitterly assailed him in public and private. Like Washington, Adams held to the principle of neutrality in the contest between France and the other European states; but this made him very unpopular with the powerful body of republicans within the States. In the presidential election of 1801, Adams was defeated by Jefferson, and retired from public life amidst a storm of very undeserved obloquy. Adams was a voluminous writer of political and quasi-political treatises, and his works are very valuable for a correct understanding of the views and principles which actuated one large section of the founders of the United States.

Adams, SAMUEL (b. 1722, d. 1803), a distant relation of John Adams, was a leading member of the Boston "Caucus" Club, and took a considerable part in founding similar associations elsewhere. He was one of the first to oppose the measures by which the English Parliament attempted to raise revenue from the trade of the American colonists, and he did, perhaps, more than any other man to rouse the people of Massachusetts to open resistance. In American politics he was by no means a devoted follower of Washington, and was in many respects an opponent of the federalist constitution. In 1797 he retired from the governorship of Massachusetts, when the federal party were predominant. It is in a (probably spurious) speech of Samuel Adams, printed in London, and purporting to have been delivered at Philadelphia, August 1, 1776, that the famous phrase, "a nation of shopkeepers," is applied to England. The speech was translated into French, and Bonaparte probably borrowed his use of the appellation from it.

Adamson, PATRICK (b. 1543, d. 1591), Archbishop of St. Andrews, was educated in France, and returned to Scotland in 1573, when he entered the ministry. In 1575 he was one of the commissioners employed to settle the constitution of the Church of Scotland, and soon after was appointed by the Regent Morton Archbishop of St. Andrews. His life thenceforward was a long course of opposition to the Presbyterian party, who lost no opportunity of taking proceedings against him, and finally succeeded in getting him excommunicated, and deprived of the revenues of his see, so that, it is said, his last years were passed in actual want. He was the author of a poetical version of the Book of Job, and other works in Latin verse.

Addington, HENRY, Viscount Sidmouth (b. 1755, d. 1844), the son of Anthony Addington, Lord Chatham's family physician, was called to the Bar about the same time as Pitt, whose intimate friend he was. By Pitt he was persuaded to leave the Bar, and to turn his attention to political life. He was accordingly returned to Parliament as member for Devizes, and soon became conspicuous as a devoted follower of Pitt. In 1789 he was elected Speaker, and presided over the House until, on Pitt's resignation in 1801, he was invited by the king to form an administration. It was very feeble, and would scarcely have lived a month if Pitt had not for a time given it his protection and advice. Addington's ministry was chiefly signalised by the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens; but when Pitt withdrew his support, the utter weakness of the Cabinet became very clear, and Addington was forced to make way for his former leader. There was now a complete breach between the two, and Addington, who had been created Viscount Sidmouth, attacked Lord Melville, and through him the Prime Minister, with great vehemence. After Pitt's death, Addington became President of the Council in the Grenville and Fox administration. In the ministry of Perceval and the Duke of Portland he had no place; but, when Lord Liverpool came into office in 1812, he was appointed Home Secretary. In this position his repressive policy, and the hostility he showed to popular movements, made him remarkably unpopular with the nation at large; but he maintained his post for several years, until he resigned it to Sir Robert Peel, 1822, after which he took but little share in politics. His administration has been described by Macaulay as one which, in an age pre-eminently fruitful of parliamentary talents, contained hardly a single man who, in parliamentary talents, could be considered as even of the second rate. "He was," the same writer says, "universally admitted to have been the best speaker that had sat in the Chair since the retirement of Onslow. But nature had not bestowed on him very vigorous faculties," and his long occupation of the Chair had unfitted him for the task of heading an administration.

Addison, JOSEPH (b. 1672, d. 1719), was the son of the Reverend Launcelot Addison, afterwards Dean of Lichfield. Joseph Addison was educated at the Charterhouse and Magdalen College, Oxford, where his Latin compositions gained him considerable reputation. He was elected to a fellowship in 1699. Soon after leaving Oxford, he became acquainted with Charles Montague, Earl of Halifax, and subsequently with Lord Somers, through whose influence he received, in 1695, a pension of £300 a year. In 1699 he left England, and travelled over France and Italy, until the death of William III. In 1704 his Campaign, a poem on the battle of Blenheim, written at the request of Godolphin, was highly successful, and at once brought its author into note. Henceforth his rise was rapid. He became Commissioner of Appeals, Secretary to the Legation at Hanover, and in 1708 Under-Secretary of State. In 1708 he entered Parliament as member for Lostwithiel. In the autumn of the same year, Lord Wharton, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, appointed him his Chief Secretary and Keeper of the Records. From Ireland Addison sent his contributions to the Tatler, the first of the periodical publications, which his friend Steele projected. With Steele he was one of the founders of the new literary school of the Essayists, who introduced into English Prose a remarkable simplicity and purity of style, and in whose light and graceful publications modern periodical literature had its source. On the fall of the Whigs in 1710, Addison was dismissed from office. During the General Election he contributed some violent party papers to a political journal, entitled the Whig Examiner. In March, 1711, the Spectator appeared, under the conduct of Steele, and during the years of its existence (March, 1711—Dec., 1714), Addison was the principal contributor. In 1713 Addison's tragedy, Cato, was put on the stage. Political feeling was high at the time, and the opposite principles appealed to in the play caused it to be highly successful, both with Whigs and Tories. On the death of Anne, Addison was made Secretary to the Lords of the Regency. On the accession of George I., he again became Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant. In 1715 he published the Freeholder, the best of his political writings. The next year he married the Dowager Countess of Warwick, and in 1717 became Secretary of State. But his health was failing, and his marriage was unhappy. He finally quitted office in 1718, with a pension of £1,500 a year. In 1719 his defence of the Peerage Bill involved him in a quarrel with Steele, whom he attacked in a party journal called the Old Whig. This was the last of Addison's literary efforts. He died June 17, 1719, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Addison's importance in the political history of England is not great, though he held high office, and his personal career was remarkably successful, even for an age when literary merit, aided by a certain amount of influential patronage, was frequently a passport to wealth and power. In Parliament he was a silent member, and as Secretary of State he was not particularly successful. In principles he was a strict Whig of a somewhat narrow cast; and in the schism which took place in 1717 it is notable that he supported the "old Whigs," Sunderland and Stanhope, against the more progressive section of the party which Walpole headed. It is as an essayist that he won his title to fame, though his political writings are valuable, as exhibiting the doctrines and principles of the earlier Whig statesman of the Revolution school, set forth with the skill and finish of a consummate literary artist. His chief political writings are The Present State of the War (1707), The Trial and Conviction of Count Tariff (1713), and the Freeholder (1715—16); and his contributions to the Whig Examiner (1710) and the Old Whig (1719).

The Works of Addison were published in six volumes, with Notes by Bishop Hurd in 1811. There is a good Life by Miss Aikin, published in 1843, and a lengthy memoir in the Biographia Britannica. The famous character of Addison, under the name of Atticus, in Pope's Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, and Macaulay's account of the relations between Addison and Steele in his essay on The Life and Writings of Addison, are well known.

Added Parliament, was the name given to the Parliament which sat from April 5 to June 7, 1614. No Parliament had been summoned since 1609; but in 1614 the condition of the finances, and the unwillingness of the people to pay the Customs levied by the king without the sanction of Parliament, made it essential to assemble one. James hoped that, by employing "undertakers" or intermediaries, between himself and the Commons, he might obtain a considerable grant in return for the renunciation of some small portions of the royal prerogative. But when Parliament met, it showed itself determined not to grant any supplies until the king's claim to levy Customs had been surrendered. Finding that the Commons persisted in their determination to make redress of grievances precede grants of supply, James dissolved Parliament before a single statute had been passed, and committed the leaders of the opposition to prison.

Addresses to the Crown are (1) from Parliament, (2) from the people. (1) Since the time of Edward I., Parliament has exercised the privilege which it inherited from the Great Council of the Barons, of freely offering its advice to the crown, and demanding the abolition of grievances. Nearly all the legislation of the fourteenth century is based upon the petitions of Parliament. From the reign of Henry VI., the petitions and addresses began to assume the form of actual statutes, and were called ills. In later history, Parliament asserted its right to address the Crown on subjects of wider policy, such as the settlement of the succession under Elizabeth, and recommendations to the queen to marry (1662 and 1666); whilst advice on questions of peace and war has often been tendered to the Crown by Parliament. Thus the House of Commons presented a remonstrance against the continuance of the American war, and on receiving an unsatisfactory answer, declared that it would "consider as enemies to his Majesty and this country all who should advise or by any means attempt the further prosecution of offensive war on the continent of America, for the purpose of reducing the revolted colonies to obedience by force." Addresses to the Crown are always moved in both Houses in answer to the Royal Speech at the beginning of the Session; and the Debate upon the Address has become the formal opportunity for approving or challenging the Ministerial policy put forward in the Royal Speech. (2) Addresses from individuals have been offered to the king from the earliest times, usually in the form of petitions for pardons, or redress of private grievances; and though these petitions were subsequently usually made to the House of Commons, they were occasionally laid at once before the sovereign himself, as in the case of the petition of the clergy in 1344.² The practice of addressing the Crown on political matters had, however, no precedent until the time of Charles I. (1640), and in 1662 was restrained by an Act against tumultuous petitioning. In 1679 the Whig petitions for the assembling of Parliament were met on the part of the Tories by counter-addresses from the Abhorers (q.v.). In 1701 petitions were presented, praying for the dissolution of Parliament, and again in 1710; whilst in 1784 numerous addresses to the king set forth that the people were willing to support Mr. Pitt and the prerogative. The constitutional character of the addresses of 1710 were supported by a vote of the House of Commons, which affirmed "that it is the undoubted right of the people of England to petition or address the king for the calling, sitting, and dissolving Parliaments, and for the redressing of grievances." Aden, an important military position on the south coast of Arabia, was taken by the English in 1839, and, in spite of various attacks made upon it by the Arabs, has ever since remained under British rule. Its position gives it a great importance as a coaling station for the Indo-European steamers. Aden is governed by a Resident, and forms part of the Bombay presidency.

Adelaide, QUEEN (b. 1792, d. 1849), the daughter of George, Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, was married to the Duke of Clarence, 1818. On the accession of the Duke of Clarence as William IV., a bill was passed [REGENCY BILLS] appointing her Regent, in case any child of the king's succeeded him during minority. She scrupulously abstained from interfering in politics; but in spite of this, the dissolution of the Melbourne Cabinet in 1834 was attributed to her influence. After the accession of Queen Victoria, her life was chiefly spent in works of charity and benevolence.

Adelais of Louvain (b. 1103) was the second wife of Henry I., to whom she was married in 1121. She survived her husband, and subsequently married William de Albini, ancestor of the family of Howard.

Adjutors, THE (sometimes erroneously styled Agitators), were representatives elected by each regiment of the Roundheads in 1647, to act in concert with the officers, in compelling Parliament to satisfy the demands of the army before disbanding it. They presented a petition to Parliament, in which they complained of "the ambition of a few men, who had long been servants, but were degenerating into tyrants." The Parliament, finding it impossible any longer to refuse to listen to the demands of the army, sent a committee, consisting of Cromwell, Ireton, Skippon, and Fleetwood, to head-quarters to pacify the soldiers. But the army mutinied, seized the money intended for their pay, and expelled the officers whom they suspected. On May 29 a great meeting of Adjutors, under the authority of Fairfax, was held at Bury St. Edmunds, and a rendezvous of all the troops called at Newmarket. On June 2 the army leaders sent Cornet Joyce to remove the king out of the hands of the Parliament. This having been done, on June 10 a great rendezvous of the army was held at Triploe Heath, near Cambridge. Here the army refused to accept the conditions of Parliament, demanded the dismissal of eleven of the most obnoxious Presbyterian leaders, and began to march on London. On the approach of the army the eleven withdrew, and the Independents became for a time the majority in the House. But the City of London was strongly Presbyterian, and on July 26 a large muster of apprentices and others came unto the House, and compelled the recall of the eleven members, and the replacing of the London militia in the hands of the Presbyterians. Thereupon the army, which had been encamped close to London, entered the city (August 8) and again expelled the eleven members. The power was now entirely in the hands of the army, and the Adjutors were busy holding meetings, and urging forward extreme measures, and demanding vengeance on the king.

Cromwell and the officers began to grow anxious to restore discipline in the army, and when some of the regiments showed signs of acting independently, vigorous measures were taken, one of the ringleaders shot, and others placed under arrest. Lilburne and others attempted to revive the Adjutors in 1649; but the attempt was frustrated by Cromwell. [CROMWELL; FAIRFAX.]

Admiral, THE LORD HIGH, was one of the great officers of State who was specially concerned with the government of the navy and the administration of maritime affairs. The name is derived from an Asiatic word corresponding to the Arabic Amir, and the Turkish Emir, a commander or general; and it was probably adopted by the English either directly from the Saracens, in the course of the later Crusades, or from the Sicilians or Genoese. The first person to whom the name "Admiral of England" is certainly known to have been given was William de Leybourne, who was appointed in 1286, though we hear of the appointment of an officer called "custos maris" from time to time under the Norman and earlier Angevin kings. During the 14th century and the early years of the 15th, there were frequently two Admirals, of the North and the West respectively. From 1404 till 1632 there was an uninterrupted succession of Lord High Admirals of England, whose duties were not only to act as Naval Commanders-in-Chief, but also as Ministers of Marine and Presidents of the Court of Admiralty. In 1632 the duties of the office were entrusted to a commission of the great officers of state; and under the Commonwealth naval affairs were managed by a Committee of Parliament, and afterwards by Cromwell. After the Restoration, the office of Lord High Admiral was held by King Charles II., and by James, as Duke of York and as King, and by Prince George of Denmark, the husband of Queen Anne. Since 1708, however, the office has always been in commission, with the exception of a short period (May, 1827—Sept., 1828), when the Duke of Clarence, afterwards King William IV., was Lord High Admiral. By the Acts 2 Will. and Mary, c. 2, and 1 Geo. iv. c. 90, the authorities, jurisdiction, and powers of the Lord High Admiral were vested in the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. The chief of these commissioners is styled the First Lord of the Admiralty. In modern times he has become practically sole and responsible Minister for the Navy, and is now always a member of the Cabinet. In 1869, Mr. Childers, then First Lord of the Admiralty, introduced important changes into the working of the department which tended to give the minister more undivided control and responsibility. The First Lord, who is generally a civilian, is assisted by the three Naval Lords, one Civil Lord, and the Secretary to the Admiralty, who has charge of financial and parliamentary business.

The title of ADMIRAL has also been used continuously since the 13th century to designate the highest grade in the Royal Navy; but it does not appear to have come into general use in this sense till the latter part of the 16th century. There were formerly three classes of Admirals, those of the Red, the White, and the Blue squadrons, but this distinction was abolished in 1864. [NAVY.]

Admiralty, COURT OF, is the Court of the Lord High Admiral in his judicial capacity. The early admirals and custodes maris, from the time of Henry I. onwards, had the prerogative of judging on all disputes between merchants and sailors, and on offences committed on the high seas, out of the jurisdiction of the Common Law Courts. These privileges, and the way in which the admiral and his deputies used them, especially the respect paid by the Admiralty judges to the Civil Law, provoked the jealousy of the Common lawyers, and, in 13 Rich. II., a statute was passed strictly limiting its procedure to matters transacted on the seas, and this statute was enforced by one passed two years later. When there was a Lord High Admiral the judge of the Admiralty Court was generally appointed by him; when the office is in commission he is appointed by the Crown. The criminal jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court is now no longer exercised, and offences committed on the high seas are tried at common law. By an Act of the reign of Henry VIII., all such offences were to be tried by commissioners of oyer and terminer under the great seal, and according to the law of the land. When the Central Criminal Court was established in 1834, the judges were authorised to decide on all offences committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty. The civil jurisdiction of the court is important, and, by 3 and 4 Vict., c. 65, comprehends all causes arising out of questions of the title to or ownership of vessels, maritime contracts, salvage, and cases of collisions and damages on the high seas. By the Judicature Act of 1873, the Admiralty Court was united with the Court of Probate and Divorce to form one division of the Supreme Court of Judicature. At the breaking out of war, a commission is issued to the judge of the Admiralty Court constituting him president of a Prize Court, to decide as to what is or what is not lawful prize. Property captured from the enemy is held not to have absolutely ceased to belong to its former owner till condemned by the sentence of a Prize Court. The proceedings in this court are supposed to be conducted according to the law of nations, and the decisions of its judges, and notably of Lord Stowell during the early years of the French revolutionary war, form very important contributions to international law. Courts of Vice-Admiralty, having analogous powers to the Admiralty Court, are established in most of the British colonies. The Chief Justice of the colony is ex-officio judge of this court, and there is an appeal from his decision to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The ADMIRALTY COURT for Scotland retained its separate existence at the union, though the Scottish Lord High Admiral was abolished. In 1831 the Scotch Admiralty Courts were abolished, and their functions entrusted to the Courts of Session and Justiciary. [NAVY.]

For the early history of the Admiralty, the best authority is The Black Book of the Admiralty, a most important collection of documents bearing on the subject, chiefly in the 14th and 15th centuries, with the valuable prefaces of Sir Travers Twiss in the Rolls Series, 1871, &c. See esp. the Editor's introduction to vol. II. Among other matters of interest, the Black Book contains a transcript of the Laws of Oleron, issued by Richard I. at that town, which formed the basis of the maritime jurisprudence of all the western nations. See also Rymer's Fœdera; Peppys' Naval Collections; A Treatise on the Sea Laws, 1724; J. Exton, Maritime Dicæologie, 1746; Sir Harris Nicolas, History of the British Navy; Knight's Political Cyclopædia, art. Admiralty; and Stephens' Commentaries on the Laws of England.

Admonition, THE, 1588. A book entitled "An Admonition to the Nobility and People of England and Ireland, concerning the present wars made from the execution of his Holiness' sentence, by the high and mightie King Catholike of Spain," was issued by Cardinal Allen, in order to advocate the Spanish invasion of England, and to declare the Papal sentence of excommunication against Elizabeth. It is a document full of gross and offensive attacks on the Queen, and may be considered as one of the most indecent political libels that have ever appeared. The effect of the Admonition was to disgust not only all Protestants, but also a great many Catholics. The style is so unlike the usual manner of Cardinal Allen that it has often been attributed to the pen of the Jesuit Parsons; but whoever was its real author, it was signed and acknowledged by Allen.

Admonition to Parliament, THE, 1572. the work of two nonconformists, named Field and Wilcox, was presented to Parliament by Thomas Cartwright. The object of the pamphlet, which was written in a spirit of intolerance and defiance, was the complete abolition of episcopacy. A second "admonition" was also published by Cartwright (who was supported by Leicester), and spread over the country. An elaborate answer was written by Archbishop Whitgift, and Field and Wilcox were committed to Newgate.

Adrian IV., POPE (b. circ. 1100, d. 1159), was the only Englishman who has occupied the Papal chair. His name was Nicholas Breakspere. He was born at Langley in Hertfordshire, studied in France, entered the monastery of St. Rufus in Provence, of which he became Abbot. In 1146 he was created a Cardinal, and sent as papal legate to Norway. In 1154 he was chosen Pope. His papacy was disturbed by the attempt of Arnold of Brescia, whom he succeeded in arresting and executing (1155). Adrian is memorable in European history as beginning the long and bitter quarrel between the Popes and the Hohenstaufen emperors. In English history his chief interest lies in the famous bull in which he granted Henry II. the sovereignty over Ireland. The BULL OF ADRIAN IV., with regard to Ireland, was issued in accordance with the idea, commonly held throughout the middle ages, that the fabulous "donation" of Constantine had included a gift to the successor of St. Peter of all the islands in the world. In 1153, on condition of the payment of Peter's Pence, the Pope issued a bull which handed over the sovereignty of the island to Henry II. The enterprise was prompted, it was stated, by "the ardour of faith and love of religion," and there is indeed no doubt that the laxity of the Irish clergy, and the looseness of the connection with Rome, had much to do with the eagerness with which the Pope acceded to Henry's request for the bull.

Adullamites (1866) was a name derisively applied to those Liberals, about forty in number, who opposed the majority of their party on Earl Russell's proposal for a further Reform of Parliament. Their leaders were Mr. Lowe, Mr. Horsman, and Lord Elncho. Mr. Bright, on the 13th of March, compared this party to the assembly which came to the cave of Adullam, when David called about him every one that was in distress and every one that was discontented. The defection of the Adullamites led to the overthrow of Lord Russell's ministry.

Adventurers. [See MERCHANT ADVENTURERS.]

Adventurers of 1642, THE. The English Parliament having confiscated between two and three millions of acres in Ireland, in consequence of the Rebellion of 1641, debenture bonds were issued made payable in land after the reconquest of the country. About a million acres were thus disposed of, the original idea being that the money thus obtained should actually be employed in suppressing the rebellion; but the outbreak of civil war in England prevented this. When in 1653 the conquest was finally accomplished, the counties of Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford, in Munster; King's and Queen's County, East and West Meath, in Leinster; Down, Antrim, and Armagh, in Ulster, were set aside for satisfying these claims, and those of the Puritan soldiery. Many of these Adventurers were subsequently deprived of a large portion of their lands by the Act of Settlement and Explanation in 1665, and a considerable number emigrated to America.

Advertisements, DUTY ON. Advertisements in newspapers appear to have first come into use during the period of the Commonwealth, the first being, it is said, an announcement of an heroic poem on the death of Cromwell. Advertisements became common during the latter half of the seventeenth century, and in the reign of William III., a gratuitous paper of advertisements was started and existed for some time. By an Act of 1712, a duty was imposed on each advertisement published. In 1838 the tax was reduced from 3s. 6d. in Great Britain, and 2s. 6d. in Ireland, to 1s. 6d. in the former and 1s. in the latter country. In 1851 the tax brought in over £175,000. The duty was abolished in 1853.

Advertisements (1666) was the name of a book of discipline issued by Archbishop Parker. It marks the beginnings of the persecutions of the Puritan clergy, and has in recent times excited much controversy. The Archbishop had previously endeavoured in vain to induce Cecil to consent to an official promulgation of these "advertisements;" but as Cecil was not anxious to provoke opposition by too rigid an execution of the Act of Uniformity, he had refused to authorise or publish them, and Parker was consequently left to issue them on his own responsibility. Their title ran: "Advertisements partly for due order in the public administration of Common Prayer and using of the Holy Sacraments, and partly for the apparel of all persons ecclesiastical, by virtue of the Queen's Majesty's letter commanding the same." The points especially insisted on are the wearing of the surplice and cap; and generally they enforced rigid obedience to the more obnoxious portions of the Act of Uniformity. Much controversy has arisen as to the precise validity of these Advertisements. On the one side it has been maintained that the royal authorisation gave binding force to the Archbishop's injunctions, and that they were the "other order" which the Act of Uniformity of 1559 half anticipated as likely to supersede the "Ornaments Rubric," which enjoined that church ornaments should remain as in the second year of Edward VI. This view, which was adopted by Lord Selborne in the "Ridsdale Case," has been attacked by Mr. J. Parker in his "Ornaments Rubric," where it is maintained that the advertisements were simple archiepiscopal injunctions, and that their enforcement of a minimum of ritual did not aim at abolishing the vestments, etc., of Edward VI.'s First Prayer-Book.

Advocate, THE LORD, also called the King's or Queen's Advocate, is the chief law officer of the crown in Scotland, and corresponds, roughly speaking, to the English Attorney-General. The King's Advocate is found in existence in 1479, in 1540 he became one of the officers of state, and in 1587 he is first mentioned as Lord Advocate. The origin of the office is extremely obscure; it has been supposed that, with the title, it was derived from the French; and the duties of the earlier Kings' Advocates, of whom there is a fairly full list from 1483, are equally ill-defined. They appear to have been comprised in the prosecution of state officers, and the inquiry into the extent of the feudal forfeitures arising from those offences. In the middle of the sixteenth century it is possible to gain a clearer idea of his functions; the Lord Advocate was public prosecutor, he conducted all cases in which the sovereign was concerned, which, from the reign of Queen Mary, have been pursued in his name, and in the latter part of the century appears to have occasionally combined the offices of advocate and judge in the court of sessions. Previous to the Union, the Lord Advocate sat in Parliament in virtue of his office: but now he is not necessarily, though he is generally, a member of the Lower House. He is appointed by the Crown, and tenders his resignation when the administration changes. When the Duke of Newcastle abolished the office of Secretary of State for Scotland in the reign of George II. the duties of that minister were transferred to the Lord Advocate. In Parliament he answers all questions relating to Scotland, and undertakes all measures of Scottish legislation; but he is not a member of the Privy Council, and is called right honourable by courtesy only. Outside Parliament he acts as public prosecutor, in which duties he is assisted by the Solicitor-General and four advocates-depute, and appears for the Crown in all civil cases. His warrants for searching, apprehending, and imprisoning run in any part of Scotland; he is allowed to sit within the bar of the court of session, a privilege enjoyed by peers of the realm.

Advowson is the right of presentation to an ecclesiastical benefice vested in a man and his heirs for ever. The word is taken from Lat. advocatio, for he who had the advowson was the protector or patron of the church. As the parochial system was grafted on the township, it might be contended that the right of presentation would at first be in the lord of the manor; but as a fact, the early parish priests were in a great proportion of cases appointed by the bishops. An advowson is presentative when it is the right of presenting a clerk to the bishop for institution; collative when the bishop is patron; donative when by royal foundation or licence the patron can present without reference to the bishop. An advowson is regarded by the law as a trust. Yet advowsons, and the power of exercising the right of presentation for one or more terms, can be sold subject to some restrictions. A right of nomination to the patron may exist separate from the right of presentation to the bishop; thus, in the mortgage of an advowson, the mortgagee presents, but he must do so on the nomination of the mortgager. Neither Roman Catholics nor their trustees may present; they must sell the presentation, or it will vest in the University of Oxford or of Cambridge (11 Geo. II., c. 17). The presentee must be in priest's orders before his institution (14 Car. II., c. 4). Restrictions on patronage depend on the law of simony, which, as far as our temporal courts are concerned, is founded on 31 Eliz., c. 6, and 12 Anne, c. 12. A clergyman may not purchase a next presentation for himself, but he may purchase an advowson, and be presented on the next vacancy. If a patron neglects to exercise his right, the presentation lapses at the end of six months to the bishop, the archbishop, and the crown successively. Suits for disturbance of patronage used to be maintained by darrein presentment, and later more usually by quare impedit, and now, since 23 and 24 Vict., c. 126, by writ of summons. The bishop is bound to institute the clerk presented by the patron, unless there is good cause to the contrary, and the patron or the clerk has remedy in case of refusal by application to the Provincial Court.

Aelfheah. [ALPHEGE.]

Aelred (AILDRED, EALRED) OF RIEVAULX, St. (b. 1109, d. 1166). An English historian, born at Hexham, and educated in the family of King David of Scotland. He is said to have refused a Scotch bishopric that he might become a monk of the Cistercian Abbey of Rievaulx, in Yorkshire, of which he became abbot in 1146. He wrote several historical works, among which are lives of Edward the Confessor, David of Scotland, Queen Margaret of Scotland, and St. Ninian, and a Chronicle of the Kings of England. None of his works are of high historical value. "Ailred of Rievaulx," says Sir Thomas Hardy, "ranks in the second class of English mediæval historians, and even there does not occupy the first place." Aelred was also the author of a number of theological treatises. He was canonised in 1191.

See Sir Thos. Hardy, Descriptive Catalogue of Materials, ii. 243, &c. (Rolls Series.) Aelred's works were collected by R. Gibbon, Douai, 1631, &c., and they are to be found in Migne, Patrologia, vol. 195. Aelred's Vita S. Edwardi Conf. and Descriptio de Bello apud Standardum are in Twysden Scriptores Decem.

Afghan Wars. (1) Situated in immediate proximity to the N.W. frontier of India, Afghanistan has, from the earliest times, figured conspicuously in the history of Hindoستان and of Central Asia. Its first connection with English history dates from the year 1809, when the rumour of a joint invasion of India, determined on by Napoleon and the Czar Alexander, led to the despatch of the Hon. M. Elphinstone as envoy to Shah Shujah, then ruler of Cabul. A treaty was concluded between the two at Peshawur. The subsequent events, fraught with intestine broils, do not call for detailed review, though we may note the visit of Lieut. Alexander Burnes to Cabul, on his way to Bokhara, in 1832, for the mass of interesting information collected thereby. In 1834, Shah Shujah, who had been dethroned, endeavoured to regain his power, and advanced on Candahar, but was defeated by Dost Mahomed, ruler of Cabul, and Kohandil Khan, who reigned at Candahar. He took refuge eventually with Nasir Khan, of Khelat, who enabled him to return to Ludiana in a manner suited to his dignity. In 1837, the siege of Herat by Persia, encouraged, as believed, by the Russians, and the defeat of the Sikhs by Dost Mahomed, led the English to despatch Burnes as resident at the court of Cabul. But the suspension of the negotiations then existing between Dost Mahomed and the Russians being refused by the Amir, the resolution was formed of placing the ex-king, Shah Shujah, on the Afghan throne. An army of 21,000 men was assembled on the Indus (16th January, 1839), and, advancing on Candahar through the Bolan Pass, took possession of that city, where Shah Shujah was crowned on the 8th May. Ghazni fell next, the gate of the city being blown in by Lieut. (afterwards General Sir Henry) Durand. Dost Mahomed, finding his forces melting away, fled beyond the Hindu Kush, and the British entered Cabul without opposition. Shah Shujah's restoration was at first popular, but the people, soon finding how completely this was due to English support, incensed at the reduction of subsidies to the chiefs, and inflamed by the mullahs or priests, began to gather in insurrection. The British authorities neglected warnings, and on the 2nd November, 1841, rebellion broke out, and Sir Alexander Burnes and other officers were treacherously assassinated. Disasters followed thickly on one another, and General Elphinstone, on whom the command had been thrust, was in the feeblest health. At a conference with Akbar Khan, Dost Mahomed's son, Sir W. Macnaghten, the British envoy, was murdered by that chief; and on the 6th January, 1842, the British garrison of 4,500, with nearly three times that number of camp followers, proceeded to evacuate the country, but perished miserably in the mountain passes between Cabul and Jellalabad, a single survivor, Dr. Brydon, alone reaching the latter city. Ghazni fell to the Afghans on the 10th

December, some hundreds of Sepoys being carried into captivity, while ninety-five hostages, left by the British, were in durance near Cabul. Candahar and Jellalabad, however, were held firmly by Generals Nott and Sale respectively. A strong expedition, under General Pollock, was prepared in India, and after forcing the Khyber Pass relieved Jellalabad. After halting two months at this place, the time being spent in negotiations, General Pollock advanced and inflicted a severe defeat on Mahomed Akbar Khan entering Cabul a few days later. The captives were recovered, the principal bazar of Cabul razed to the ground, and General Nott, who had advanced from Candahar and captured Ghazni, beheld, on his arrival at Cabul, the British flag floating over the ramparts. Soon after the departure of our troops Shah Shujah was assassinated, and Dost Mahomed Khan was restored to his former power. During the Sikh revolt, in 1848, he joined them against the British, but a friendly understanding was arrived at and a treaty concluded in 1855. The same year saw the acquisition of the Candahar province by Dost Mahomed, and the second Persian advance on Herat; its capture and final cession, through fear of the English, who had sent an expedition to the Persian Gulf, are the subsequent events of note.

(2) Shere Ali Khan, who ascended the Afghan throne in 1863, passed through great vicissitudes of fortune, but eventually overcame his rivals and foes in 1868. An arrangement was arrived at between the British and Russian governments in 1872 that Afghanistan was beyond the field of Russian influence, and the practical violation of this understanding in 1878, coupled with the repulse by the Afghans of a British mission, led to a fresh Afghan war. The victories at Ali Musjid and Peshawar, and the capture of Candahar and Kelat-i-Ghilzai by Sir Donald Stewart, placed all the important vantage points of Eastern Afghanistan (Cabul excepted) in our hands. A treaty was concluded at Gandamak with Yakub Khan, who had succeeded to power on the death of his father, Shere Ali, but all its provisions were scattered to the winds by the murder of Sir L. Cavagnari, who had been deputed as English envoy to Cabul. Sir F. Roberts promptly advanced on the capital, and inflicted a severe defeat on the Afghans at Charasia. For some months, however, fighting went on, till, at the close of 1879, the total defeat of Mahomed Jan effectually dispersed the insurgents. These successes were worthily supported by Sir D. Stewart's victory at Ahmed Kheyl, he having advanced to Cabul from Candahar. Matters were now settling down, but the approach of the Sirdar Ayub Khan from the side of Herat kindled anew the flames of rebellion. This pretender, having defeated General Burrows at Maiwand, proceeded to invest Candahar, but was utterly routed in his turn by General Sir F. Roberts, who had effected the difficult march from Cabul with much skill and generalship. In September, 1880, the British troops were withdrawn from the Kurram and Cabul valleys, and in the following April from Candahar, leaving the government of the country in the hands of Abdur Rahman, whose authority as ruler of the country had been recognised by England in July, 1880.

The chief authorities on the subject of Afghanistan generally will be found enumerated at length in Sir Charles MacGregor's admirable Gazetteer, published at Calcutta in 1871. The leading events of the subsequent campaigns are briefly chronicled in Robertson's Three Campaigns in Afghanistan (1881). [C. E. B.]

Agatha, or ELFGIVA, second daughter of William the Conqueror, was betrothed to Harold in 1062, but died shortly after.

Aghrim, BATTLE OF (July 12, 1691), fought in the campaign between William III. and James II., in Ireland, resulted in a victory, gained by Ginkel, over the Irish and French troops, under St. Ruth. The French general had allowed Athlone to be taken (June 30). He then fell back about thirty miles to the hill of Aghrim. He drew up his army on the slope of a hill almost surrounded by a deep bog. A wooden breastwork had been constructed in front, near the edge of the morass. Ginkel started from Ballinasloe, four miles from Aghrim, on the 11th, and reconnoitred the Irish position. Next day at five in the evening the battle began. The English first struggled through the bog and attacked the breastwork, only to be driven back again and again. Ginkel was meditating a retreat. But Mackay and Ru-vigny led the cavalry through a narrow passage in the morass, and turned the Irish flank. At this crisis St. Ruth was killed. His officers foolishly kept his death secret, so that Sarsfield, who might have taken the command, remained with the reserve. At length the breastwork was carried. The Irish retreated step by step, but, after a while, broke and fled. Then the conquerors began to kill without mercy. For miles around the naked bodies of the slain lay on the fields. The country looked, it was said, like an immense pasture covered with flocks of sheep. Sarsfield did his best to cover the retreat. One body of fugitives went towards Galway, the other towards Limerick.

Agincourt, BATTLE OF, fought October 25, 1415. Henry V., in attempting to regain the ground which Edward III. had lost in his first campaign against France, took Harfleur, but finding his army greatly diminished by sickness, was unable to undertake any great expedition. He resolved to make his way to Calais through the hostile provinces of Normandy, Picardy, and Artois. His army consisted of about 15,000 men, of whom 5,000 were archers, and 700 knights. A French army numbering at least 50,000, under the Constable D'Albret, was gathered to cut them off. The English were allowed to cross the Somme, and Henry was courteously asked to name a day for battle. He answered that he was always to be found in the field. For four days the French marched by the side of the English. At last the Constable chose his position a little to the north of Creçy, so as to cut off the English from the village of Agincourt. The battle-field was a somewhat narrow valley, surrounded by woods on the east and west, while through it ran the road to Calais. The French were drawn up in three massive lines. The first two lines fought on foot; the third was mounted. The confined nature of the ground gave no chance for the use of artillery, and the heavy-armed French were at a disadvantage in the soft ground, as compared with the light-armed English yeomen. The English were drawn up in three divisions, but all close together. While their lines were only four deep, the French were massed thirty deep. Before the battle futile negotiations were carried on, and Henry V. used the time to send some archers secretly through the wood to watch the left flank of the French. It was eleven o'clock when the order was given to the English to advance. The archers ran forward armed with stakes, which they fixed in the ground so as to form a palisade in front of them. Darting forward, they fired with splendid aim at the French men-at-arms, who were unable to advance quickly in the soft ground, and fell in numbers. Meanwhile the French cavalry attempted a flank movement, but were taken unawares by the archers in ambush; their horses soon became unmanageable, and they were thrown into confusion. The French infantry, finding themselves unsupported, broke, and the English archers, seizing their swords and maces, rushed into their lines and turned them to flight. Then, reinforced by the English men-at-arms, the archers attacked the second division of the French. Here the battle was fiercer and more equal. The Duke of Alençon on the French side, and Henry V. on the English, fought desperately, and for two hours the victory was uncertain. At length Alençon was slain, and the French gave way. A cry was raised among the English that a new French army was coming up in their rear. In the panic Henry V. gave orders that all prisoners should be slain. Many brave Frenchmen met their death before it was discovered that the supposed army was only a band of peasants who had collected to plunder. Meanwhile the third division of the French wavered, and, at last, fled. After three hours' fighting the victory of the English was assured. The French losses were very heavy. More than 10,000 men fell on the field, amongst them 8,000 nobles, knights, and squires.

Agitation, Political. [See the INDEX.]

Agra is a strong and ancient town on the river Jumna, in the North-West Provinces of India. It was formerly one of the chief cities of the Mogul dynasty, and in the wars of 1803 it was held by the Maharrattas, from whom it was captured by General Lake after a day's bombardment, and ceded to the English by Scindiah at the peace of Surge Anjengaoon. Agra then became the capital of one of the eight commissionerships into which the North-West Provinces were divided, and the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor; but since the mutiny of 1857, when the European residents were menaced by the insurgent sepoys, and had to take refuge in the fort, the provincial seat of government has been transferred to Allahabad. Agra contains the old palace of Shah Jehan, a mosque which is one of the most beautiful in India, and the famous Tajmahal, a magnificent mausoleum built by Shah Jehan over the remains of his wife.

"Agreement of the People" was one of John Lilburne's numerous pamphlets, and was published in 1648. It was received with great enthusiasm by the Levellers; and at a meeting held between Hertford and Ware, for the purpose of restoring discipline to the army, and satisfying the claims of the soldiers, a large number wore this pamphlet in their hats. Fairfax and Cromwell ordered them to remove the pamphlets. All the regiments except Lilburne's obeyed; and Cromwell, perceiving the necessity of at once stopping the insubordination, caused one of the ringleaders to be shot, and the others imprisoned. [LILBURNES; LEVELLERS.]

Agricola, CÆSAR JULIUS (b. 37. d. 93), Roman governor of Britain (78—84), had, previous to his appointment, served in the island under Cerealis. During his governorship he endeavoured to subdue the tribes in the north, and to conciliate the British to the Roman rule by making them acquainted with the advantages of civilisation. He encouraged them to come to the towns, and had many of the sons of the chiefs instructed in literature and science, and he succeeded so well "that they who had lately scorned to learn the Roman language were becoming fond of acquiring the Roman eloquence." In 78 he reduced Mona; in 79 he subdued the north of Britain to the Tweed; in 80 he advanced as far as the Firth of Tay; the year 81 was employed in constructing a chain of forts between the Clyde and the Forth; in the next year he explored the north-west part of the island, and planned a descent upon Ireland, but the rising of the Caledonians, under their chief Galgacus, prevented this project being carried out. After some severe fighting, he defeated Galgacus, and thus subdued the whole island. In 84 he sailed round the island, and discovered the Orkneys; and in the same year he returned to Rome, where a triumph was decreed to him.

The Life of Agricola was written by his son-in-law, the historian Tacitus. The Agricola is the best extant account of the condition of Britain in the early part of the period of the Roman rule.

Agriculture. The history of agriculture in England is derived from two sources; the literature on the subject, which is scanty in the earlier period, but becomes copious as time goes on, and contemporaneous records, which are exceedingly abundant and exact in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and part of the fifteenth centuries, but are scarce after this time. The fact that so great a mass of domestic archives has been preserved is due to the importance the rules of law gave to all documents which could be alleged in proof of title. Besides, it was at an early period the custom with nearly all proprietors—even the sovereign and the great peers—to cultivate their own estates with their own capital, and under the superintendence of bailiffs, who regularly drew up an annual balance-sheet, which was submitted to the audit of their lords. Hence it is possible, by investigating these accounts, to discover how land was stocked and cultivated, and what was the amount of produce which agriculture secured from land.

Generally, during the mediæval period, the greater part of the land in a parish or manor was possessed by the lord and the tenants, free and serf, in the shape of strips or furrows in a common field, separated by a narrow boundary of untilled ground. These fields were private property during part of the year (as a rule, from Lady-day to Michaelmas), and common pasture for the rest. Sometimes fields—generally pasture-land—were held in absolute ownership, and the value of such closes was great. Besides the cultivated land and the closes, there was always a more or less considerable area of common pasture, and generally a wood in which hogs were fed, a small charge being paid for each head. English agriculture from very early times always looked to the raising and maintenance of live stock as a most important industry, and the success with which stock-breeding was handled is proved by the great value of English wool, and by the numerous qualities of this product. The keeping of sheep in connection with arable farming has always been a special characteristic of English agriculture, and for several centuries this country had almost a monopoly in the supply of wool.

Early agriculture in England was very rude. The plough was clumsy, iron was exceedingly dear, draught-cattle, horses and oxen, were small, and the ground was only scratched on the surface. The husbandman had but little farmyard manure, and the only artificial fertilisers which he knew of were marl and lime. The seed was thrown broadcast on the land, about two bushels to the acre of wheat, rye, and peas, and about four bushels of barley and oats. Four times the seed sown was thought to be a fair crop, and five times was seldom obtained even on the best land. The husbandman knew nothing of winter roots, or of artificial grasses, as they are called. Hence his cattle were starved in the winter, and always stunted. Under this imperfect cultivation, he was forced to let at least a third of his land lie in fallow every year. The corn was reaped by cutting off the ears, the straw being suffered to remain on the field at least for a time, often permanently, in order to restore the ground. The whole of the population, town and country, generally took part in the harvest, for the number of residents in the country was insufficient for gathering even the scanty harvest. The stock on the land was far more valuable than the land itself. It has been proved that the stock on a well-tilled farm was worth three times as much as the land. The rent of good arable land was for three centuries about sixpence an acre.

It is not likely, even if the great land-owners had continued to cultivate their own estates, that much progress could have been made in agriculture, for the inventive faculties of Europe were almost stagnant up to the end of the sixteenth century. But owing to the ravages of the Black Death, the great land-owners abandoned cultivation on their own account, and let their land and stock to tenant-farmers, a stocked estate being found to be the most profitable employment of capital, even though the landlord did all the repairs, and made good the losses of his tenant's sheep. It was quite out of the question that a tenant should make agricultural discoveries and improvements, and it is certain that from the reign of Henry III. to the death of Elizabeth, some 350 years, no material alteration was made in English agriculture, except in sheep-farming, and certainly no appreciable progress.

Small as was the produce of the land in comparison with that which has been obtained at later periods, it is very likely that nearly as much land was cultivated in the Middle Ages as is in modern times in England. Certain counties, especially the north and the west, were very backward, as we learn from those few valuations of counties for taxing purposes which are still extant, and are probably the only genuine valuations in existence. But the towns were much smaller, and the space occupied by human habitations in such counties as Middlesex, Oxfordshire, and Norfolk, the most opulent of the English counties, was far less than at present. Ornamental grounds were wholly unknown, and the land was ploughed up to the noble's castle and the farmer's homestead. One can constantly see in parks, which are now ancient, and surrounding residences which are still more ancient, the signs that cultivation had formerly been carried on over places which are now either ornamental only, or are devoted to pasture. In the description given of ancient estates, we may often find that land was ploughed and sown up to the gates of the manor-house, and over spaces which have long been streets in busy towns. Our ancestors had poor gardens, and no pleasure grounds. In the more fertile counties, which are now known by the absence of by-roads, it is likely that more land than is now cultivated was, in the poor fashion of those times, tilled, under the disadvantageous system of frequent fallows and common fields. For as ploughing was merely superficial, and the number of crops was very limited, land was early exhausted, and had to rest in fallow. As the ownership of several lands or closes was rare, and was generally confined to the lord of the manor, the furrows in the common field, with the scanty pasture of the manor common, were the holding of the small agriculturist, i.e., of the mass of the people, since nearly all possessed land; but were held, as far as the first portion of the holding was concerned, under the least advantageous form. Nor was the use of common land for pasture as profitable as it might have been. Generally the right of pasturage was without stint, that is, each occupier had the right of putting as many cattle or sheep as he could get upon the common pasture; and as the lord, who possessed, as has been said, closes from which he could make hay, or could devote to forthcoming stock, had many more cattle than the tenants, he could make the common pasture of comparatively little value to them by overstocking it.

Nothing better illustrates the character of mediæval husbandry than the extreme rarity with which prices of hay are recorded in early times, and the excessive rent which was paid for enclosed pastures. The rent of arable land being about sixpence an acre, that of natural meadow is constantly sixteen times as much, and the aftermaths over four or five times. In our day, the best natural meadow does not command a rent of more than twice the best arable. During the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, it is rare to find, in the examination of many thousand accounts, the prices of hay given. In the fifteenth and sixteenth, during which time enclosures were frequent, and many of the common lands were encroached on, occasionally to the great discontent of the farmer, and even to the employment of violent remedies for the wrong which they felt had been done them, prices of hay are very common.

Under so imperfect a system of agriculture, as the people were fed on unwholesome salted food during half the year, and cattle were starved during the same period, disease was common in man and beast. Scurvy, the inevitable consequence of the use of salted meat, and a deficient vegetable diet, was endemic. Leprosy, which an abundant vegetable food has banished, was as common as it now is in the basin of the Po. The unclean habits of our forefathers added to the general unhealthiness of their lives. Few people lived beyond fifty, when they were old. Plagues of terrible deadliness attacked the people. It is probable that one-third of the population perished in 1349, when the Black Death appeared among us. [BLACK DEATH.] The Plague continued to appear at intervals, till its last visitation in 1665, when it seems most terrible, because it has been most minutely described. After the battle of Bosworth, a new disease, the sweating sickness, appeared, and for a long time was the special scourge of the English people. Like the plague, it was very destructive; but, unlike it, does not appear to have been a foreign importation, but the result of dirt, privation, and unwholesome food. It is only by the study of contemporaneous evidence, and by inquiry from undoubted facts, that we can discover the real extent of the loss. So it is not likely that we should get evidence of the occasion on which plagues have visited animal and vegetable life. It is curious to find that two diseases, scab in sheep and smut in wheat, were first noticed at periods which can be almost defined. The former appears about 1288, and was particularly dreaded, because it imperilled the principal source of English opulence during the Middle Ages, and, indeed, for long after, English wool, in the cloth produced from which a large part of Western Europe was clad. The other was smut in wheat and the allied grains, which was first noticed in 1527, a year of comparative famine. The art of the agriculturist has long been engaged in combating these two pests of his calling. Other serious diseases, the rot in sheep, and pleuro-pneumonia in horned cattle, are described so precisely that there is no doubt of their identity with modern cattle-plagues.

It was stated above that during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it was a common practice to let live and dead stock with land, in other words, to stock a farmer's land as well as let it to him. The monasteries continued the practice up to the dissolution. The leasing of stock was the best part of the landlord's profit on his property, and by implication the least profitable form of holding to the tenant. Hence, in order to induce tenants to accept this kind of occupancy, the landlord not only covenanted to do all repairs, great and small, on the holding, but to insure the tenants against the loss of their cattle by disease. In the rent-rolls of great estates, the costs of tenants' losses by cattle disease form a very serious item, and throw a plain and characteristic light on agriculture and its customs in England, while they show how it came to be an English custom that landlords should improve land. The first change in this prolonged system began with the discoveries of the Dutch. When that people had, by almost superhuman efforts, obtained their political freedom, they began to cultivate Holland on new methods, and to instruct Europe. The impulse which was given to the human mind in the seventeenth century reacted upon husbandry. The discovery of the process of reducing iron by pit-coal cheapened the tools of the husbandman. The Dutch discovered and improved winter roots, the turnip and carrot. It is estimated that the turnip has doubled the productiveness of land. For a century and a half the Dutch were the seedsmen of Western Europe. Then they cultivated clover, and other so-called artificial grasses, and English agriculturists and landowners soon saw that greater profits and larger rents would accrue from these new inventions. The effect of these improvements was, that the numbers and the quality of cattle and sheep were greatly increased, the agriculturist being enabled to find them food in winter, and keep them at least in some condition. Till winter roots were discovered, surplus stock was killed in November, and salted for winter provisions, and it is obvious that this system was injurious to health, as well as a great hindrance to agricultural progress.

During two epochs of English history, the fifteenth and the eighteenth centuries, agricultural products were abundant and cheap. The seasons appear to have been continuously favourable, while the result was aided by the creation of estates in severalty, by enclosing portions of lands on which there were certain common uses, and by similar expedients. The loss was considerable to the general body of occupiers, but the aggregate food product was greatly increased. During the eighteenth century Enclosure Acts were exceedingly common. Between 1726 and 1796, 1,761 such Acts were passed, dealing with nearly three million acres. From this date to 1850, 2,365 more Acts were passed, under which six million more acres were thus appropriated. Most of this area passed from common pasture to arable, and as it may be reasonably concluded that the agriculturist would not cultivate new soil except with the prospect of increased profit, the quantity of food produced must have been greatly increased. Towards the latter end of the last century great attention was given to the improvement of breeds of sheep, by the selection of those which had the best points. This development of agricultural art was due to Mr. Bakewell, and even more perhaps to Mr. Coke, afterwards Lord Leicester. The economy of such a selection was rapidly extended to cattle, and up to recent times stock in Great Britain has been better than in any part of the civilised world, pedigree animals being exported to all countries from this. Nor were the discoveries in practical science made during the eighteenth century without their significance on agriculture. With cheaper iron came better and cheaper tools, a deeper and more thorough manipulation of the soil, and consequently a higher rate of production from the soil. Writers on mediæval, and even later agriculture, counsel the use of wooden harrows on stony ground, because iron was too costly for such tools, and with reason, for while wheat during the greater part of Elizabeth's reign was worth about fourteen shillings a quarter, iron cost about £26 a ton.

The last improvements in agriculture are due to chemical science and machinery. The agricultural chemist, by the gift of artificial manures, by the analysis of artificial food, and by the examination of soils, has been a great benefactor of the farmer, and these inventions have been eminently of English growth. The Americans are to be credited with many labour-saving machines, adopted in order to reduce the cost of wages, for the problem before the agriculturist has always been how to get the greatest possible amount of nutritive matter out of the soil for man and beast, and how to get this continuously, as far as possible, of uniformly good quality.

Ahmednuggur. A town of British India, capital of a province of the same name in the district of Gujerat. It passed from the hands of the Peishwa to those of Scindia in 1797. During the Mahratta war of 1803 General Wellesley invested and captured the town. It was restored to the Mahrattas at the end of the war; but in 1817, after the treaty of Punnah, again passed into the hands of the British.

Aid was a term which included all customary payments by a vassal to his feudal superior, but which was applied especially to the forms of taxation employed by the Crown from the Norman Conquest to the fourteenth century. It is therefore applied to the military tenants' payment of scutage, the freeholders' carucage, and the boroughs' tallage, as well as to what may be called the ordinary feudal aids. The word aid (auxilium) expresses in itself the very theory of the feudal relation—viz., that it was a voluntary relation. The tenant made gifts in aid of his lord, as the lord himself had accepted homage from the tenant. Taxation, therefore, as long as it consisted chiefly of feudal aids, required the formal grant of the feudal tenants. But when it becomes national taxation, it requires the grant of the representatives of the nation—i.e., of the Estates in Parliament. Thus it is that Bracton's statement, that "aids depend on the grace of the tenant, and are not at the will of the lord," grows into the principle enunciated by Lord Chatham: "The taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone." So early even as Henry I., the words of the king's writ are—"The aid which my barons have given to me." And on the same principle, in the thirteenth century, grants are said to be made by "chief tenants, freeholders, and villeins." The very villeins, in order to be taxed, must be supposed to join in the grant, if only through the lords and the freeholders, or their representatives in the national Parliament. The evolution of a national Parliament is, therefore, a logical consequence of the theory of the aid.

The word "aid" applied originally to the three occasions on which the lord could demand contributions from his tenants—viz., for his own ransom, or for the expenses of making his eldest son a knight, or of marrying his eldest daughter. It was due, therefore, equally from the barons who were tenants of the crown, and from the tenants of those barons. Thus Henry I. took, in 1110, an aid pur fille marier, three shillings from every hide in England, and a similar aid pur faire fitz chevalier; and the amount raised for Richard I.'s ransom was enormous. But the word "aid" includes also what may be called the extraordinary aids—the scutage, the hidage or carucage, and the tallage, which together made up the Anglo-Norman scheme of direct taxation. Scutage, the composition in lieu of military service, fell properly on the military tenants of the crown alone. But when the king demanded scutage from them, they would make up the amount by aid from their tenants. Hidage, or in the later and stricter form which it took, carucage, fell on the freeholders. Tallage was the similar burden on the royal demesne, and fell chiefly on the towns. The great struggle in regard to all aids was to fix the rate. Thus Henry I.'s charter promises to take only "reasonable" aids, and that the barons shall do the same. In Glanvil the amount is settled between king and baron, as between baron and vassal, by bargaining. In Magna Charta, art. 12 and art. 14, consent of the Common Council of the realm is required for all but the three ordinary aids, and these aids are to be "reasonable" in all cases, whether taken by the crown from the barons, or by the barons from their own men. And in the Confirmatio Cartarum of 1297 it is enjoined: "Aids henceforth shall only be by the common assent of the realm, saving the ancient aids and prises due and accustomed." Already by statute, in the third year of Edward I., the rate at which lords might take aids of their vassals was fixed at twenty shillings the knight's fee (i.e., about 5 per cent. of the annual value); the same rate in the twenty-fifth year of Edward III. was fixed for the feudal aids of the crown. It only remained to make the extraordinary aids, and especially tallage, dependent upon the assent of Parliament. This, after a long struggle, was effected by the concession made by Edward III. in 1340: "No aid to be henceforth but by assent of Parliament." The struggle was decided, though it was still necessary to guard against royal evasions. But after the Good Parliament, in 1376, it is not till national liberties were silenced by the Yorkist and Tudor despotism that the old theory of a voluntary offering was again made a cover for arbitrary taxation, under the new name of benevolences.

But the crown, by working the theory of voluntary offerings, had also been able to negotiate with the merchants for large grants by way of increased customs, especially on wool; and to humour the clergy in their device to evade the Bull Clericis Laicos by accepting their tenths or fifteenths as free gifts. Parliament, therefore, had to take under its control these two great sources of revenue also, if it was to make the voluntary theory of taxation a reality. And so, in 1362, it is at last enacted that the merchants are to grant no charge on wool without assent of Parliament. The clergy, however, in their two Convocations, were wise enough to forestall direct interference on the part of Parliament, which on its side accepted the compromise, as the crown had done. Thus, by the Lancastrian reigns, the class-taxation of the land-owners, merchants, and clergy was becoming harmonised into a simpler system of taxation, which should fall upon the whole nation rather than upon classes, and on personalty rather than mainly on land. As the subsidy on movables and the customs on exports and imports came in, the old aids died out. The last feudal aid was that taken by Edward III. in 1346, for knighting the Black Prince, which was protested against by the Commons. Of the extraordinary aids, scutage was last taken in 1314. Scutages, indeed, were part of a military organisation of society that was now obsolete, as was that division into knight's fees, which were the basis on which they were assessed. Moreover—and this applies also to carucage and to tallage—they were bound up with a very imperfect method of representation, in which the class highest in the feudal scale was supposed to speak for all. They required laborious collection by old and wasteful methods. But, above all, the two former were assessed on land, and let personalty escape; while tallage was peculiarly unprofitable, because a tallage by the king from his demesne had to be purchased by allowing his barons simultaneously to tallage theirs. The development of the wool-trade, and the existence of a national Parliament, alike necessitated the substitution of a simple national system; and the old, irregular, and imperfect system of aids disappears, not, however, without having bequeathed the great principle to our constitution—that taxation requires assent, and therefore must come through the Commons.

Aidan, KING (b. 532, d. 606), the son of Gabran, succeeded Conal (574) as King of Dalriada. Aidan was crowned by St. Columba, in the island of Iona, and soon proved himself to be a ruler of energy and ability. In 575, at the Council of Drumscat, he successfully asserted the independence of the Scotch kingdom of Dalriada, throwing off the yoke of the Irish Dalriada. In 583 he defeated the English invaders at the battle of Manann, but in 596 was defeated in Kincardineshire by the Picts, four of his sons being slain. In 603 Aidan was again defeated by Ethelfrith of Northumbria at the battle of Dægsastan. [DALRIADA.]

Aidan, St. (d. 651), was a monk in the Columban monastery of Iona. Upon the failure of a mission sent into Northumbria at the request of the King Oswald, who had learnt something of Christianity in Scotland, Aidan was sent and was at once installed as bishop, with his see at Lindisfarne. He established Christianity, and was one of the most zealous supporters of the unreformed Paschal Cycle; which has drawn down upon him the reproaches of Bede. To St. Aidan many miracles are ascribed, the most remarkable of which is, perhaps, his reputed power of stilling the most violent tempest by the use of consecrated oil.

Aids, THE VOLUNTARY, was the name given to a grant of £120,000, made in 1628 by the Irish Parliament, payable in instalments of £40,000 a year in return for certain "Graces" or concessions from the crown. These payments were afterwards, especially by Strafford's action, renewed, and altogether continued for ten years. The Graces were never actually granted.

Aiguillon, SIEGE OF (1347), was the most famous siege of the French wars of Edward III.'s reign. The fortress of Aiguillon was strongly situated on the borders of Gascony and Agenois, between the Lot and the Garonne, and it was bravely defended by Sir Walter Manny against John, Duke of Normandy, from May till the end of August. The duke had sworn never to quit the siege till the place was taken; and, finding his assaults ineffectual, resolved to reduce the place by famine. But the great victory of the English at Crecy imperatively called for the presence of the duke's army in the north of France, and he was compelled to raise the siege.

Ailesbury, THOMAS BRUCE, 2ND EARL OF, and 3rd Earl of Elgin in Scotland (d. 1741), was present at the death-bed of Charles II. He took the oath of allegiance to William III., but, nevertheless, played a prominent part in the Jacobite conspiracies against the king. He was present at a meeting of Jacobites at the Old King's Head in 1695. He was sent to the Tower for his complicity in the Assassination Plot, and, in conjunction with Fenwick, attempted to bribe the witness Porter to leave the country. He, however, always denied that he had been privy to the criminal designs of the plotters. Macaulay remarks that "his denial would be the more creditable if he had not, by taking the oaths to the government against which he was so constantly intriguing, forfeited the right to be considered as a man of conscience and honour."

Ailmer, SIR LAURENCE, was Sheriff of London in 1501, and subsequently Lord Mayor. He resisted the exactions of the king's rapacious ministers, Empson and Dudley, and was committed to prison in the last year of Henry VII.'s reign for refusing to pay the fine of £1,000 imposed upon him.

Airds Moss, FIGHT OF (1680), in Ayrshire, was a small skirmish in which the royal troops routed a party of the extreme Scotch Covenanters, who had signed the "Sanquhar Declaration" (q.v.), or Cameronians, as they were subsequently called. Richard Cameron, the leader of the sect, fell in this encounter.

Aislabe, JOHN (b. 1670, d. 1742), was Chancellor of the Exchequer in Lord Stanhope's ministry of 1717. In 1719 he defended the Peerage Bill. In 1720 he, with Sunderland, was requested by Stanhope to consider the proposals of the South Sea Company. They accepted them; and, accordingly, all the intensity of popular indignation fell on them when the scheme failed. The inquiry elicited the fact that an extensive system of bribes had prevailed, and that large sums of fictitious capital had been invented and distributed among leading members of the Government. Aislabe's case was so flagrant that no one rose to defend him. He was expelled the House, and sent to the Tower. [SOUTH SEA COMPANY.]

Aix-la-Chapelle, TREATY OF (April 18, 1748), closed the War of the Austrian Succession. The initiative came from France, strengthened by her recent successes, and the strong desire for peace felt by England and Holland eventually forced the treaty on Austria and Sardinia. The principal articles were:—The renewal of all former treaties, and the mutual restoration of all conquests, England giving hostages for the restoration of Cape Breton; the fortifications of Dunkirk on the sea-side were to be demolished; the Duchies of Parma, Guastalla, and Piacenza were assigned to the Infant, Don Philip, but if he succeeded to the throne of Naples, the two first reverted to the house of Austria, and Piacenza to Sardinia; the Duke of Modena and the republic of Genoa were reinstated in their former territories; the Assiento Treaty with Spain was confirmed for four years; the Protestant succession in England was guaranteed according to the treaty of 1714, and the Pretender was to be excluded from France; the Emperor was to be acknowledged by France, and the Pragmatic Sanction guaranteed; the Duchy of Silosia and the county of Glatz were guaranteed to the King of Prussia. All the cessions were made at the expense of Austria, and one result of the treaty was the breach of the alliance between that power and England.

It was taken by the Mahrattas from the Moguls in 1770, and was for nearly half a century alternately in the hands of the Mahrattas and of rival Rajput princes. In 1818 it was finally ceded to the British in return for a payment of 50,000 rupees. The town contains the ruins of a very fine Hindoo temple.

Alban. About the end of the ninth century, and before the term Scotia came into use, the district between the Firths of Forth and Clyde and the Spey, which had been known as Pictland, or the kingdom of Scône, was called Alban, or Albania (more correctly, Alba, or Albu), a name which had still earlier been used to designate the whole country north of the Forth and the Clyde. The first king of Alban was Donald, son of Constantine (889—900). Shortly after this,

Alban was divided into seven provinces. About a century later the name was superseded by that of Scotia, Malcolm, son of Kenneth (1005—1034), being the first king of Scotia.

Alban, St. (d. 305 ?), is generally held to be the proto-martyr of Britain. His story, as related by Gildas, is that Alban, being then a Pagan, saved a confessor, who was being pursued by his persecutors, and was at the point of being seized, by hiding him in his own house, and by changing clothes with him. Alban was carried before the magistrate, but having in the meantime become a Christian, he refused to sacrifice to the gods, and was accordingly executed just outside the great city of Verulamium (St. Albans). Numerous miracles are related of him, but, putting these aside, there seems no reason for doubting that he is a historic personage. The date of the martyr's death is a difficulty, as in 305 Constantius, the father of Constantine, was Caesar in Britain, who is known to have been very favourable to Christianity; perhaps we may place the event in 283, the date assigned to it in the Saxon Chronicle.

Albani. A name cognate in meaning with Alban and Albion, which is found associated with the Celtic tribe who possessed the districts of Breadalbane and Athol, with parts of Lochaber and Upper Lorne.

Albania. The name sometimes given to the Scottish Dalriada. [DALRIADA.]

Albans, St., ABBEY OF, &c. [St. ALBANS.]

Albany, PEERAGE OF. In 1398 Robert Stuart (second son of King Robert II. of Scotland) was created Duke of Albany. On the execution of his son, Murdoch, second Duke of Albany, in 1425, the peerage was forfeited to the crown, but revived by James II. of Scotland, and conferred on his second son Alexander, who transmitted it to his son the Regent (1515—1523), John, Duke of Albany. In 1565, the title, being again extinct, was granted to Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley [DARNLEY], husband of Mary, Queen of Scots. In 1772 the title of Countess of Albany was assumed by Louisa Maria of Stolberg-Gedern (1754—1823) on her marriage with Prince Charles Edward, the Young Pretender. She quitted her husband in 1780, and after his death married the poet Alfieri. On being deserted by his wife, the Pretender affected to create his natural daughter, by Clementina Walkinshaw, Duchess of Albany. The title of Albany was added to that of York in the peerages of Ernest Augustus, brother of George I., Ernest Augustus, brother of George III., and Frederick, second son of that king. By letters patent, May 24, 1881, Prince Leopold, fourth son of Queen Victoria, was created Duke of Albany and Earl of Clarence. [STUART.]

Albany, ROBERT STUART, 1ST DUKE OF (b. 1339, d. 1419), the second son of Robert II., and the brother of Robert III., of Scotland, during his brother's later years practically governed the kingdom. His inertness on the invasion of Scotland by Henry IV. gave rise to the suspicion that he was plotting for the death of his nephew, David, Duke of Rothesay, who was besieged in Edinburgh Castle. That there may have been some truth in the supposition is likely; for soon afterwards Rothesay was seized at Albany's instigation, and imprisoned in Falkland Castle, where he died of starvation, 1402. On his nephew's death Albany became governor of the kingdom, and in that character gave support to a man whom he declared to be Richard II. of England, and whom he hoped to be able to make use of against Henry IV. The capture of the young Prince James by the English was also ascribed to his intrigues, whether justly or not is uncertain. On the death of Robert III. Albany continued to govern the kingdom as regent, until his own death, Sept. 3, 1419. In spite of his odious private character, Albany seems to have ruled Scotland with vigour, justice, and moderation.

See the Scotchchronicon and Wyntoun, bk. ix., for different views of his character; and Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

Albany, MURDOCH, 2ND DUKE OF (d. 1425), succeeded his father, Robert, as governor of Scotland, 1419, during the captivity of James I. in England. Upon James's return he was condemned and executed at Stirling, May, 1425, together with two of his sons, for having misused his power as regent.

Albany, ALEXANDER, 3RD DUKE OF (d. 1486), was the second son of James II., and brother of James III., from whose jealousy he was compelled to take refuge in France, 1479. In 1483 he joined Edward IV. of England, executing a secret deed, in which he acknowledged the feudal supremacy of England over Scotland. After the affair at Lauderbridge (q.v.), Albany returned to Scotland and assumed the government for a short time; but on the terms of his secret treaty leaking out, was again compelled to seek an asylum in England. Here he joined the Earl of Douglas in an invasion of Scotland, which failed, Albany being obliged to go to France, where he became a great favourite of Louis XI. He is described in the Chronicle of Pittscottie as "verrie wyse and manlie, and loved nothing so weil as able men, and maid great coast and expences theirpoun."

Chronicle of Pittscottie; Lesley, Hist. of Scotland; Burton, Hist. of Scotland.

Albany, JOHN, 4TH DUKE OF, Regent of Scotland from 1515 to 1524, was the son of Alexander, Duke of Albany, and nephew of James III. On the death of James IV., Albany, who was Lord High Admiral of France, was summoned to Scotland to assume the regency, a position which his French education had by no means fitted him to fill. He arrived in Scotland in 1515, and one of his first acts as regent was to crush the power of the Earl of Angus, whom he managed to get conveyed to France; his next, to bring to trial all whom he conceived to be in league with the Douglas party. In September, 1522, he collected an immense army for the invasion of England, to retaliate upon Henry VIII. for having demanded his expulsion from the Scotch Estates. Henry, however, contrived by diplomacy to stay the blow before it had fallen, and Albany shortly after returned to France, where he collected an auxiliary force, 1523. Compelled, however, to raise the siege of Wark Castle, he retired to France in disgust, May, 1524, and never returned.

Albemarle (or Aumale), PEERAGE OF. Odo or Eudes, a claimant of the county of Champagne, held considerable possessions at Albemarle, in Normandy. He married Adeliza, sister of William the Conqueror, and his wife, styled in Domesday Book "Comitissa de Albemarle," obtained large grants of land in England. Her son Stephen (1127) is called "Comes Albemarlensis," and the title was inherited by his son William, who greatly distinguished himself at the battle of the Standard. (See Sir Harris Nicolas' note in his Historic Peerage.) His heiress Hawisia carried the title to William de Fortibus (d. 1195), from whom it passed to their son, William de Fortibus, one of the twenty-five barons named in Magna Charta. His granddaughter Avelina married Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, second son of Henry III., so that the title and honours of Albemarle became sunk in the royal house. In 1397, Edward, Earl of Rutland, son of Edmund, Duke of York, was created Duke of Albemarle (or Aumale), but forfeited the title in 1399. In 1411, Thomas, second son of Henry IV., was created Duke of Clarence and Earl of Albemarle; he was killed at Beaugé in 1421, when the peerage became extinct. It was revived in 1423, in favour of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, who was granted the title for life. It again became extinct on his death in 1439. In 1660

General George Monk was created Duke of Albemarle. The title passed to his son Christopher, and expired with him in 1688. In 1696 the earldom of Albemarle was revived and conferred on William III.'s faithful follower, Arnold Joost van Keppel, in whose descendants it has since remained.

Albemarle, GEORGE MONK, DUKE OF (b. 1608, d. 1670), was the second son of a Devonshire baronet, entered the army as a volunteer, and took part in the expedition to the Isle of Rhé in 1628; and after peace was made with France joined the Earl of Oxford's regiment, which had been raised for the support of the Protestants in Germany and Holland. He remained abroad for ten years, returning to England in 1639, in time to take part in the Scotch war. After hesitating for some time between king and Parliament, Monk decided on joining the forces which had been sent over from Ireland by Ormond to Charles's assistance. As major-general of these troops, Monk took part in the battle of Nantwich, where he was taken prisoner and committed to the Tower. Here he remained for more than two years, but in 1646 he was liberated and placed in command of the English forces in Ulster. He was so badly supported that he was forced to make terms with the rebels under Owen Roe O'Neil, for which he was censured by Parliament, although the Independent leaders had advised the treaty. But Monk had convinced Cromwell of his ability, and on the latter being appointed, in 1650, to the command of the parliamentary forces in Scotland, he made Monk lieutenant-general of artillery. At the battle of Dunbar, Monk showed great bravery, and on Cromwell's return to England he was left to complete the reduction of Scotland, which he speedily effected, though not without considerable cruelty. In 1653, on the outbreak of the Dutch war, Monk was appointed one of the admirals of the fleet, and had a share in the great victory off the Texel. He returned to his command in Scotland in 1654, and remained there till the death of Oliver Cromwell, when he acknowledged Richard, and advised him to rely on the Presbyterian party, and endeavour to gather the old nobility and the country gentlemen round him. But during Richard's short reign anarchy prevailed in England. The Parliament had been forcibly dissolved by the army, and the Rump restored, only to be dispersed a few months afterwards by the soldiers. Having obtained a grant of money from the Scotch Estates, on New Year's Day, 1660, Monk crossed the border, and on February 3rd entered London. All opposition to him proved fruitless, and the Rump, which had been hurriedly resuscitated, hailed him as their deliverer. Perceiving the strength of the royalist reaction he determined to restore the monarchy, and sent an invitation to Charles II. to return. So skilfully did he manage matters that only one slight outbreak occurred, which was easily suppressed, and when Charles landed he was universally welcomed. Monk reaped the highest rewards. He was created Duke of Albemarle and lieutenant-general of the forces, and a perpetual pension of £7,000 a year was granted to him. On the renewal of the Dutch war in 1664 he was appointed joint-admiral with Prince Rupert, and behaved with his usual bravery. During the Plague of 1665 he was invested by the king with the government of London, and by his energy greatly alleviated the general misery, and preserved order. He took no prominent part in politics during the few remaining years of his life.

Albemarle, ARNOLD JOOST VAN KEPPEL, 1ST EARL OF (b. 1669, d. 1718), accompanied William of Orange to England. He was the confidential friend of the king, and acted as his chamberlain. He was raised to the peerage in 1696. After the death of William, Albemarle was chosen by the States-General to command their cavalry, and fought in the war of the Spanish succession. He was taken prisoner at Denain in 1712.

Albemarle, GEORGE KEPPEL, 3RD EARL OF (b. 1724, d. 1772), the son of William Anne, 2nd earl, served, as aide-de-camp to the Duke of Cumberland, at Fontenoy and Culloden. In 1745 he was elected member for Chichester, which place he continued to represent till 1754, when he succeeded to the earldom. In 1761 he was appointed governor of Jersey. In March, 1762, he embarked as commander-in-chief of the land forces destined for the reduction of Havannah, and captured Fort Moro after a stubborn resistance. Still the Spaniards declined to surrender; but after enduring a cannonade for six hours Havannah capitulated with eleven men-of-war and one million and a half of money, and about the same amount in merchandise. In Parliament the earl took an active part in most of the Whig measures of his time, especially making himself conspicuous by his opposition to the Royal Marriage Act, and by joining with forty-seven other peers, in 1770, in a solemn pledge against any future infringement of the rights of the people at elections.

Albert, PRINCE (b. 1819, d. 1861), the husband of Queen Victoria, was the second son of the reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and nephew to King Leopold, of Belgium, and the Duchess of Kent. The prince was admirably and carefully educated, and in November, 1839, formally betrothed to his cousin, the Queen, to whom he was married February 10, 1840. By an Act passed just before this event, a sum of £30,000 a year was settled on the prince for life, the grant having been reduced from £50,000, the sum proposed by the Ministry, by the efforts of the Radicals and the Opposition. By a subsequent Act of this session, the prince was named regent in the event of the Queen's death before the heir to the crown attained the age of eighteen; and in 1857 he was designated "Prince Consort" by letters patent. He died, to the universal regret of the nation, of typhoid fever, Dec. 14, 1861. The prince's position, as husband of a constitutional sovereign, had been a peculiarly difficult and trying one. Apprehensions were frequently expressed in the earlier part of his married life that his influence would be too extensively exercised in matters of state; and during the years of the Crimean war it was asserted and popularly believed, though, as it was proved, without a shadow of foundation, that the prince had taken an undue share in the management of the army and the disposal of patronage. It was, however, gradually acknowledged that the difficult circumstances of his situation could hardly have been met with greater tact and conscientiousness, and with more thorough appreciation of the theory of constitutional monarchy. The prince found a more congenial sphere than politics in the encouragement of the arts and in the promotion of social and industrial reforms, and to his efforts the inauguration and successful establishment of the Great Exhibition of 1861 were in great part due.

Albert Edward, PRINCE OF WALES (b. November 9, 1841), the eldest son of her Majesty Queen Victoria; Duke of Cornwall, in the peerage of England; Duke of Rothesay, Baron Renfrew, and Lord of the Isles in Scotland; and Earl of Dublin and Carrick in Ireland; was educated at both Oxford and Cambridge. The Prince visited Italy in 1859, America in 1860, Germany in 1861, Turkey and Egypt in 1862, and the Emperor of the French at Fontainebleau the same year. In 1871 his life was imperilled by an attack of typhoid fever, and his recovery, in Feb., 1872, was celebrated by a National Thanksgiving Festival. Between Nov. 8, 1875, and March 13, 1876, the Prince of Wales was engaged in a grand tour of India. He married, Mar. 10, 1863, Alexandra, daughter of Christian IX., King of Denmark, and his eldest son, Prince Albert Victor, was born January 8, 1864.

Albinus, CLODIUS (d. 197), commander of the Roman forces in Britain, was proclaimed Emperor by the legions of the province on the assassination of Pertinax (193). His rival, Severus, who was declared emperor by the troops of Pannonia, at first attempted to win him over by favours; but in 197 marched against him and defeated and slew him at Lyons. This battle of Lugdunum, or Lyons, is interesting as being the first recorded battle fought by a British army on the Continent.

Dio Cassius, lxxviii.—v.

Albion was perhaps the oldest name for Britain. It occurs in a treatise once ascribed to Aristotle (De Mundo, c. 3, in Mon. Hist. Brit. i.), “ἐν τούτῳ (sc. τῇ Ὀκεανῷ) νῆσῳ μέγιστά τε τυγχάνουσιν ὄσσαι δύο, βρεταννικαὶ λεγόμεναι, Ἀλβιον καὶ Ἰέρνη” (cf. Bede, Hist. Ec., i. 1, in Mon. Hist. Brit., 108 A). “Rex Albionis insulæ” was a very favourite title of the more powerful Anglo-Saxon kings (see example in Freeman, Norm. Cong., i. 548—551), but in later times Albion mainly occurs in poetry. The word means “white,” and its use was, perhaps, suggested by the chalk cliffs of the south-east coast. It is etymologically connected with “albus,” “alp,” &c., and is the Brythonic (Cymric) form of the Goidelic (Gaelic) “Alban,” e.g., “Drum Albin” is “Dorsum Albionis” (Mon. Hist. Brit., 175 n).

For much curious information and extraordinary etymologies, see Cooper, Thesaurus Lingue Romane et Britannicæ; Dictionary Historiarum (London, 1553), s.v. Albion. See also Ehyz, Celtic Britain, p. 200—203.

Albuera, BATTLE OF (May 16, 1811), during the Peninsular War, was fought by Beresford to check Soult, who was advancing to the relief of Badajoz. Soult had with him 20,000 veteran troops, while Beresford, though he had nominally 30,000 men, could only depend on the handful of 7,000 British troops. He had, however, taken up a strong position on a range of hills, in front of which ran the Albuera River; the British being in the centre, with Blake and the Spaniards on the right. During the night of the 15th Soult massed his men with a view to carrying the table-land which threatened the English right and rear, and on the morning of the 16th directed a feint attack in front. Beresford ordered Blake to change front, to guard against an expected flank attack on the right, but that general for a long time refused to obey orders, and the movement was only at length carried out by Beresford in person, who, even when he had changed the front of the Spaniards, could scarcely induce them to move. Beresford was already thinking of retreating, when Colonel Hardinge with the 4th division, and Abercrombie with a brigade of the 2nd division, which had only been slightly engaged, pushed on to the high ground. The crowded formation of the French prevented them from executing any rapid movement; and, in spite of a storm of grapeshot, the British infantry irresistibly pressed on till, “slowly and with a horrid carnage, the French were pushed by the incessant vigour of the attack to the farthest edge of the hill.” The attempt to bring up reserves “only increased the irremediable confusion; and the mighty mass, breaking off like a loosened cliff, went headlong down the steep, and 1,800 unwounded men, the remnant of 6,000 unconquerable British soldiers, stood triumphant on the fatal hill.” In four hours nearly 7,000 of the allies and 8,000 French had been struck down. On the 17th Soult took up a threatening position, but on the arrival of British reinforcements marched away, and abandoned the attempt to relieve Badajoz.

There is a striking account of the battle in Napier, Peninsular War. [W. R. S.]

Alcantara, CAPTURE OF (1706), was effected by Lord Galway during the War of Succession in Spain (q.v.). He had urged on the Portuguese troops the duty of advancing on Madrid to co-operate with the troops of the Archduke Charles advancing from Barcelona. On his way he drove out a garrison placed by Marshal Berwick in Alcantara. “Ten good battalions” of Berwick’s force were taken, and sixty pieces of cannon.

Alcock, JOHN (d. 1514), Bishop of Rochester, Worcester, and Ely, born between 1430 and 1440, at Beverley, in Yorkshire, was appointed dean of the chapel of St. Stephen in the Palace of Westminster in 1462, and in March, 1470, acted as Edward IV.’s envoy to the King of Castile. After the victory of Barnet, Alcock was made Master of the Rolls, which appointment he resigned in March, 1472, to John Morton, upon his own advancement to the bishopric of Rochester. During the temporary illness of Bishop Stillington, Alcock held the Great Seal from 20th September, 1472, to April 5th, 1473; and in September, 1476, he was appointed to the bishopric of Worcester. During Richard III.’s reign his influence on public affairs was very slight; but on the accession of Henry VII. he became Lord Chancellor, in 1485; and in 1486 succeeded Morton as Bishop of Ely. He built the beautiful hall at his episcopal palace of Ely, and Jesus College, Cambridge, which he founded on the site of the old monastery of St. Radigundo.

Alderman, or Ealdorman, which is the more ancient form of the word, means simply elder man; that is, one advanced in years. It is used in two distinct senses.

(1) Among the first English settlers the title appears to have meant simply chieftain, the position of the ealdorman corresponding to that of the princeps of the Germanic tribes as described by Tacitus before the migration, and it continued to be occasionally used vaguely as an equivalent to lord or noble; but in all public documents the word is evidently taken in the strict sense of the chief magistrate of the shire or group of shires, and was not necessarily connected with nobility of blood, service, or large estate. This restriction of the title may be dated about the beginning of the ninth century, in the days of Egbert. The ealdorman was, in theory, elected in the Witanagemot, but the office became practically hereditary. As the power of the kingdom of Wessex rose, and the smaller kingdoms were absorbed by it, the descendants of the royal houses often became hereditary ealdormen in almost unbroken succession; and when their lines became extinct, the ealdormen appointed by the king, with the implied, if not expressed, consent of the Witan, transmitted the office to their descendants. Their jurisdictions became enlarged, probably by the aggregation of several shires under one rule. The position of the great ealdormen was a high one; they were practically independent of weak kings. Their werigild, the fine exacted from those who killed them, was equal to that of the bishop, and four times that of the theyn, the king's being six times. The duties of the ealdorman consisted in administering the shire conjointly with the sheriff, who represented the royal as opposed to the national authority. He commanded the military force of the shire, in which capacity he was sometimes called heretoga, the leader of the host (here); and he sat with the sheriff and the bishop in the shiremoot, receiving a third of the fines levied in the jurisdiction. The ealdormen also attended the central Witan, together with the bishops. In the reign of Ethelred, the ealdorman began to be supplanted by the Danish office of earl, and this process was completed when Canute divided the kingdom into four great earldoms. From that date the title sank to its earlier meaning of headman, and was applied to almost any local officer. Thus, in the thirteenth century there is an ealdorman of the hundred, who represents his hundred in the shire moot. [See also EARL; SHERIFF.]

(2) Alderman, in its mediæval and modern sense, means an official invested with certain municipal powers and duties, and associated with the mayor in the government of a city or town corporate. The word ealdorman, or alderman, had, as has been shown, become applied to any headman or local officer, and accordingly, in the reign of Henry II., we find that the headman of a gild is called alderman. When, as happened in some of the great towns, the English system of a gild, or trade corporation, gradually lost its identity in the communa, or municipal corporation, the presiding officer of which was the mayor, the mayor and aldermen became associated in the government of the new municipalities. The first mayor of London was appointed in 1191, and the institution of mayor and aldermen in the large towns was pretty general by the end of the reign of John. The authority of the aldermen was, at first, by no means secure, and throughout the reign of Henry III. the populace of London protested against their claim to assess taxation and elect the mayor. However, we find them, with four men from each ward, sending members to Parliament in 1297, and their appointments, which were annual under Edward II., were for life under Edward IV. Under the Lancastrian kings, the mayor and aldermen are associated with the town councils, relics of the earlier town government, which first consisted of twenty-four, and afterwards of larger numbers, and became prominent from the decay of the machinery of the local courts; the mayor, aldermen, and town council forming the elements of the municipal corporation. The numbers and sometimes the functions of the aldermen were settled in the charters of incorporation granted to the towns. Under the Stuarts, their powers were frequently tampered with from above by the forfeiture and alteration of the charters of incorporation, and the appointment of individual aldermen by royal authority; while they in turn usurped the privileges of the burgesses and freemen, became self-elective, and in some cases obtained the exclusive right of electing members of Parliament. Their electoral power, however, was taken from them by the Reform Bill, and in 1835 the Municipal Reform Act and a subsequent Act in 1859 did away with the old order of aldermen (except in London), and enacted that their successors were to be elected for six years instead of for life, one-half of their number retiring every third year; and that they should form one-third of the town councillors, who vary in each borough from 12 to 48, from whom and by whom they were to be chosen. The alderman is represented in Scotland by the bailie; in Ireland he is elected by the burgesses. [See also GILD; TOWN.]

Aldfrid (EALDFRITH), King of Northumbria (685—705), was the son of Oswy, and brother of Egfrith, whom he succeeded. He was well instructed in theology and secular learning, and acquired the title of "the wisest of kings." His territory was curtailed by the conquests of the Picts, but on the whole his reign is said to have been a prosperous and tranquil one.

Aldhelm, or Adelm, Str., Bishop of Sherborne (b. circa 656, d. 709), was born in Wiltshire, and appears to have been connected with the family of the West Saxon kings. Early in life he was sent to study in Kent, and afterwards joined the community of scholars who had studied under the Irish hermit, Meidulf, at Malmesbury; of which monastery Aldhelm became abbot. He afterwards made a journey to Rome, and took part in the dispute with the British clergy about Easter. In 705 he was made Bishop of Sherborne. Aldhelm's learning was greatly celebrated. He wrote in the vernacular as well as in Latin, and has been called "the father of Anglo-Latin poetry." King Alfred considered him as among the best of English poets. He wrote a prose treatise, De Laude Virginitatis; and a poem, De Laude Virginum; some Ænigmata in verse; and some letters to Aldfrid of Northumbria and others.

Aldred (EALDRED), (d. 1069), Archbishop of York, was a monk of Winchester, who became Abbot of Tavistock, and in 1046 Bishop of Worcester. Like many of the native English prelates he travelled much on the Continent. Besides journeying to Rome, in 1050 he traversed Hungary and visited Jerusalem; and subsequently was sent by Edward the Confessor on a mission to the Emperor Henry III. In 1061 he became Archbishop of York, retaining the see of Worcester in commendam. The Pope refused to bestow the pallium on him till he gave up the see of Worcester. On the death of Edward, Aldred crowned Harold; but on the death of that prince he submitted to William, and in fact became a strong supporter of the new dynasty. He performed the coronation ceremony for the Conqueror, in default of Stigand. Several legendary tales are told of the latter part of his life, among which is the striking story that he cursed William for his evil deeds, and caused the king to fall trembling at his feet.

Ale-Taster, ALE-CONNER, or ALE-FOUNDER, was an officer appointed formerly in every manor and borough to examine and assay the beer and ale, and present dishonest ale-vendors to the next court-leet or borough-court. The assize of bread and ale (panis et cerevisie), 51 Henry III., regulated the selling and inspection of these two chief articles of food. The ale-tasters were chosen and sworn in the court-leet once a year. The office, which is of very great antiquity, still survives in some parts of England. It has been thought to owe its origin to the convivial feasts in which the business of the primitive Teutonic communities was largely transacted.

Alexander I., THE FIERCE, King of Scotland (s. 1107, d. 1124), was the son of Malcolm Canmore and Margaret, and successor to his brother Eadgar, or Edgar. By Eadgar's will he obtained as his kingdom the lands north of the Forth and Clyde, his brother David inheriting Lothian and Cumbria. He gained a great victory on the Moray Firth over the rebellious Maormars of Ross and the Mearns, and founded, in gratitude, the monastery of Scone. An attempt to reconstitute the bishopric of St. Andrews involved the king in disputes with the Archbishops of York and Canterbury, ending only with his death, which took place at Stirling, April, 1124. He had married Sybilla, natural daughter of Henry I. of England. With his father's courage and restless ambition, he seems to have inherited from his mother a devotional feeling and a taste for religious exercises, which were much less characteristic of his race. He inaugurated the feudal policy so thoroughly carried out by his successor, David.

Robertson, Early Kings of Scotland; Skene, Celtic Scotland.

Alexander II., King of Scotland (s. Dec. 5, 1214, d. 1249), was son and successor to William the Lion. The young king, who was on friendly terms with the English barons, had to maintain a border army to frustrate the attacks of John until 1217. Carlisle surrendered to the Scots, and the Castle of Tweedmouth was demolished in 1217. In June, 1221, Alexander married Joanna, sister of Henry III. The next year Alexander entered Argyle, drove out all those who had been engaged in insurrections against the royal power, and turned the whole district into the sheriffdom of Argyle, creating also the bishopric of the same name. After a struggle of some years' duration he succeeded in 1235 in finally bringing Galloway into subjection to the crown. The following year Alexander refused to do homage to the English king, and laid claim to the northern counties of England; at a conference between the two kings, at Newcastle, war was only averted by the strong inclination which the English barons showed for peace. In 1244 there was another rupture between the two kings, and war was imminent; but it was averted by the mediation of Richard of Cornwall and the Archbishop of York. In 1248, Alexander, after trying to induce Haco, King of Norway, to surrender the sovereignty of the isles, made an expedition to the Sudreys. He died, however, before accomplishing his object, near Oban, July 8, 1249, and was buried at Melrose. He married, as his second wife, Mary, daughter of Enguerrand de Coucy. He had been a good king, noted for his moderation and justice, bent on the improvement of his subjects and the consolidation of the various discordant elements in his kingdom. Sir David Dalrymple calls him "one of the wisest princes that ever reigned over Scotland."

Alexander III., King of Scotland (b. 1241, s. 1249, d. 1285), was the son of Alexander II. and Mary de Coucy. In 1251, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Newcastle, he was married to his cousin Margaret, daughter of Henry III. In 1255, Henry procured the appointment of the Earl of Dunbar, who was favourable to his interests, as regent in the place of the Earl of Menteith, who, however, recovered his power. In 1263 a war broke out between Alexander and Hacon of Norway, for possession of the Sudreys and the Norse districts on the mainland, which ended in the victory of the Scots at Largs (q.v.), and the consequent annexation of the Isles to Scotland, 1266. In 1274 Alexander and his queen were present at Edward I.'s coronation; and in 1278 the Scotch king did homage to his brother-in-law at Westminster, for lands held in England. On the death of his second son, Alexander, January, 1284, the king, left childless, summoned a meeting of the Estates at Scoone, and caused them to recognise his granddaughter, Margaret, the Maid of Norway, as their future sovereign. Shortly afterwards he married Yolande, daughter of the Count of Dreux, but died owing to a fall from his horse, near Kinghorn, in March, 1285. "To judge from the events of his reign," says Mr. Robertson, "he was an able, upright, and high-spirited sovereign."

Alexander, BISHOP OF LINCOLN (d. 1147), was one of the family group of episcopal statesmen of Stephen's reign, of which Alexander's uncle, the Justiciar, Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, was the head. By his influence he was advanced to the see of Lincoln, and probably also held some office in the royal court. He was one of the bishops arrested by Stephen in 1139, and was kept in prison some considerable time. After his release he retired from political life, and was appointed Papal legate in England. Henry of Huntingdon dedicated his history to Alexander, and speaks of him in terms of the highest praise. He began the erection of the present cathedral of Lincoln, to replace the former one, which was destroyed by fire.

Alexandria, BATTLE OF (21st March, 1801), was fought by the British force under Sir Ralph Abercromby, which had been sent out to complete the destruction of the diminished remnant of Bonaparte's army after he had effected a landing in Aboukir Bay, in the face of a large French force, on the 1st of March. During the next three weeks the French gradually fell back before the British, till they retired into Alexandria. Abercromby now stationed himself to the east of Alexandria, with his right resting on some Roman ruins on the sea-shore, and his left on the Lake Maryadieh. Early on the 21st the French infantry attacked simultaneously both flanks, though the serious attack was on the right, where all the French cavalry were launched upon the English. The attack was resisted by Moore's division with stubborn bravery, until Abercromby ordered the reserve to charge. It obeyed, threw the French into confusion, and hurled them back to their own lines. Meanwhile the attack on the left had proved to be merely a feint, and a real attack on the centre had been repulsed by the Guards. The British loss was heavy, and Sir Ralph Abercromby fell. Deprived of its general, the army was handled with an excess of caution which precluded any brilliant successes, but finally resulted in the capitulation of the French army.

Alexandria, BOMBARDMENT OF (1882). In May, 1882, owing to the disturbed state of Egypt, where the so-called "National Party," under Arabi Pasha, had obtained a complete control of the government, and seemed bent on dethroning the Khedive, an English and French fleet was ordered to enter the harbour of Alexandria. An attempt of the Khedive to dismiss Arabi failed, and the rebellious leaders remained masters of the situation. On June 11th a fanatical outbreak of the Mussulman population of Alexandria occurred, and several hundreds of Europeans, including an officer of the fleet and the British consul, were killed or injured. The fortifications of Alexandria were being constantly strengthened, till they menaced the safety of the British fleet. The English admiral, Sir Beauchamp Seymour, demanded that these works should be discontinued; and on July 6th threatened to bombard the forts if the demand was not complied with. On the 9th and 10th the foreign ships, including those of France, steamed out of the harbour. The English fleet, consisting of eight ironclads and five gunboats, opened fire at seven o'clock on the morning of July 11th. By the evening of the 12th the forts had been completely destroyed and the town abandoned by its garrison, after being set on fire in several places. The loss of the English in the action was trifling, though the Egyptians fought with bravery. Sir Beauchamp Seymour was raised to the peerage under the title of Lord Alcester.

Alford, BATTLE OF (May, 1645), was a skirmish fought in Aberdeenshire between Montrose, at the head of the Cavaliers, and the Covenanters under Hurry and Baillie. The latter were defeated.

Alfred (b. 849? d. 901), called in his own times ÆLFRED, ÆTHELWUFING, in later, ALFRED THE GREAT; King of the West-Saxons between 871 and 901, was born at "the royal town that is called Wanating" (Wantage), in Berkshire. The date usually given on the authority of Asser is 849. But an earlier date, 842 or 843, for his birth would remove at least one difficulty in the story of his life, without raising, so far as the present writer can judge, any others that cannot be explained. He was the youngest son of King Ethelwulf and his wife, the Lady Osburgh, and the grandson of Egbert, and of Osac, the pinerna, or cup-bearer, of Ethelwulf.

We are told nothing of Alfred's childhood, and but little of his boyhood. In 853, says the Chronicle, his father sent him to Rome, when Leo (IV.) was Pope; and the Pope there consecrated him king, and took him as his spiritual son. The well-known account given in Asser of the way in which his lifelong love of letters was first kindled is now looked upon with considerable doubt. There is certainly more than one fatal objection to it, on the supposition that Alfred was born as late as 849. In 861 his mother had been dead at least six years; his father, who had taken as second wife a girl not much older than Alfred himself, and his eldest brother, who had married this same girl on her widowhood, were also dead, and another brother was king in the elder's place; but if we can bring ourselves to believe the date of Alfred's birth, as now printed, a blunder for an earlier, we can safely acquiesce in the literal truth of the beautiful story.

When we add to these scraps of information the facts that he lost his mother about 855, and his father in 858, we possess all that can be received as certain or admissible knowledge respecting his youth. The story that he went again to Rome, as his father's companion, in 855, is discredited by the silence of the Chronicle on the subject. In 868 he married Alcswith, the daughter of Ethelred, surnamed Mickle (the Big), Earl of the Gainas, in Lincolnshire. If Asser's Life speaks the truth, the wedding festivities were not yet over when he was seized by a malady of so strange and mysterious a nature that the simple folk of the time suspected it to be the work of the devil. This would seem to have been some peculiar form of nervous disease. Its most painful feature was its periodic recurrence; it sometimes came upon him without a minute's warning, and paralysed his powers on occasions that demanded their fullest exercise. In the same year, within a few weeks, perhaps, he was called upon to face, for the first time, what proved to be the one mighty task of his life. The Danes had fallen upon the land of the Mercians. Burghred, the Mercian king, cried to his brother-in-law and over-lord, Ethelred, King of the West-Saxons, for help. His cry was heard, and Alfred went with his brother to the siege of Nottingham, where the Danes were lying. Nottingham was won back, not by force, but by a treaty—which probably meant a bargain that gave the English a breathing-space, and the Danes a fair profit on their adventure.

Three years later (871) Alfred was summoned to grapple with the work he was born to accomplish, in deadly earnest; and, as if to bring him to the fulfilment of his destiny, his elder brothers were rapidly dying off. In 860 the West-Saxon kingship had passed from Ethelbald to Ethelbert, whose death in 865 had given the crown to Ethelred, and thus placed Alfred on the very steps of the throne. After the peace of Nottingham the invaders had gone back to York, stayed there a year, and then (870) had marched southward, seized on Thetford, and beaten in battle and slain Edmund, the East-Anglian king. Very early next year (871) they burst into Wessex itself. "The destroying host" laid hold on Reading, secured their position there, and proceeded straightway to carry on from thence their work of plunder and havoc. Towards Reading the men of Wessex at once hastened, under the command of King Ethelred, of Alfred, and of Ethelwulf, the alderman; and a furious strife ensued, which lasted throughout the year. Fight followed fight in quick succession. Victorious under Ethelwulf at Englefield the West-Saxons were, a few days later, baffled at Reading, though led by their king and his brother in person; and after great slaughter had to fall back, leaving the field of carnage in the possession of their enemies. Foiled for the moment, but with courage still unshaken, the royal brothers, four days afterwards, closed with the whole army of the Danes at Ashdown. Here took place one of the most stubborn tugs of war in history. [ASHDOWN.] To Alfred the chief glory of the victory of the West-Saxons is given by Asser, whose book tells us that it was his early advance to the attack, while his brother lingered at mass, that broke the strength of the enemy, and led to their utter discomfiture in the end. Yet this splendid success was indecisive. In an engagement at Basing that followed a fortnight later, "the Danes got the victory" over the winners of Ashdown; and in two months more, at Merton, the West-Saxons, after a stubborn conflict, had to withdraw from the field.

At Easter Ethelred died; and Alfred was made king. In another month he was again at handgrips with his dogged foes—this time at Wilton—and was again beaten. Thus Alfred's reign began with defeat. He now either lost heart, or concluded that further fighting was useless; for in a short time he came to terms—perhaps struck a bargain—with the men he had failed to overcome; and early next year the Danes marched away from his kingdom.

If it was his design to gain time to repair his strength, he was wise to make peace. After 871 the land had entire rest for four years, and comparative rest for three more, though other parts of England were smarting under the rapacity and ferocity of the merciless strangers. Some use of this respite the king must have made: he is recorded as having, in 876, attacked and put to flight seven Danish ships. During the next and following years (876—877) he was also strong enough to force a treaty upon a powerful force that had landed in Dorset, and exact oaths and hostages from them. He found it no easy matter to get rid altogether of the intruders; but in the autumn of 877 they at length sailed away from Exeter to the land of the Mercians. But this deliverance almost brought his kingdom to the brink of ruin. In the first week of 878 the Danish army stole up from Gloucester, and, coming upon the West-Saxons unawares, seized Chippenham. The surprise was complete; so sudden and so swift was the movement, that they had ridden over and taken to themselves the greater part of the kingdom before a sufficient force could be brought together to make head against them at any point. Many people fled beyond the sea; Alfred alone refused to despair; "uneasily, with a little band of warriors, he went along the woods, and into the moor-fastnesses." In one of these he at last halted, and began, with the faithful few that followed him, to throw up a defensive work—thrice-famous ever since as Athelney, the Isle of Nobles, called so, no doubt, from the trusty handful of high-born men that plied the mattock around the king. It covers a few acres a little south of Sedgmoor, in Somerset. To its narrow compass the last English kingdom had shrunk.

But it was a brief agony, after all. The Danes would seem to have been drawing their toils round Athelney; they threw a considerable detachment on the neighbouring coast, which was beaten with great loss, and Alfred was untiring in his assaults upon them from his stronghold. The country recovered from its surprise, and, some weeks after Easter, Alfred quitted Athelney, and met the levies of the three shires at Egbertstone, on the eastern skirts of Selwood Forest. With these he went straight upon the enemy, met them at Edington (a place that, like Egbertstone, has not been identified with certainty), overthrew their host, and chased its wrecks into their fortress. A siege of fourteen days ended in the Danes engaging to withdraw from Wessex, and their king, Guthorm, consenting to become a Christian. These pledges were punctually kept. At Aller the baptismal ceremonies were begun; at Wedmore they were completed; and soon after, the army of the invaders marched away from Chippenham. Thus was Wessex snatched from destruction, and, with Wessex, the destiny of the English race. Never, perhaps, had a nationality come so near, and yet escaped, extinction.

The next fifteen years (878—893) may be called a time of peace for Alfred and his people. During them the flame of war left the ancient kingdom untouched; such fitful bursts of fighting as broke the general stillness either fell upon the outlying districts, as Kent and Surrey, or had the sea as their scene of action; and the king was successful in all. But to these years almost certainly belong the great measures that make the second half of England's debt to Alfred—the effacement of the ravages of war, the restoration of material prosperity, the re-invigoration of the national defences, the improvement of the laws, the rekindling of religion, the "relighting of the lamp of learning." The first two of the above objects he tried to effect by repairing the damage done to towns and cities, raising public buildings, reclaiming waste lands, and making or renewing roads and bridges. Our knowledge of the third is vague; but to the fyrð, or levy en masse, of the people, he sought to give greater rapidity and flexibility of movement; and he reformed the naval system by making the ships themselves instruments of war, not mere platforms for fighting from. As a legislator, he added nothing to existing laws, but simply revised those of his predecessors, keeping "those that seemed to him good," rejecting "those that seemed to him not good," and combining the former into a single code. Religion and letters had sunk so low among the West-Saxons that he had to seek the agents of their regeneration in foreign lands. From Wales he drew Asser; from Mercia, Werfrith and Plegmund; Grimbold and John the Old Saxon from the Continent; and with their help reanimated the services of the Church, founded schools, and encouraged literary composition in the native tongue. At this last he was himself a diligent worker, as translations (that are not mere translations) of large portions of the writings of Boethius, Orosius, Bede, and Gregory the Great still survive to prove. Men in later times loved to dwell on this feature of his career; in a mediæval list of West-Saxon kings, his name is specially distinguished as "litteratus." But in 893 the dogs of war were again let slip on his kingdom, and the old hideous scenes of pillage, slaughter, and havoc were renewed. The chief leader of these fresh swarm of marauders was the terrible Hastings. For four years he dragged Alfred up and down, across and along, the country, making treaties and breaking them, getting again and again beaten, both by land and by sea, but recovering himself after every defeat, and refusing to be driven from the land. The value of the king's military reforms was thus effectually tested; and they may be said to have fairly stood the strain. In every recorded encounter—as at Farnham, Benfleet, Buttington—the West-Saxons overthrew their foes. The upshot at length was that the Danes, beaten, out-generalled, and checked at every turn, got weary of an unprofitable enterprise, broke up into several bands, and went off in different directions, leaving Wessex at peace. The heroic king's work was now done. "Six nights before Allhallowmas," in the year 901, he died.

Alfred is one of the few historical characters that all writers delight to honour: almost with one consent historians have pronounced that he comes pretty nearly as close to perfection as a man and a king as any ruler of whom there is record. This verdict may be accepted as final; it is certainly not likely to be ever successfully impeached. To his goodness, nobility of character, moral greatness, heroism, his whole life is a testimony. Alfred the Good and Steadfast he assuredly was; and if it may be plausibly hinted that he was a little lacking in the sagacity, originality, forecast, and efficient provision for the future, without which no human greatness is complete, it may yet be pleaded that such a rare combination of moral and intellectual excellence amply justified the writers of the seventeenth century in styling him ALFRED THE GREAT.

The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, the only really trustworthy authority. Asserius, de Rebus Gestis Eilfredi, from whom all biographies of Alfred are in large part drawn, of disputed authenticity, at best containing but a kernel of original matter [see the art. ASSER]; Alfred's Laws, in Thorpe's Collection; and Alfred's Works. No collected edition of these exists; but the Preface to St. Gregory's Pastorale has been three times published (by Archbishop Parker in 1574, by Camden in 1603, by Wise in 1722); the translation from Bede twice (at Cambridge, in 1643 and 1723); the translation from Boethius twice (at Oxford in 1698, and at London in 1829); Alfred's Will twice (at Oxford in 1788, and at London in 1838); his translation from Orosius once (at London in 1773); and of the Metres of Boethius once (at London in 1835). There is a Life of Alfred the Great by Dr. E. Pauli (translated by Wright, London, 1852).

Alfred (or ALURED) of Beverley, Treasurer of the Church of Beverley in the first half of the twelfth century, wrote nine books of Annales, which were first printed by Hearne, in 1716. A very large part of Alfred's work is mere compilation from Geoffrey of Monmouth and Henry of Huntington. It is evident, therefore, that he must have written at least as late as the year 1138—9, about which time the British History of Geoffrey is supposed to have appeared, and that the dates usually given for his death (1126 or 1136) are erroneous. It is probable that the Annales were written about 1143.

Alfric (ÆLFRIC), surnamed Abbas and Grammaticus, was an ecclesiastic of the tenth century, and the writer of numerous works in Anglo-Saxon. He received his early education from a secular or "mass-priest." He was a pupil of Ethelwold at Winchester, and he became Abbot of Evesham. Alfric's works, which include a grammar, a number of sermons, a treatise on astronomy (see Wright, Popular Treatises on Science during the Middle Ages), and some Canons, are interesting to the student of Anglo-Saxon literature, and have considerable importance as regards the state of the English Church in the tenth century both as to doctrine and discipline. The writer has often been confused with another ALFRIC or ÆLFRIC, Archbishop of Canterbury, who died during the closing years of the tenth century.

Alfred (ÆLFRED) the Etheling (d. 1036?), was the son of Ethelred II. and Emma. On the death of his father he fled to Normandy, where, together with his brother Edward (the Confessor), he seems to have remained till the reign of Harold, 1036, when, either alone or accompanied by Edward, he made an expedition to England for the purpose of obtaining the crown. He was entrapped, together with his Norman followers, by means of an ambuscade near Guildford, and conveyed to the monastery of Ely; by the orders of Harold, he was either blinded and died of the pain, or was actually murdered. The question whether Godwine had any share in this is a vexed one, but it is certain that he was at the time suspected of being an accomplice; and it was also suspected that Emma was privy to the treachery and violence which brought about the end of Alfred, in order that the crown might be assured to his half-brother Harthaknut.

Algar (ÆLFGAR) (d. 1062?), was the son of Earl Leofric, and the father of Edwin and Morkere. We first hear of him in 1051, when, on the triumph of the Norman party and outlawry of Harold, he received the earldom of East-Anglia. On Harold's return in the next year, Algar appears to have quietly resigned it to him, to resume it again in 1053, on the translation of Harold to Wessex. In 1055 Algar was banished. The reason for this treatment is doubtful; but he soon showed his unscrupulous and treacherous disposition by allying with Gruffydd of Wales, and ravaging Herefordshire. Harold was sent against them, and peace was quickly made, one of the conditions being that Algar should be restored to his earldom. In 1057, on his father's death, he succeeded to the earldom of Mercia. Outlawed again in 1058, he was once more restored to his earldom, and seems to have spent the latter years of his life in peace and good works. [HAROLD.]

Algiers, BOMBARDMENT OF (1816), was conducted by the English fleet in consequence of the ravages made by the Algerine pirates on the commerce and coasts of the Mediterranean. The work was entrusted to Lord Exmouth, who at first attempted by negotiations to unite the states of Barbary in an effort to suppress the pirates. In May, 1816, while Exmouth was absent in England, pending the result of his negotiations, 2,000 Algerine troops attacked the Italian coral-fishers, who were attending mass under the protection of the British flag, and massacred the whole of them. Exmouth at once set sail, with a force of five ships of the line, five frigates, and some bomb-vessels. At Gibraltar Lord Exmouth received a reinforcement from the Dutch admiral, Capellen, who desired to be allowed to join in the siege. On the 27th of August the fleet reached Algiers, and a messenger was at once despatched with an ultimatum to the Dey. This the Dey refused to receive, and Lord Exmouth, at once leading the way towards the harbour, anchored as close as possible to the mole, and opened fire. The battle lasted from two o'clock in the afternoon till ten o'clock, when, the batteries having been nearly all silenced, and fearful destruction wrought in the town, the British fleet ceased firing. Next day Lord Exmouth sent off a despatch, offering the Dey peace on the conditions of the ultimatum. The chief of these related to the abolition of the slave-trade for the future, and the immediate restitution of all Christian slaves without ransom. The conditions were immediately agreed to.

Alien Priorities. [MONASTICISM.]

Alienation of Land. [LAND, TENURE OF.]

Aliens. By our Common Law, nationality depends on the place of birth. Every one born in a land not subject to the sovereignty of this country was an alien. Jews also, though born in this kingdom, were regarded in the same light. [Jews.] This doctrine has been modified by statute. By 25 Ed. III., st. 2, all, whose father and mother at the time of their birth were in allegiance [ALLEGIANCE], were so far to be held natural-born subjects as to be capable of inheritance. And it was held that the nationality of the mother mattered not, if her husband was a British subject. Aliens could become subjects by denization, which conferred a kind of middle state between a natural-born subject and an alien. This position was sometimes obtained (temp. Hen. VIII.) by Act of Parliament, but as a rule by letters patent. Naturalisation was obtained only through Parliament until the reign of Queen Victoria. All children born in Scotland after the accession of James I. to the throne of England (post-nati) were held, by the decision in Calvin's case, to be natural-born subjects of England. [POST-NATI.] In the same reign it was determined (7 Jas. I., c. 2) that no alien should be naturalised until he had taken the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and conformed to the sacramental test. From a desire to strengthen the Protestant interest, an Act was passed (7 Anne, c. 6), naturalising all Protestant residents on their taking the oaths, &c., and declaring the children of all natural-born British subjects to be natural-born. This statute was repealed, as regards its earlier provision, shortly afterwards. Seven years' residence in the American colonies was made (13 Geo. II., c. 7) to confer naturalisation on a Protestant alien. During the war consequent on the French Revolution, various statutes were passed, as 33 Geo. III., c. 4, placing aliens under supervision, and giving the Secretary of State power to remove them, if suspected, out of the kingdom. The demand of the First Consul, in 1802, for the expulsion of the French emigrants was one of the causes which led to a renewal of the war. The 7 and 8 Vict., c. 66, allowed naturalisation to be conferred by the certificate of a Secretary of State. By the Naturalisation Act (33 and 34 Vict., c. 14), a woman, who has become an alien by a foreign marriage, may, after her husband's death, be re-admitted to nationality, in this case her children, though born of her alien husband, will also gain the position of British subjects. By naturalisation in a foreign state, British subjects are allowed to become aliens. This Act also provides for the grant of certificates of naturalisation to aliens who have resided within the kingdom, or served the crown, for five years, and for the grant of a limited nationality by the legislature of British colonies within their own borders. Aliens have been regarded with jealousy both for political and commercial reasons. During the fourteenth century they were often made the subjects of special taxation. By the Great Charter, art. 41, alien merchants were allowed to trade freely. The privileges of the mercantile statutes of Edward I. were extended to them. The king favoured them because they granted him customs. Parliament, however, interfered with these grants in 1303, and at other times. [CUSTOMS.] English merchants were jealous of these foreign competitors. In 18 Edward I. the citizens of London petitioned that they might be banished. This was refused. Vexatious restrictions were laid upon alien merchants in the reign of Richard III., and were increased by 32 Hen. VIII., c. 16. Aliens are subject to, and under the protection of, the criminal law. By express provision, they also are subject to, and have the advantages of, the Bankruptcy Acts. Aliens by the Common Law lay under great disabilities. An alien could not take nor transmit land by descent. He could not hold land either for his own benefit or in trust. Until 8 Hen. V., c. 16, the alien wife of an English subject could not demand her dower. Aliens might, however, hold benefices, for the Church was Catholic. An alien could not have an action for land in his own name, but he might have an action for personal property. His witness was received, but he could not serve on a jury, except on one partly composed of aliens for the trial of aliens (de medietate lingue). These disabilities have to a great extent been removed by statute. By 33 and 34 Vict., c. 14, an alien may acquire by inheritance or purchase. He may hold any kind of property in this kingdom, except a share in a British ship; and title to land may be derived from or through an alien. This Act, however, does not confer any right to hold property in land outside the United Kingdom, and provides that no property shall confer on an alien a qualification for franchise or public office.

Aligurh, CAPTURE OF (Aug. 29, 1803), occurred in General Lake's campaign against the Mahrattas. Aligurh, the great military arsenal of the French army of Dowlut Rao Scindiah, in Hindostan, was very strongly fortified, and further protected by a ditch, 100 feet wide, and 30 feet deep, containing 10 feet of water. General Lake, however, was determined to take it, and it was captured by the irresistible gallantry of the 76th Highlanders, commanded by Major Macleod, who blew open the gate, and forced their way in through the most intricate and loop-holed passages, raked by a destructive fire of grape, wall-pieces, and matchlocks. The number of guns captured was 281. The Duke of Wellington called it "one of the most extraordinary feats he had ever heard of."

Morad to obtain the office of rais, or lord paramount of Upper Scinde, then held by Meer Roostum, were the main causes which hastened on Sir Charles Napier's proceedings in Upper Scinde in the year 1842. He succeeded in obtaining at last the office of rais, and lands to the value of six lacs of rupees a year. The insurrection, however, which broke out in 1843, destroyed all his hopes and past success. The annexation of Scinde was accompanied by the banishment and pensioning of the Ameers. [SCINDE.]

Aliwall, BATTLE OF (Jan. 28, 1846), was fought during the first Sikh war. After his victory at Loodiana, Runjoor Singh fell back to Aliwall, on the Sutlej. General Smith, reinforced by 11,000 men, lost no time in attacking him. The village was feebly defended by some hill-men, who took to flight with Runjoor Singh at their head, after firing a few rounds. But the English met with a stern resistance from the Khalsa soldiers on the right, men of true Sikh blood and temper, who stood their ground with unflinching courage; and it was not till their ranks had thrice been pierced by Cureton's cavalry, that they became disorganised, and retreated to the river, in which a great number were drowned, leaving 67 guns as trophies to the victors.

Alkin the Scot (d. 834), of Pictish descent on his mother's side, in 832 was King of the Southern Picts. In 834 he was victorious at the Carse of Gowrie over the Picts, who disowned his authority; but on July 20 of the same year was defeated and slain by them at Pitalpin, near Dundee.

Alkmaar, CAPTURE OF (Oct. 2, 1799), was effected during the expedition of the Duke of York to Holland. On September 19 an unsuccessful attack had been made by the allied troops. Soon afterwards the Duke of York was strongly reinforced, and on October 2, with 30,000 men, he was ready to attack the equal forces of the French, under the command of Brune, whose position was centred at Alkmaar. The attack was begun at six a.m., by an impetuous charge of the Russians, which carried the villages of Schorl and Schorlдам, and drove the French back to Bergen. The Russians then halted, awaiting the arrival of Sir R. Abercromby on the right. With 9,000 men he had, since early morning, been steadily pushing his way along the sand-dyke on the seashore. Continually driving the French back, he was at length able to attack their left flank. The Russians, reassured by Abercromby's arrival, simultaneously attacked in front. The whole of the French left was thus turned, and, falling back in confusion on the centre, compelled Brune to abandon Alkmaar, which was at once occupied by the allies.

All the Talents, MINISTRY OF (1806), was the name given to the administration which was called into existence on the death of William Pitt. An attempt was made to include in the new government representatives of all the three parties—the Tories, the Moderate Whigs, and the Extreme Whigs, whose sympathies had all along been with France. Lord Grenville became Prime Minister; Fox, Foreign Secretary; Erskine, Lord Chancellor; Lord Fitzwilliam, President of the Council; Lord Sidmouth, Lord Privy Seal; Windham, Minister of War; and Lord Spencer, Home Secretary. Lord Ellenborough, the Lord Chief Justice, was admitted into the Cabinet—a most dangerous innovation to be made by a Liberal government. In spite of this imposing array of talent, the Cabinet was composed of elements much too discordant to admit of any permanent harmony; and Fox's early death removed the commanding mind which alone could possibly have held together men of such different views. One great measure was passed, which will always be associated with this ministry—viz., the abolition of the slave-trade. Little else of permanent interest was effected. Foreign politics were of too vital an importance to admit of any progress in domestic reform; and Fox himself devoted all his ability to negotiating a peace with France, and too late learned to gauge the restless ambition of Napoleon, with the result of being convinced that his long-cherished hope of peace was in vain. On March 25th, 1807, the ministry, which had been greatly weakened by the disaffection of some of its members, resigned office, on being required by the king not only to drop the Catholic Relief Bill they had brought in, but also to pledge themselves never to introduce any such measure in the future. They were succeeded by the administration in which the Duke of Portland was Prime Minister. [Fox, C. J.; GRENVILLE, LORD.]

Allahabad, the capital of the North-West Provinces of India, was one of the strong towns of the old Mogul dynasty. At the break-up of the Mogul empire it fell under the yoke of the Vizier of Oude, by whom it was ceded to the Company in 1766, and handed over to the dethroned Mogul Emperor, Shah Allum. In 1771 it was, however, handed to the Nawab of Oudh, by whom it was ceded back to the English in 1801. The town contains the remains of a magnificent palace of the Emperor Akbar.

Allectus (d. 296) was one of the officers of Carausius, whom he murdered in 293. Allectus then usurped the power in Britain, and governed the province in a very tyrannical manner till 296, when Constantius Chlorus invaded the country, and completely defeated the usurper, who was slain in the battle.

Allegiance (Lat. alligo, through Low Lat. ligancia, and Norm.-French, ligeance), means the tie which binds each man of a nation to its head in return for the protection allowed him. The idea of allegiance existed in England at an early date. The duties of the king towards the subject were expressed in the promise of Ethelred to govern righteously; those of the subject towards the king in the treason-law of Alfred, and in the laws of his son Edmund (about 943) we have the first recorded oath of allegiance. "All shall swear, in the name of the Lord, fealty to King Edmund as a man ought to be faithful to his lord, without any controversy or quarrel in open or in secret, in loving what he shall love, and not willing what he shall not will." It was to counteract the disruptive tendencies of feudalism, and to assert the royal power, that William I., at the Council of Salisbury, A.D. 1086, caused "all his witan and all the land-owners of substance, whose vassals soever they were," to swear an oath of allegiance to him, which in form was a modification of that of Edmund; and there is a clause directing every free man to take the oath in the so-called Laws of William. Nevertheless, from that date, inasmuch as ownership of land was the sign of the relations between ruler and subject, and all land was held of the king, the idea of allegiance became, as far as he was concerned, identified with those of fealty and homage, though the two last concerned in reality owners of land in the connection of vassal and lord, and had no necessary connection with kingship. This change is to be found in the oath of allegiance to Edward I., which was imposed on all over the age of fourteen. With the growth of the idea of loyalty and legitimacy under the Lancastrian and Yorkist kings, the theory became prominent among legal writers. Meanwhile another idea had been growing up—that of the oath of office; it was asserted in the reign of Henry III. by the Provisions of Oxford, and probably existed even earlier in the case of sheriffs and the king's councillors, and in the reign of Edward II. the Despencers were banished by Parliament for misapplication of allegiance. It was not, however, imposed by statute on all persons holding office until the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the promise then being "to be true and faithful to the king and his heirs, and truth and faith to bear of life and limb and terrene honour, and not to know or hear of any ill or damage intended him without defending him therefrom." This oath might be exacted when necessary from all persons over the age of twelve. James I. also imposed a special oath on Roman Catholics, in which he bound them to disclose conspiracies against him, in spite of any excommunication by the Pope, thus attacking his supposed deposing power. The oath of allegiance was imposed afresh after the Revolution by the Declaration of Right; but as the form enjoined by it differed from the form imposed by statute, it was determined, in 1689, to pass an Act abolishing the old oaths, and determining by whom the new oaths should be taken. The form agreed upon was much the same as that at present in use, but a violent controversy arose as to the class of men who should be required to take it. It was unanimously agreed that it should for the future be applied to all who were admitted to civil, military, or academical offices; but it was felt that to make it retrospective would be to make large bodies of the clergy, who believed in the doctrine of the divine right of kings, resign their livings. On this point the House of Lords and William III. were disposed to be merciful, and exempt the clergy from the oath; but the Commons refused to give way, and finally it was decided that all those who refused to take the oath by February, 1690, should be deprived of office. The forms of the oaths of abjuration and supremacy were also settled at the same date. A single oath was, however, substituted for the three in 1858, and in the same year this was adapted to the use of Catholics and Jews. By the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, the form of oath, that at present in use, was fixed as follows:—"I, A. B., do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to her Majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to the law. So help me, God!" It is imposed on all officers of state, holders of appointments in the Supreme Court of Judicature, and justices of the peace, though in some cases a simple affirmation is allowed; but members of Parliament, on whom the obligation to take the oath of allegiance was imposed in 1679, and again in 1714, now use a special form of oath provided by the Parliamentary Oaths Act of 1866.

Alleluia Victory, THE (429 ?), is the name given to a victory of the Britons over the Picts and Saxons. The story, as told by Bede (who copies from Constantius, Sancit. Germani Vita), is that the Britons, being attacked by the combined forces of the Picts and Saxons, sought the aid of S. Germanus. The saint accordingly, after the celebration of Easter, placed himself at the head of the Britons, and drew up his troops in a valley encompassed by hills, in the way by which the enemy was expected. As soon as the foes appeared, Germanus, bearing in his hands the standard, instructed his men to repeat his words in a loud voice, and as the enemy advanced securely, thinking to take them by surprise, the men cried three times aloud, "Alleluia!" The enemy, struck with terror, fled in disorder. Thus the Britons gained a bloodless victory. The scene of this battle is laid at Maes Garmon (the Field of Germanus), about a mile from Mold, in Flintshire.

Allen, ETHAN (d. 1789), was a celebrated partisan leader in the American Independence War. He established the little state of Vermont, whose individuality he successfully vindicated, and formed a corps of irregulars, "The Green Mountain Boys," which greatly distinguished itself. Allen took a chief share in the capture of Ticonderoga and Crown Point in 1775, but in the expedition to Canada he was captured by the British. He was subsequently exchanged, and received several marks of distinction from Congress.

Allen, JOHN (b. 1476, d. 1534), had been Archbishop Warham's agent at Rome, and was afterwards employed by Wolsey in visiting the smaller monasteries, with a view to their suppression. In 1528 he was made Archbishop of Dublin and Chancellor of Ireland. In these capacities he headed the opposition to the Earl of Kildare. In 1534 he was seized by Kildare's orders, and brutally murdered.

Allen (or ALLAN), CARDINAL WILLIAM (b. 1532, d. 1594), was at one time Principal of St. Mary Hall, Oxford, and Canon of York during the reign of Mary. In 1568 he established a seminary at Douay, in order to train priests for England. Subsequently he founded a college at Rheims, and another at Rome. Becoming closely connected with the Jesuits, he entered into various schemes for the subversion of Elizabeth's throne, and advocated a Spanish invasion of England. In 1580, by his aid, a number of Jesuits were dispatched to England to prepare the people for rebellion; and, until the destruction of the Spanish Armada, Allen continued to inveigh against Elizabeth in the most virulent terms. In 1587 he was made a cardinal by the Pope, in acknowledgment of his services to the Roman Catholic cause, and received a rich abbey from the King of Spain. In 1588 he published at Antwerp his violent and scurrilous pamphlet against Queen Elizabeth, entitled An Admonition to the People of England (q.v.). Allen was created Archbishop of Malines in 1591, but the remainder of his life was passed at Rome. Besides the Admonition, his chief

[GRAND ALLIANCE; HOLY ALLIANCE, &c.]

Alma, BATTLE OF THE (Sept. 20, 1854), fought during the Crimean War. After their landing at Eupatoria, the allies marched southwards along the coast, meeting with no resistance. The allied army consisted of 27,000 English, 22,000 French, and 5,000 Turks. Prince Mentschikoff, the Russian general, had determined not to allow them to march without opposition on Sebastopol. He entrenched himself strongly on the heights which overlook the river Alma, about sixteen miles to the north of Sebastopol, with the river between him and the foe. The allies came up under a heavy fire, forced their way through the river, and struggled bravely up to the Russian entrenchments, which, after a slight momentary waver along the whole line, they carried at the point of the bayonet. The Russians retreated slowly, with their usual dogged persistency, in spite of their heavy losses. The allies were too much fatigued and too weak in cavalry to be able to follow up the advantage they had gained. The victory was in great part due to the determined advance of the British up the height in the face of a terrible fire.

Almanza, BATTLE OF (April 25, 1707), was one of the battles of the Succession War in Spain. Peterborough, who had been most successful, was superseded by Lord Galway, an experienced veteran, "who thought it much more honourable to fail according to rule than to succeed by innovation." On the plain of Almanza he encountered the French, under the Duke of Berwick. As Berwick was stronger than the allies in cavalry, it was rash in Galway to act on the offensive; but he wished to drive the French from Valencia. Berwick had drawn up his troops with his infantry and artillery in the centre, and his cavalry on the flanks. The English commander committed the grave mistake of drawing up his infantry in line close in the rear of his cavalry. Galway's attack on the French right was at first successful, and the French centre was for a moment driven back. On the right of the allies the Portuguese cavalry, under the Marquis de los Minas, as usual turned and fled; their infantry were assailed at once on the flank and in front, and thus completely routed, they were compelled to surrender. The victory was decisive and important. Valencia and Arragon were at once reconquered by the French. "The battle of Almanza," says Macaulay, "decided the fate of Spain."

Almenara, BATTLE OF (July 10, 1710), resulted in a victory for the allied armies in Spain. Through the month of June the two armies were engaged in marches and manoeuvres. At length General Stanhope overruled the scruples of his colleague, the Imperial general, Staremberg, and advanced across the Segre. He also secured the passage of the Noguera, the Spanish general being too late to intercept him. The two armies were face to face near the village of Almenara. Staremberg was still averse to an engagement; but the spirits of the English regiments had been roused by the sight of the enemy, and they murmured loudly at their forced inactivity. At length, two hours before nightfall, Stanhope obtained permission from the Archduke Charles to attack some Spanish regiments who had advanced in a spirit of bravado. He charged at the head of the cavalry. "The allied squadrons on the right had easy work in routing the left wing of the enemy; but opposed to the English and Dutch was the splendid body-guard of Philip, regiments of picked soldiers, not inferior in courage or discipline to the renowned household troops of the French king." A furious struggle ensued, Stanhope himself slaying the commander of the Spanish cavalry. The king's troops at length gave way, and had a few hours of daylight remained it is probable that the whole army would have been destroyed. Philip hastily retired on Lerida, and fell back first to the line of the Cintra, and then to the line of the Ebro.

Almon, JOHN (b. 1738, d. 1805), after an adventurous career in early life, became acquainted with Churchill and Wilkes, and published a defence of Wilkes's "Essay on Woman." In 1763 he set up as bookseller and publisher. He published "The Foundling Hospital for Wit," a collection of party squibs, and "The Parliamentary Register," an account of the debates in Parliament. In 1765 he was tried in the Court of King's Bench for publishing a pamphlet, "On Juries, Libels, &c.;" and in 1770 he was again tried for publishing Junius's Letter to the King, and was fined ten marks. He amassed a large fortune in his trade, much of which he lost by an unfortunate newspaper enterprise. To add to his misfortunes, he was again prosecuted for libel, and afterwards was proclaimed an outlaw. The rigour of the law, however, was soon relaxed, and he retired once more to his villa at Boxmoor, from which, in 1792, he sent forth a work called "Anecdotes of the Life of the Earl of Chatham." In 1805, he published "The Life and Letters of Mr. Wilkes." He died on the same day as Woodfall, the publisher of Junius.

Almorah, CAPTURE OF (April 25, 1815), took place in the Goorkha War. Colonel Gardner, with a body of irregular troops, occupied the Chilkeeah pass, and proceeded to Almorah, the capital of the province of Kumaon, along the Cosillas river. The Goorkhas withdrew as he advanced. Being reinforced by 2,000 regulars, under Colonel Nicolls, on April 25 the heights and town of Almorah were attacked with rapid success. Two of the enemy's breastworks on the Sittolee ridge were carried by the regular infantry, and the irregular troops attacked and carried the remaining three. During the night an unsuccessful attempt was made to dispossess the victors of their advantage. In the morning the fort was vigorously attacked, and by nine in the evening the Goorkha commander agreed to terms, by which the province and fortresses of Kumaon were surrendered to the English. [GOORKHA WAR.]

Alnwick, in 1093, withstood a severe siege from Malcolm Canmore, of Scotland, who was slain before its walls. In 1135 it was taken by David, of Scotland. In 1174 it was besieged by William the Lion, who was taken prisoner in a battle fought under the walls. In 1215 Alnwick was destroyed by John. In 1310 it passed into the hands of the Percies. In Northumberland's rebellion in 1403, the castle was temporarily seized by the king; and about the middle of the fifteenth century it was burnt by the Scots. During the rebellion of the Northern lords, in 1569, it was fortified by the Earl of Northumberland for the insurgents. Alnwick Abbey was a priory of Premonstratensian canons, founded by Eustace Fitz-John, and richly endowed by the De Vescies and the Percies.

Alodial Land is land which is the absolute property of its occupier, and is not held by rent, service, or other obligation from a superior. The "alod," which name occurs in Anglo-Saxon documents of the eleventh century, and in its Latinised form, is found in the Salian and other Continental codes and documents, was land held in full ownership, whether derived by inheritance, or created from the public land by grant or charter. In the latter case, as deriving its title from some book or document, it was called Bocland (q.v.). In England, as in other countries which came under the effects of feudalism, the smaller alodial proprietors found themselves practically obliged, for the sake of security and protection, to commend themselves to some neighbouring lord, surrendering their lands to him, and receiving them back again on some feudal tenure. Thus the alodial land tended to disappear, and in England the process received a great impetus by the Norman Conquest, and the theoretical transfer of all land to the crown, which followed. According to the theory of English law, there is therefore no alodial land in Great Britain and Ireland, all land being occupied by tenure, and held either directly or indirectly from the crown.

The derivation of alod has been much discussed. Grimm, Deutsch. Wörterbuch, associates it with the root od, wealth, found in A.S. ead, and Lat. ops; others take it as connected with lot, and as meaning primarily that which is obtained by lot, or division of the original tribal land. It is not improbable that there is a connection between alod and odal, or edhal, the word signifying inheritance, and specially the inherited homestead, with "the share of arable and appurtenant common rights" (Prof. Stubbs), and which also came to mean nobility of blood and race. Alphege (ÆLFHEAH), St. (b. 954, d. 1012), Archbishop of Canterbury (1006—1012), was of noble birth, and early in life became a monk. He is said to have been Abbot of Glastonbury, and was certainly advanced to the bishopric of Winchester in 984. In 1006 he was made Archbishop of Canterbury. On the capture of Canterbury by the Danes in 1012, Alphege was taken prisoner, in the expectation that he would ransom himself with some of the treasure of his see. On his refusal to pay them anything, the Danes dragged the archbishop to their hustings, or place of assembly, where they pelted him with stones, logs of wood, and the bones and skulls of oxen, till one Thrum, whom Alphege had converted, clave his head with a battle-axe. He was considered a martyr by the English, and Anselm contended that he had a right to the title; because he died refusing to plunder his people in order to ransom himself. The English Church celebrates St. Alphege on April 19.

Alred (EALHRED), King of Northumbria, succeeded to the throne in the year 765, on the resignation of Ethelwald. After a troublous reign of nine years, he was compelled to renounce the throne, and seek refuge with the Picts.

Alresford, FIGHT AT (March 29, 1644), was between the Royalists, under the Earl of Brentford and Sir Ralph Hopton, and the Parliamentary forces under Sir William

Waller. The latter were victorious, though the severe losses they sustained prevented Waller from taking advantage of his victory.

Alured, JOHN (b. 1607, d. 1653 ?), served as colonel of a regiment under Fairfax. He was member for Heydon in the Long Parliament, acted as one of the king's judges, and signed the death-warrant. His brother, Matthew Alured, also served in the Parliamentary army.

Alyth. A small town on the slopes of the Grampians, fifteen miles north-west of Dundee, where the last remnant of the Scots Estates, some forty in number, who called themselves "The Committee of Estates," assembled in September, 1651, after the storming of Dundee by Monk. They were surprised and captured by a party of cavalry sent by Monk, and were conveyed to London. With them the existence of the Scots Estates came to an end for the time.

Amatola Mountain, BATTLE OF THE (1846), was fought between the British and Cape forces, under Colonels Campbell and Somerset, and the Kaffirs, under Sandilli. The latter were completely routed, although shortly afterwards they managed to capture the English baggage-wagons.

Ambassadors. Different ranks and titles exist among the diplomatic representatives of states. Ambassadors hold the first place. Next below them are Envoys and Ministers Plenipotentiary. In the third rank are Residents and Chargés d'Affaires. The distinction between these classes is one of dignity, and depends on the nature of their commission, or the fulness of the representative character with which the agent is invested by his court. This representative character exists in perfection in the office of an ambassador. There is, however, no distinction between these agents as to their rights and privileges. From the time when England, by the conversion of its people, became part of European Christendom, its sovereigns have from time to time sent embassies to other lands, and received the representatives of their rulers. While, however, the mediæval system continued, and Christendom was regarded as one body politic under the Emperor and the Pope, the mission of ambassadors was occasional, and unregulated by law. As the mediæval polity gave place to a system of independent states, the matter of ambassadors received the attention of jurists. Ambassadors were at first sent only on special occasions. Long residence was regarded with jealousy by the state which received the embassy, e.g., Coke praises Henry VII. because he was too prudent to allow ambassadors to reside within his realm. This feeling died out in the seventeenth century. After the Peace of Westphalia, 1648, resident ambassadors were generally employed by most of the nations of the civilised world. Ambassadors may therefore be classed as either ordinary, resident, or extraordinary. Every sovereign state has a right to send and receive ambassadors, unless it has renounced that right. Mazarin, in 1659, received the ambassadors of Oliver Cromwell at the Congress of the Pyrenees, and rejected those sent by Charles II. A prince who has lost his sovereignty cannot claim to be represented by an ambassador; and so far at least the civilians of Elizabeth were right when, in 1567, they refused to recognise the Bishop of Ross, the agent of the Queen of Scots, as an ambassador. The right of rebels to embassy must be decided by circumstances. To avoid difficulty, a foreign country in such cases sometimes receives from an insurgent state agents invested with the immunities, but not with the representative character of ambassadors. The right to do this was asserted by Lord Russell, in 1661, in the Trent affair. A state cannot reasonably refuse to receive an embassy, though it may make an objection to receive any particular ambassador. In 1625, Louis XIII., not without reason, refused to receive the Duke of Buckingham as ambassador of Charles I. The right of inviolability attaches to all ministers representing their sovereign or their state, not only in the country to which a representative is sent, but in any other through which he may have to pass. In 1587, Aubepine, the French ambassador, was found to have been privy to a plot against the life of the queen. Burleigh, however, did not bring him to trial because of his right as an ambassador. The inviolability of an ambassador extends to his suite. It is doubtful, however, whether in this case it is equally full in respect of gross crimes. For, in 1654, Dom Pantaleon Sa, brother of the Portuguese ambassador, was executed in London for murder. He pleaded that he was accredited as an ambassador, but could show no credentials. Had he been able to prove that he was a representative of his sovereign, he might have escaped. Certain privileges of ambassadors are established by custom. An ambassador is exempt from civil jurisdiction, unless, indeed, he so far forget his character as to engage in trade. In consequence of this exemption having been violated in 1708, in the case of an ambassador of the Czar, it has been enforced by our municipal law, 7 Anne, c. 12. An ambassador is also exempt from taxation, and enjoys other like immunities. Akin to these was the privilege of asylum attaching to his house, which is now generally renounced. An ambassador receives instructions from his own government, and carries with him credentials to the government to which he is sent. He also carries the full power, which is his authority for negotiation. After he has delivered his letters of credence to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, he has a right to an audience of the sovereign to whom he is accredited. The death of either of the sovereigns between whom he negotiates ends his embassy. He may, however, be re-accredited; and if this is likely to be the case, his embassy is held to be suspended, and relations are continued in the expectation of confirmation.

Amboyna, one of the Molucca Islands, was captured by the Dutch, from the Portuguese, in 1607. The English, after having been expelled from Amboyna by the Dutch, obtained in 1619 the right of trading there. The treaty was badly kept on both sides; and in February, 1623, the Dutch tortured to death several of the English factors, under pretence that they had intrigued with the natives. In 1654, after the war with Holland, the Dutch agreed to pay a sum of £300,000 to the descendants of the victims, as compensation for the massacre. Amboyna has since this been twice captured by the English—in 1796, and again in 1810—but on both occasions subsequent treaties of peace restored it to Holland.

Ambrosius Aurelianus (d. circa. 450) is said to have been a prince of the Damnonii, and appears to have been the chief leader of the Britons against the English invaders under Hengist. He was very probably a rival of Vortigern—whom he is said to have defeated in battle—and the representative of the Roman party in Britain. According to Gildas, he was "a modest man, who, of all the Roman nation, was then alone in the confusion of this troublous time left alive. His parents, who for their merit were adorned with the purple, had been slain in these same broils." Geoffrey of Monmouth makes him the brother of Uther Pendragon and father of Arthur, and states that he built Stonehenge.

Amcer Khan, a Rohilla adventurer and free-lance, joined Jeswant Rao Holkar in his plunder of the territories of Scindiah and the Peishwa. During the Holkar War (1804) he waged a predatory warfare against the English and their allies. The conclusion of the second Treaty of Surje Anjengaoon drove Amcer Khan and Holkar westward to Ajmere, where they led a predatory life, until Holkar was compelled to yield by Lord Lake. The Treaty of Rampoor Ghaut left Amcer Khan free to live at the expense of the Rajpoot princes, whom he plundered with great impartiality, and gradually proceeded to create a principality for himself. He became the recognised chief of the Pathans in India. In 1809 he crossed the Nerbudda with 40,000 horse and 24,000 Pindarries, entered the Nagpore state, and sacked the town of Jubbulpore. The English, however, interfered, ordered him to quit the country of their ally, and put an army in motion to enforce it; when Amcer Khan withdrew to Indore. During the Pindarrie war he brought 52 battalions of trained infantry into the field; but his army and his influence were alike destroyed by the British victories and the vigorous policy of Lord Hastings. He, however, founded a dynasty at Tonk, in Rajpootana, and his Mohammedan descendant still exists as a protected prince, in consequence of a treaty made in 1817, which confirmed his jaghire to him.

American Independence, DECLARATION OF (July 4, 1776), was a manifesto issued by the representatives of the thirteen United Colonies assembled in Congress, and signed by all of them but one. The original draft was the work of Thomas Jefferson of the State of Virginia, which had in the preceding May issued a Declaration of Rights, and the alterations made were only matters of detail. It began with an imaginary picture of "natural" society, and an assertion of the original rights of man. The inference it drew from the hypotheses was that man has a right to upset any form of government which violates these "natural" conditions. The Declaration went on to enumerate "the repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States." The last paragraph sums up the position which the colonies claimed to hold in the future: "We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general Congress assembled, appealing to the supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." Jefferson, in his indictment of George III., had inserted a paragraph, charging him with waging "cruel war against human nature itself" by encouraging the slave-trade. This clause, however, was struck out, on account of the disapproval expressed by some of the Southern members; and thus Congress committed itself to the inconsistency of asserting in one paragraph that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; while in the rest of the Declaration it tacitly recognised, since it did not prohibit, the slave-trade. "The Declaration," says Bancroft, "was not only the announcement of the birth of a people, but the establishment of a national government. The war was no longer a civil war;

Britain was become to the United States a foreign country. Every former subject of the British king in the thirteen colonies now owed primary allegiance to the dynasty of the people, and became a citizen of the new Republic. Except in this, everything remained as before.⁴ In the history of political thought, the Declaration has an important place. It embodied in a formal state-paper some of those theories on the equality of man, and the origin and character of human society, which were thrown into a popular shape by Rousseau. And the influence which this enunciation of the freedom and equality of all men exerted on the European peoples was immediate and profound, as well as lasting. The Americans largely owed their political theories to France; but the Declaration of Independence gave form and expression to the theories, and was thus a distinct step in the direction of that attempt to realise certain a priori political theories which formed one element in the French Revolution.

American Independence. WAR OF (1775—1783). For some time before the spring of 1775 the relations between the colonies and the mother-country were such that they were in a state of virtual hostility. Actual warfare began in April, 1775, when the first blood was shed at Lexington, near Boston. Colonel Smith had been sent to destroy a magazine at that place, but was met by unexpected opposition. He succeeded only partially, and after a long and desultory skirmish retreated with considerable loss. In the north, Fort Ticonderoga, on Lake Champlain, was surprised; and its garrison surrendered the fort and its copious stores. On May 10, the Congress assembled for its second session at Philadelphia, and prepared for war by voting 15,000 men as the "continental" army. While it was still sitting, an English fleet appeared in Boston Roads, and its arrival was the signal for General Gage to declare martial law. On June 17 was fought the battle of Bunker's Hill, which had been occupied by the Americans, and was carried on the third assault by the British troops, with great loss of life. Washington arrived soon after the battle to take command, and found the difficulty of the situation increased by want of ammunition and the insubordination of the men. The English were masters of the sea, and held Boston and Charleston, but were surrounded by the blockading lines of Washington. After the battle, Penn carried to England the Olive Branch Petition, the last attempt at reconciliation on the part of America. In the meantime an expedition was sent to Canada, which proved a total failure, and sacrificed many valuable American lives. In Virginia, Lord Dunmore exasperated public opinion by his many cruelties, and by offering inducements to the slaves to join the British side. Howe evacuated his position in March, and while he sent Clinton to co-operate with the fleet at Charleston, in Carolina, he himself threatened New York from Sandy Hook. The attack on Charleston was gallantly repulsed; and Clinton brought back his division to take part in the operations against New York. On July 4, the American Congress adopted the Declaration of Independence. The attack on New York was long delayed; but on August 27, the British troops drove the defenders from Long Island; and it was only Howe's dilatoriness that allowed Washington to withdraw unmolested from New York. The English withdrew into winter quarters, and left Washington free to take advantage of their inactivity by surprising the garrison of Trenton, and soon afterwards acquiring nearly all New Jersey by winning a decisive battle at Princeton. Howe remained idle till June, 1777, when he organised a threefold expedition, which was so far successful that after defeating Washington at Brandywine Creek, in September, he advanced unopposed into Philadelphia. "It is not General Howe that has taken Philadelphia; it is Philadelphia that has taken General Howe," said Franklin; and so it proved. While Washington passed the winter in his camp at Valley Forge, with resources gradually dwindling, his forces weakened by privations, fevers, and insubordination, and himself harassed by the petty jealousies of the government and his own officers, Philadelphia became "the Capua of the British army." Meanwhile, in New York State, Clinton captured Forts Clinton and Montgomery, on the Hudson; but he did not advance fast enough to co-operate with Burgoyne, who was advancing from Canada. On August 16, a detached division of his force had been destroyed at Bennington, and Burgoyne himself, after being defeated at Stillwater, on September 19, was compelled to capitulate, with 3,500 men, at Saratoga, on Oct. 16. The immediate result of Saratoga was a treaty between France and America, which was virtually a declaration of war by France against England. In June, Clinton, who had succeeded Sir William Howe as commander-in-chief, evacuated Philadelphia and retreated on New York. Washington opposed his march at Monmouth, and finished a severe contest master of the field, but not strong enough to offer any further resistance. In the north, operations were at a standstill through the embarrassed condition of both commanders, and the interest of the war centred in the south. In December, Savannah was taken by Colonel Campbell; and in January, 1779, Lower Georgia was reduced by Colonel Prevost. In February, South Carolina was overrun, and Charleston was again threatened by the British, who spent the summer in alienating by their ravages, the few loyalists that remained. In September a combined French and American force failed to take Savannah. In the meantime, Washington had tided over his difficulties by maintaining a strictly defensive attitude. A large armament sent by Massachusetts to destroy a British outpost in Penobscot Bay was signally defeated and almost destroyed. In October, 1779, Rhode Island was evacuated, and Clinton carried the troops, thus set free, to the attack of Charleston. It was not, however, till May, 1780, that General Lincoln surrendered the town. Clinton returned to New York, leaving 5,000 men with Lord Cornwallis, who by the end of June reported that all resistance was at an end in Georgia and South Carolina. But strenuous efforts were made to save the South, and General Gates, with strong reinforcements, met Lords Cornwallis and Rawdon at Camden, on August 16, and was signally defeated, with heavy loss. A small detachment, under Sumpter, was also cut to pieces by Colonel Tarleton's cavalry, and the American army of the South seemed to be annihilated. But the severity of Cornwallis and Rawdon had alienated the population, and the inhabitants rose on all sides to oppose the advance of the former into North Carolina. During the winter Washington and Clinton maintained a passive attitude, each watching the other, and neither strong enough to take the offensive; and Washington's difficulties were increased by the disaffection of the troops, who had received no pay for ten months. On March 1, 1781, a crisis was averted by the signing of the Articles of Confederation, which united all the States by a common bond of union. In the South, Greene, who had succeeded Gates, put a new aspect on the war. In January, 1781, he defeated Tarleton at the Cowpens; but, notwithstanding, Cornwallis assumed the offensive, and advanced northwards. Greene retreated 200 miles before Cornwallis, who was gradually leaving his base of supplies farther and farther in his rear. On March 15, Greene gave him battle at Guildford Court House, and after a fierce struggle was driven from his position, but Cornwallis was so weakened that he retreated to Wilmington, though in April he again advanced to Petersburg, in Virginia. Meanwhile, Greene had organised a combined movement against South Carolina and Georgia. He himself was attacked and defeated by Lord Rawdon, who, however, was compelled by the simultaneous advance of Lee and Marion to retire to Charleston, and the greater part of South Carolina was again in American hands. In September the battle of Eutaw Springs ended in a victory for the English, which was as disastrous as a defeat; and the British forces in the South were henceforth pent up in Wilmington, Charleston, and Savannah.

From Petersburg Cornwallis had pursued Lafayette, who continued to elude him; but in the beginning of August, in obedience to orders from Clinton, he withdrew with his army to Yorktown, where he strongly fortified himself. At the same time a large French force joined Washington, and a southward march was begun. On August 31, De Grasse arrived with a French fleet in Chesapeake Bay, and a few days later beat off the English under Admiral Graves. On Sept. 28, the whole army had completely invested Yorktown; and on Oct. 19, 1781, Cornwallis surrendered, with all his army and supplies. In March, 1782, Rockingham again became prime minister; and by Shelburne, one of the new secretaries of state, Sir Guy Carleton was at once sent out to supersede Clinton, and prosecute conciliatory measures. Franklin had been carrying on negotiations at Paris; but the American commissioners persisted in their proposals, until it was discovered that Franklin was playing a double game. The intrigues of the loyalists, together with the wretched condition of the American army, brought matters to a crisis, and on Nov. 30 preliminary articles of peace were signed. On Dec. 5, the king announced his tardy and reluctant consent to the independence of the American colonies. In April, 1783, Congress, beset by the numerous discontents in the army, and threatened by mutineers, issued a proclamation for cessation of hostilities. On Sept. 3 treaties were ratified, but various arrangements remained to be carried out, and it was not Nov. 25, 1783, that the British troops evacuated New York. The war had cost America little under £50,000,000, but she had gained independence at a price that was not too dear. Its result to England was the loss of half the continent and the addition of 115 millions to the national debt.

American War (1812—1815), as out of the severe action of England towards neutral vessels in the war against Bonaparte, America, to retaliate, adopted England's policy and laid an embargo upon all trade with France and England. Some arrangements were attempted in 1809; but it was impossible effect any permanent conciliation as long as England adhered to the Orders in Council of 1807, and Brougham's motion for their repeal came too late to avert the war. The war, which was declared without any great unanimity on the part of Congress, in June, 1812, was at first almost entirely confined to combats between detached frigates, in which the Americans were generally successful, and to attempts by the Americans on Canada, which always ended in failure. The cause of the English want of success in the naval actions was in some degree, no doubt, due to the excellence of their enemies' seamanship, and the picked crews they obtained by enlisting English deserters; but it was also partly owing to the superior size and armaments of the American frigates, which were in reality almost equivalent to the smaller ships of the line. The most celebrated of these detached actions, that between the Cheapeake and the Shannon, is well described by Alison, Hist. of Europe, chap. xci. England carried on the war in a very desultory manner, until the close of the campaign in the south of France set free the Peninsular veterans, many of whom were shipped straight from Bordeaux to America. In the meantime, negotiations had been entered into at Ghent, which continued for more than twelve months before they resulted in the conclusion of peace. A large fleet, under Admiral Cockburn, was despatched with the Peninsular troops, under General Ross, to make a combined attack by sea and land on the Chesapeake River. The expedition completely succeeded in the capture of Washington, the chief public buildings of which city were destroyed. A combined sea and land attack was made upon Plattsburg on Lake Champlain; but the flotilla, unaided by Sir George Prevost, who commanded the troops, was annihilated, and the enterprise had to be abandoned. A projected attack on Baltimore was also given up; but the State of Maine was almost entirely in the hands of the British. An expedition on a large scale was undertaken against New Orleans, under General Pakenham. Natural difficulties, greatly increased by the energy and ability of the American commander, General Jackson, met the armament at every turn, but were at length overcome by the alacrity of the men; and on the 8th Jan., 1815, an assault was made. This was conspicuous no less for the intrepid gallantry of the troops on both sides, which caused a terrible loss of life, including that of Sir E. Pakenham, than for the utter mismanagement and want of unity among the English commanders. The assault was delivered in a number of separate attacks on different points, which failed from want of co-operation and neglect of the most simple details. So great was the loss of the British that General Lambert, who had succeeded to the command, felt it desirable to withdraw. Had means of communication been more rapid in those days, this useless bloodshed would have been averted, since already, on the previous 24th Dec., a convention had been signed at Ghent. This convention was merely a compromise, which left undecided all the chief points on which the two countries were at issue. The rights of neutrals were not touched upon, and the question of the frontier line between Canada and the United States was reserved for future negotiation.

Amherst, Jeffery, LORD (b. 1717, d. 1797), as aide-de-camp to General Ligonier, was present at Dettingen and Fontenoy, and fought under the Duke of Cumberland at Hastenbeck. In 1766 he was appointed to command the 15th Regiment of Foot, and two years later became major-general. In 1768 he was sent to America, and, acting in co-operation with Admiral Boscawen, effected the capture of Louisburg, the capital of Cape Breton. In the following year, in conjunction with General Prideaux, Sir E. Johnson, and Wolfe, he took Ticonderoga. In 1760 he reduced Montreal after a long and difficult navigation, taking the fort of Isle Royale on his way. Shortly afterwards he planned a successful expedition for the recovery of Newfoundland. In 1761 he was created a Knight of the Bath, and appointed Commander-in-chief and Governor-General in America. In 1770 he was appointed Governor of Guernsey, and Lieutenant-General of the Ordnance. In 1776 he was raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Amherst of Holmesdale. Shortly afterwards he was made Commander-in-chief, and in that capacity quelled the riots of 1780, but was compelled to resign in 1782. He was again appointed in 1793, and accepted the rank of field-marshal in 1796. Amherst was a firm disciplinarian, but was much beloved by his men. He was a commander of some tactical ability, and always showed dauntless courage on the field of battle.

Gentleman's Magazine, 1797; Stanhope, Hist. of England.

Amherst, William Pitt, 1st EARL (b. 1773, d. 1857), was the eldest son of Lieutenant-General Amherst, brother of the first Lord Amherst. On the death of the latter in 1797, he succeeded to the title. In 1816 he was appointed Ambassador-Extraordinary to the Emperor of China. On reaching the precincts of the imperial palace at Peking, and refusing to submit to the humiliating ceremonies of the emperor's court, he was refused admission to the presence of the emperor, and his mission was thus rendered useless. On his return voyage, the vessel he was in was wrecked off the island of Pulo Leat, from which he proceeded, accompanied by Sir Henry Ellis, in the boats of the wrecked ship to Batavia. He was subsequently appointed Governor-General of India, and landed in Calcutta, 1823. He had no sooner assumed the government than he found himself involved in hostile discussions with the Burmese, which terminated within five months in a declaration of war. After two campaigns, the first Burmese War ended in the Treaty of Yandaboo. The progress of the Burmese War also gave rise to the Barrackpore Mutiny, which was violently suppressed, and to several seditious manifestations in India. The Governor-General was created Earl Amhurst of Aracan in 1826. [BURMESE WAR.]

Amhurst, Nicholas (d. 1742), was a writer of satires and political papers of considerable ability. He published a caustic series of papers in 1726 under the title, Terræ Filius, intended as a satire on the University of Oxford. After quitting Oxford, Amhurst devoted himself to political journalism, attaching himself to the opponents of Walpole. He conducted The Craftsman, a political journal, to which Bolingbroke and Pulteney contributed largely. Amhurst was, however, neglected by his influential friends, and died in poverty and distress.

Amiens, Miss of (January 23, 1264), was the award pronounced by Louis IX. of France, to whom the question as to the obligation of Henry III. to observe the Provisions of Oxford had been referred, on Dec. 16, 1263. Since 1261 the baronial party had been reduced by desertions, and distracted by Prince Edward's dereliction of their cause in 1262, and by disputes and jealousies among themselves. This, with the fear of Louis openly supporting Henry III. with troops, explains their forced assent to an arbitration which, from Louis' character and frequent services to Henry, could only issue one way. Influenced by his strong views as to the kingly office, and by the authority of the papal bull, possibly also by the negotiations already on foot for the papal appointment of his brother Charles to the crown of Naples, Louis, after some days' hearing of the pleadings on either side, and perhaps some hesitation, decided completely for his brother sovereign, annulled the Provisions of Oxford, especially as to the employment of aliens in England and the royal appointment of sheriffs; but after all left to the barons a loophole in declaring that his decision was not to annul any of the ancient charters or liberties of the realm. In March the warfare broke out which ended for the time in Simon's victory at Lewes. Similar arbitrations were frequent about this period: even the day before Lewes, the barons offered to submit all, save the aliens question, to a new body of arbitrators; and a striking political song of the time shows the general feeling, even in the national party, that some compromise must be accepted. The award had the effect of still further reducing and weakening Simon de Montfort's party.

The documents connected with this event are given in Père Daniel, Histoire de France; Rishanger, Chronicle (Camden Society); Stubbs, Select Charters. See also the Liber de Antiquis Legibus; the Royal Letters (Rolls Series); Rymer's Federa; and Wright's Political Songs (Rolls Series). Amiens, Treaty of (March 25, 1802), between England and France, put an end for the time to the great war which had lasted since 1793. The mutual losses during the preceding years, the complete supremacy of the English fleet, and the blow given to the northern alliance by the battle of Copenhagen, and, on the other hand, the defeats inflicted on England's Continental ally, Austria, in 1800, and the Treaty of Luneville, which she concluded with France, Feb. 9, 1801, led both governments to desire a cessation of hostilities. The treaty was the work of the Addington ministry. In the previous October the preliminaries had been agreed to and signed, but some troublesome negotiations had to be gone through, before it was finally ratified at Amiens, by Lord Cornwallis on the part of England, and by Joseph Bonaparte, assisted by Talleyrand, for France. According to it, England gave up all its conquests but Trinidad and Ceylon. The Cape of Good Hope was restored to the Dutch, but was to be a free port. Malta was to go back to the Knights of St. John, under the guarantee of one of the great powers. "Cet article est le plus important de tout le traité, mais aucune des conditions qu'il renferme n'a été exécutée; et il est devenu le prétexte d'une guerre qui s'est renouvelée en 1803, et a duré sans interruption jusqu'en 1814" (Histoire des Traités, vi. 149). Porto Ferrajo was to be evacuated. On the other hand, the Republic of the Ionian Islands was acknowledged; the French were to withdraw from Naples and the Roman States; the integrity of Portugal was to be guaranteed; Egypt was to be restored to the Porte; and, finally, the Newfoundland fisheries were to be placed on the same footing as they held before the war began. These terms, as noticed above, were not considered sufficiently satisfactory by the English; consequently the peace was of very short duration, war being declared against Bonaparte in 1803.

Ancolites, THE, were a small British tribe, inhabiting probably part of Berkshire and Oxfordshire. They are mentioned by Cæsar, but not by Ptolemy.

Ancrem Moor, BATTLE OF (Feb. 17, 1544), was fought in Roxburghshire, between the forces of Henry VIII., headed by Sir Ralph Evans and Sir Brian Latour, and the Scots, under the Earl of Angus, Scott of Buccleuch, and the Master of Rothes. The English were completely beaten, owing to their desertion by the Borderers who had joined them.

Anderida (ANDREDES-CRASTER), the name of a Roman fortress and settlement on the Sussex coast, which Camden placed at Newenden, in Kent, and others have considered to have been situated at Hastings, Chichester, or under the downs near Eastbourne, where, in 1717, Roman pavements, baths, and other remains were found. Most modern authorities agree in placing it on the site of Pevensey. The town was taken and burnt by the Saxons, under Ella, in 491, and the site was a desolate ruin in the time of Henry of Huntingdon. The Forest of Anderida (Andredes-weald) was the great belt of wood which stretched across south-eastern England through Hampshire, Kent, and Surrey, having a length of more than seventy, and in some places a breadth of over thirty, miles. The district still called the Weald may be held to mark out roughly the extent of the closer portions of this forest. [FORESTERS.]

Anderson, SIR EDMUND (b. 1540, d. 1605), one of Elizabeth's judges, was employed in the prosecutions of the Jesuits, as Queen's Sergeant, 1581. In the following year he was made Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, an office which he retained until his death. In 1586 he tried the conspirators in Babington's plot, and was one of the commissioners at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, in Oct., 1586. He subsequently tried Davison for the issue of the warrant.

Anderton, William (d. 1693), was a violent Jacobite pamphleteer, in the reign of William III. For two years he evaded the government agents, but was at length traced to a house near St. James's Street. He attempted to conceal his press, but it was discovered, together with a tract called Remarks on the Present Confederacy and the Late Revolution. He was indicted for high treason before Treby at the Old Bailey. He denied that he had printed the libels. It was argued in his favour, moreover, that, as printing was unknown in the reign of Edward III., it could not be construed into an overt act of treason, and that, under the statute of that sovereign, a further distinction ought to be made between the author of a treasonable pamphlet and the man who merely printed it. He was, however, found guilty, and after being kept for some time in suspense, in the hope that he would betray his accomplices, was executed.

André, Major John (b. 1761, d. 1780), was the son of a London merchant. Entering the army, he rose rapidly. He was appointed to serve under General Howe in America, and, when Sir H. Clinton succeeded Howe, was made adjutant-general. His tact and ability in this position caused him to be selected, in the month of September, 1780, to superintend the negotiations for the surrender of West Point, on the Hudson River. The man he had to deal with on the other side was Arnold, an American general whose ambition was not satisfied with his position. An arrangement was made between the two for a meeting, to take place on the 17th, when Washington would be absent. The sloop which was carrying André to the meeting-place ran aground, and Arnold, on hearing of the mishap, refused to come down himself, but sent for André to come to him. André, on his return, found the sloop gone, and could not induce the boatmen to put off to her. He accordingly returned to Arnold, who persuaded him to exchange his uniform for a countryman's dress, and go back to the British lines by land. He accomplished the greater part of the journey in safety, and was already in sight of the British lines, when he was arrested, and, in spite of Arnold's passport, carried back to Washington. A court of inquiry was forthwith held; André was found to be a spy, and sentenced to death. Washington was most unwilling to carry out the sentence, and he endeavoured to seize Arnold, the real offender, in order to be able to release André. But Arnold was not to be found; and on Oct. 2, André met his fate with perfect composure. Washington himself declaring that he was more unfortunate than criminal. His bones were afterwards brought to England, and have been interred in Westminster Abbey.

Andros, Sir Edmund (b. 1637, d. 1713), became governor of New York in 1674, and in 1685 was appointed governor of New England by James II. His administration was so unpopular with the colonists that, in 1688, all the colonies subject to him revolted, and he was sent back to England for trial, but acquitted. In 1692 he went out as governor of Virginia, holding the office with credit to himself and advantage to the country until 1698.

Angel was the name of a gold coin, first introduced into England in 1465. The value of an angel was originally 8s. 4d., but in Edward VI.'s time it was raised to 10s. It derived its name from the representation of the Archangel Michael which appeared on it.

Angels continued to be coined down to the reign of Charles I. [COINAGE.]

Angevins, THE, sometimes called PLANTAGENETS. Anjou first became connected with England by the marriage, in 1127, of Matilda, daughter of Henry I., with Geoffrey V., Count of Anjou. Their son Henry became King of England, as well as Count of Anjou. Anjou remained united to England till 1205, when Philip Augustus conquered it, and annexed it to the French crown. For a short time, during the reigns of Henry V. and Henry VI., it was again united to England; but in 1444 the latter king, on his marriage with Margaret of Anjou, ceded his claims. The Angevin rulers filled as great a space in the history of the Middle Ages as the Hapsburgs have done in more modern times. The first Count of Anjou was Fulk the Red, who at the end of the ninth century was thus rewarded for his services against the Northmen. But by the twelfth century, when the petty counts had added Saintonge, Maine, and Touraine to their territory, men began to throw their origin further back, into legends of an heroic champion, Ingelger, son of the wild Briton hunter, Tortulf; and accounted for that fitful energy and successful unscrupulousness which marked the whole race, by tales of an ancestress, who had been an evil spirit or a witch in guise of a lovely countess. In Fulk the Good there appears the other side of the Angevin character: the literary, poetic, and artistic tastes strong in Henry III. and Edward III., in Richard I. and Richard II., and partly shared by Henry II. and John; the capacity for business and the organising power which distinguished Henry II. and Edward I. So, too, the physical prowess of Richard I. was an inheritance from his ancestor, Geoffrey Greygown, the third count; while the fourth count, Fulk the Black, in his successful adventurousness, his restless pilgrimages to Jerusalem, his cruel revenges on his wife and son, seems to anticipate familiar stories of our own Plantagenet kings. With Fulk's son, Geoffrey Martel, the original Angevin line ends, to be continued by his daughter's marriage with Geoffrey of the House of Orleans. Their son, Fulk Rechin, "to whom alone it is due that the charge of trickery is urged against this family," brought upon himself many enemies and some disasters. The next count, Fulk the Young, had already secured Maine by marriage; and his successor, Geoffrey the Handsome, called Plantagenet, by his marriage with the Empress Matilda, heiress to Henry I. of England, raised to its climax the long advancement of his house. Their son, Henry II. of England, succeeded, in 1151, to Anjou, Maine, and Touraine from his father, and Normandy from his mother, and received, in 1152, Poitou, Limoges, Auvergne, Guienne, and Gascony, with Eleanor, the divorced wife of Louis of France. He was crowned King of England in 1154, made himself Lord of Ireland in 1171, exacted full homage from the captive King of Scots in 1174, and obtained for his second son, Geoffrey, the succession to Brittany by marriage. In 1170 Anjou was set apart, with Maine and Normandy, to form a temporary dominion for his eldest son, Henry, as Aquitaine was for Richard, Brittany for Geoffrey, and Ireland for John. But with the accession of John "Lackland," Anjou, like most of the other French possessions of the English crown, passed to Philip of France in 1202. Before this, Ralph de Diceto, finding a pious explanation for the success which had now reached such a height, had declared "the prophecy made to Fulk the Good by the leper whom he carried so piously (and who was none other than the Saviour Himself), that his seed should prosper to the ninth generation, is being fulfilled." But most men spoke otherwise of the Angevins. Thus Giraldus Cambrensis, not content with recounting their diabolic origin, St. Bernard's prediction of their curse, and Richard Cœur de Lion's gloomy acceptance of it ("Let us fight; son with father, brother with brother; it is instinct in our family: from the devil we all came, to the devil we shall all go"), draws out furthermore the calamitous end of all the offspring of Eleanor, as a vengeance foretold for her parents' adulterous union; he recites the visions which warned holy men of the punishment reserved for Henry II.'s sins against the Church, and points the moral of the breakdown of that great king's empire, after all his subtle schemes and his toilsome, gainful life, before the divinely-favoured royal house of France. This indeed was the feeling which many men had about the Angevins; not without some reason. "They remind us," says Dr. Stubbs, "of those unhappy spirits who, throughout the Middle Ages, were continually spending superhuman strength in building in a night inaccessible bridges and uninhabitable castles, or purchasing with untold treasures souls that might have been had for nothing, and invariably cheated of their reward." There is, indeed, in all the English kings of this race, even in Edward I., something of this waste of vast energies upon futile results, which are no sooner grasped than they crumble in the hand. They had not, with all their insight, that rare gift of penetrating to the real heart of their age, the gift that only sympathy with it can give. Even Edward I. could not see that he was, in his own despite, making of Scotland what he had already made of England—a self-governing patriotic nation. Yet to this dynasty England owes much. Henry II. not only finally defeated the feudal class by superseding its privileged jurisdiction, by subduing it to his strong centralised system, by withdrawing its military basis, but he also set up a counterpoise to it in the revived popular courts, in the developed use of local juries, in the reconstituted national militia, in the legalised liberties of the towns. In a word, he began the varied training of the English people to co-operation in the work of government, which Edward I. took up and carried on to its completion. Moreover, the very tyranny and neglect of the other kings were direct instruments of benefits never intended. Richard I.'s careless absence and heavy exactions left his ministers free to expand the principles bequeathed them from Henry II.'s reign. A still greater debt of gratitude we owe to the misgovernment of John, the worst of the line, inasmuch as it alone supplied the pressure which could force the baronage for the first time to act with and for Church and people, and produced the coalition which extorted the Great Charter. Henry III.'s shiftiness recalled this coalition into action so often that it became a permanent union. The second Edward's failure taught the nation that a vigorous kingship was still a requisite of political stability, to control the baronage, and to be the working head of the government. Edward III., in his selfish haste for the means of warfare and ostentation, sold away the crown's power of extra-parliamentary interference in taxation and legislation. And Richard II.'s unsuccessful attempt at absolutism precipitated the downfall of prerogative, and gave constitutional government sixty years in which to strike its roots down too deep even for the destroying hand of Yorkist, Tudor, and Stuart kings to kill their latent life. And it is to the stern peace kept by the Angevin kings, to their repression of private justice and private war, to their firm but prudent attitude to the Church, that we owe the early rise of English literature and philosophy, the great age of the English Church, the enfranchisement of the peasantry, the populous independence of the towns, the growth of wool-trade and maritime commerce. All the Angevins were men of strong but conflicting character; none were without physical bravery, bodily activity, passionate emotions. Even the worst were men who superstitiously respected some forms of religion, while they violated its spirit: like Henry II., jesting and drawing pictures at mass, but dying before the chapel altar at Chinon; or Richard, after an agony of repentance for his sins, recovering, to plunge into them afresh. All inflicted, and in turn suffered, the ancestral curse, the pangs of filial or fraternal ingratitude. None are contemptible, save, perhaps, Henry III.; none, save John, fail to win some sympathy. They must remain to us as they were to their contemporaries—a marvellous race, with many elements of greatness, with immense personal endowments, and a certain mysterious shadow hanging over all; whose work, to which they sacrificed their peace and domestic happiness, and too often their conscience and fame, for the most part was destined to pass away, but through whom other results were brought about, destined to be of incalculable value and indestructible permanence.

Angles, THE. If identity of name and general probability be held fair proofs of identity of race, the Angles (Angli, Anglii), after whom this land is called, are first mentioned in the Germania of Tacitus (written about a.d. 98), seemingly as dwellers on the farther side of the Elbe. But in Tacitus's page they are merely one among a number of obscure names of German peoples. They would seem, however, to have been then in motion westwards; fifty years later Ptolemy found them on the left bank of the same river, in occupation of a territory conjectured to be in the neighbourhood of the modern town of Magdeburg. But neither did they remain here; by the fourth century, if not earlier, they had established themselves on the neck of the northern peninsula, now Jutland, and filled the district that is now known as Schleswig, but which an English writer of the tenth century (Ethelward) names Anglia Vetus, or Old England. And Bede, in calling this country of theirs Angulus, suggests a hint regarding the origin of their name, which a weighty authority, Dr. Guest, has not scrupled to take, speaking of their Continental home as "Ongle," and apparently looking upon them as "men of the corner." Next to nothing is told us of the Angles in written history. Scholars are, however, satisfied that they were of the Low-German stock, and were closely akin to, yet distinct from, the Saxons, having a speech that, though essentially the same as the Saxon, was not so far removed from the High-German, and showed more frequent marks of Scandinavian influence. But, like the Saxons, they were of pure German type; Roman civilisation had never reached them. A legal code, the Laws of the Anglii and Werini, presumably belonging to them, and as old as the eighth century, survives as a record of native usages in an intermediate stage between those of the Germania and of the earliest-known English system. In the sixth century, at various but unknown dates, and by many but unconnected expeditions, the Angles crossed over to Britain, and conquered to their own use the whole of the east coast, from the Stour to the Forth. Pushing steadily their encroachments westwards, and slaying, expelling, or enslaving the bulk at least of the natives, they eventually formed several powerful kingdoms, and not a few smaller states—fought and prospered until two-thirds of the conquered land had passed into their possession. This great movement is believed to have caused an exhaustive migration of the race; Bede is our authority for a report that their fatherland was without inhabitants even in his time. Yet some will have it that their name still abides there in the local term, Angeln. In Britain, though they just missed winning political supremacy, they fixed their name ineffaceably on the whole German population and the land it lived in. Many have speculated upon, but none gained any solid knowledge of, their distinguishing characteristics; it would seem, however, that wherever they differed from their Saxon brethren, they more nearly resembled their Danish cousins.

Anglesey (Latin, Mona; Welsh, Môn), an island and county of North Wales, was in the earliest times celebrated as the headquarters of Druidism, and therefore of resistance to the Romans. It was conquered by Suetonius Paulinus in A.D. 61, and again more thoroughly by Agricola in 78. On the withdrawal of the Romans, it became the centre of the power of the kings of North Wales, or Gwynedd, and Gildas calls the famous Maelgwn "insularis draco." Yet it was conquered, with much other Welsh territory, by Edwin of Northumbria (Bede, ii. 5), and perhaps this Anglian conquest explains Nennius—"Mona insula quæ Anglice Engleseï vocatur id est insula Anglorum" (Mon. Hist. Brit., 52 D.). But Northumbria soon fell, and the "isle of the English" became Welsh again. It contained Aberffraw, the chief palace of the kings of Gwynedd. During the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, it was repeatedly ravaged by the Danes, who very probably effected permanent settlements in it. After the Norman Conquest, it became the battleground of Irish Dane, native Welsh, and Norman adventurers. Under William Rufus, it was more than once captured by Earl Hugh of Chester, when "the French reduced all to be Saxons" (Brut-y-Tys., sub an. 1096). Again, in 1098, it was the scene of the exploits of Magnus of Norway, and of the death of Hugh. But it soon got back its liberty, and has retained to this day that intensely Welsh character ("Môn ma Cymru") which makes its name so misleading. It continued the home of the princes of North Wales until the fall of Llewelyn ap Gruffydd annexed the principality to the crown, and it was erected into regular county by Henry VIII. [COUNTY WELSH.]

Rowland's Mona Antiqua Restaurata hopelessly confuses the history with fable. A History of Anglesey (London, 1775) is little better. The chief facts are in Miss Williams' History of Wales and Freeman, William Rufus, vi. 127, seq.

Anglesey, PIERAGE OF. In 1628 Francis Annesley, of Newport Pagnell, Bucks, was created Baron Mount Norris in the peerage of Ireland, and Viscount Valentia. This was this nobleman who was arbitrarily tried and condemned to death by Strafford, who Lord Deputy in 1635. Arthur, second Viscount Valentia (1614—1686), was, in 1645, sent as Commissioner to Ulster to oppose Owen Roe O'Neil. After the death of Cromwell, he was President of the Council of State, and took a considerable share in bringing about the Restoration. In 1660 he was created Earl of Anglesey in the peerage of England. During the life of Richard, sixth Earl of Anglesey, the title and estates were claimed by James Annesley, who asserted that he was the son of the fourth Earl. [For the litigation which ensued on this claim, see ANNESLEY'S CASE.] As a result of this litigation, it was held that the earldom of Anglesey became extinct in 1761, on the death of the sixth Earl. In 1816 the title Marquis of Anglesey was conferred on Henry Paget, Earl of Uxbridge.

Anglesey, Arthur Annesley, 1st EARL OF (d. 1737), held several posts in Ireland in the reign of Queen Anne. In 1703 he hastened from Ireland to take part in the debates on the war, and commented severely on the exhaustion of the country, hinting that Marlborough had averted peace for interested motives. But on a subsequent occasion he attacked the ministry, and publicly apologised for the part he had played in politics. During the last years of Queen Anne, he was one of the leaders of the faction of Hanoverian Tories, whom he calls the "Whimsicals." He was one of the Lords Justices appointed to administer the kingdom between the death of Anne and the arrival of George I.

Anglesey, Henry William Paget 1st MARQUIS OF (b. 1768, d. 1854), eldest son of Henry, first Earl of Uxbridge, in 1794 served under the Duke of York in Flanders, and again in Holland in 1799, as colonel of a dragoon regiment. In December, 1808, he joined Sir John Moore's force as a major-general, and greatly distinguished himself in the manner in which he covered the astrous retreat of the British army, and contributed in no small measure to the victory of the English at Corunna. In 1806 he was returned to Parliament for Milbourne Port, and he was called to the Upper House on the death of his father in 1812. In the campaign of 1815 the Earl of Uxbridge was appointed to the command of the cavalry. At Waterloo, where he led the heavy brigade in the terrible charge which overwhelmed D'Erlon's division, he distinguished himself by the utmost intrepidity. In the battle he was wounded in the leg, which was obliged to be amputated. For his services he was created Marquis of Anglesey, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. In 1827 he was appointed Master-General of the Ordnance; and in 1828 the Wellington Cabinet made him Viceroy of Ireland. His advent was looked forward to with much dread in Ireland, owing to some thoughtless remarks he had once made as to using military force to quell disturbances. But he very much belied the anticipations that had been formed of him, and by his impartial conduct and strict justice, gained great popularity. His views on Catholic emancipation, of which he was a strong advocate, entirely differed from the policy of the Cabinet, and he was summarily removed from his post, to the great regret of all classes in Ireland. In 1830 he was again appointed Lord-Lieutenant, and carried on the government of Ireland till the dissolution of Lord Grey's government in 1833. In 1846 he was made a field-marshal, and in the same year once more became Master-General of the Ordnance, which office he held till 1852, when he retired into private life until his death.

Anglia, East. [EAST ANGLIA.]

Anglia Sacra is the title of a miscellaneous collection of ecclesiastical memorials, published by Dr. Henry Wharton, in two vols. folio, Lond., 1691. These volumes contain Eadmer's "Life of Anselm," William of Malmesbury's "Life of Aldhelm," John of Salisbury's "Life of Anselm," and other works relating more particularly to the early history of English dioceses, and the biography of English bishops.

Anglo-Saxon is a word which has been commonly applied to the aggregate of the Teutonic inhabitants of Britain who lived under native institutions, up to the date of the Norman Conquest; to the earliest form of the English language of which memorials survive; and, by a curious modern usage, to the sum total of the men of English speech and origin, to whatever nation they may belong, who are now scattered over the globe. The exact meaning of the word is not obvious. Mr. Freeman rules "Anglo-Saxon" to be a condensation of the phrase "Angles and Saxons," construing both its component parts as nouns; whilst the ablest of his predecessors has taken the compound to mean "properly Saxons of England, as distinguished from Saxons of the Continent," in which case the former half must have the force of an adjective. A scrutiny of the oldest forms of the word, whether English or Latin, would seem to justify the latter conclusion rather than the other. These forms are: in English, Ongol-Sazna and Angul-Seazna; in Latin, Angul-Saxones and Angli-Saxones. Now, if Ongol cyn and Angel cyn be—as they usually are—construed into "English kin," we cannot easily escape the necessity of construing Ongol-Saze, Angul-Seaze, and Angul-Saxones into "English Saxons." And the Latin form seemingly admits of the same construction more readily than it does that of "Angles and Saxons." Camden, therefore, and Mr. Kemble would appear to have had some show of reason, the first for naming (Remains concerning Britain, pp. 24, 25) the inhabitants of England before the Norman Conquest "English-Saxons," and their tongue "English-Saxon," the second for calling his great work "The Saxons in England." On the other hand, Mr. Freeman's explanation would unquestionably, if language permitted it, be a far more satisfactory one. An Anglo-Saxon king was certainly a king of Angles and Saxons; the population he reigned over was composed of Angles of the north and east, as well as Saxons of the south and west. It is noteworthy, however, and perhaps significant, that the word was barely recognised by the men of the time to which it is now so often given; neither in the Chronicle, nor in Ethelward—nor, indeed, in any purely native English historical record—is it once found. So long as these men were distributed into separate states, they looked upon themselves as Saxons or as Angles; when they fell into political unions they became, when contemplated as members of one community, Englishmen. When native writers would contrast West-Saxons, East-Anglians, and Northumbrians with their insular foes or continental neighbours, they had no other designation for them than "Engle," no other for their speech than "Englisc." This is the first reason that has moved some scholars to drop this and every cognate word altogether in writing, and use "English" as a descriptive epithet of every part of our history and every form of our language. The men whom Edgar and Harold ruled called themselves "English kin;" even Alfred, mere King of West-Saxons as he was, is represented in the Chronicle as having been "King of all the English kin except the part that was under the wield of the Danes." It is thought better to call the people as they called themselves. And undoubtedly the name has led to misconceptions. It has misled people into thinking that their forefathers were not their forefathers, that the nation which was (temporarily) overthrown at Senlac was not the same nation that, 750 years later, overthrew Napoleon; into thinking the language of the Chronicle a different tongue from the language of Carlyle. "The unhistorical and conventional term Anglo-Saxon conveys," says Sir F. Palgrave, "a most false idea of our civil history. It disguises the continuity of affairs, and substitutes the appearance of a new formation in place of a progressive evolution." On the other hand, it is urged that as regards the language, at least, the name is necessary. To insist upon calling both the earliest and latest forms of our literary language "English," is to assert identity where there is no identity; to prevent misconception, therefore, we must alter the name either of our own or of Alfred's tongue. To do the second were not easy. But those earlier were the days of Angles and Saxons, if ever Angles and Saxons were; it surely ought to be at least fairly accurate to speak of their written language as the Anglo-Saxon form of English. And as to the people—seeing that during those days the Angles and Saxons, though coalescing, had not yet coalesced into a well-blended national unity—there is perhaps no intolerable error in describing their era as the Anglo-Saxon stage in the history of the English nation.

[J. R.]

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle is the name given to an historical document of the very first importance for the whole earlier portion of English history. It is in the form of annals, beginning with the Christian era, and terminating at various dates in the various copies, the most prolonged ending with 1154.

The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle is sometimes spoken of in the plural, as the Anglo-Saxon Chronicles; and each form of expression may be justified. The extant copies are so far alike in their contents that they can be regarded as variations of a common original, such hypothetical original being a compilation made in the ninth century. But the divergences are great even within this earlier part, and they tend in the continuations to a separation so wide as to produce in some cases a total independence of one another before the close. No one can really study this document without finding that there is at least equal propriety in the plural designation.

Manuscripts: There are six manuscripts, and some fragments of a seventh. These manuscripts have been designated by the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G. They have each and all been identified (at least proximately) with one or other of the great religious houses of the southern part of the 1st nd. The first (A) has been assigned to Winchester; the second (B) was probably compiled at St. Augustine's, Canterbury; the third (C) is manifestly from Abingdon; the fourth (D) from Worcester; the fifth (E) is from Peterborough, and is the most distinctly local of the whole series; the sixth (F), in the two languages Latin and Saxon, is from Canterbury. The seventh (G) is little more than a late copy of A. Of this last manuscript only three leaves have escaped the fire of 1731; but this loss is alleviated by the fact that this manuscript has been printed in full, and without admixture, by Wheloc (Cambridge, 1643). The places of deposit of these manuscripts are as follows:—A, in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; B, C, D, F, G, in the Cotton Library, British Museum; E, in the Bodleian.

Of all these manuscripts, the Peterborough Chronicle (E) is the one of which the date and occasion of its production has been most satisfactorily made out. There was a great fire at Peterborough in August, 1116, which destroyed all the monastery except the chapter-house and the dormitory; most of the town was burnt also. All the books were probably lost. Five years later, in 1121, we find this new Chronicle, which must have taken time to collect and compile, brought down to the date of the current year in one handwriting. A new hand continues the history in 1122. We know from other sources that this was counted an epoch at Peterborough. The Latin Chronicon Petroburgense (Camden Society), of which the object was to describe the administration of Abbot Robert, which dates from 1274, begins with 1122.

Division of Contents: The first five hundred years is a literary compilation, made at a comparatively late date, from Latin authorities; then follows a mixed period down to A.D. 735, in which the greatest part is from Bede, with a few original annals interspersed. These annals are the earliest material proper to the Saxon Chronicle. From this date onwards, our Chronicles are the highest source for nearly all the history they contain. As a whole, the Chronicles belong to the south, but there is an important exception to this general character, in a series of annals between A.D. 737 and 806, embodied in the Worcester Chronicle (D), and manifestly derived from Northumbrian and Mercian sources, not otherwise known. The best and strongest writing appears with a natural propriety in the reigns of Ethelred and Alfred, the greatest crisis of the national life. In 1066 we may be struck with the fact that only one Chronicle (D) describes the battle of Hastings. A new and peculiar interest attaches to the later continuations of the Peterborough Chronicle (E). Here we see the language admitting gradual changes, and this goes with other points of internal evidence to link the records very closely with the events.

The earliest Latin historians are in close relation with the Saxon Chronicles. Florence of Worcester, who died in 1118, and whose latest annal is 1117, is for a large part of his work simply a translator of these Chronicles, especially of D. Asser is indebted to A. Henry of Huntingdon made large use of the Saxon Chronicles; and where he deviates from them his credit is deteriorated thereby. In general, it may be asserted that the existence of the Saxon Chronicles tends greatly to increase our confidence in the early Latin annalists. When we see how closely they have for the most part followed these vernacular annals, we are able to feel assured that in instances where vernacular authority fails, it was probably possessed by the Latin historian. This is the case where Simeon of Durham produces material that we have no other trace of, and which is therefore attributed to some lost northern chronicles.

Editions: After Wheloc, the next editor was Gibson (Oxford, 1692), who constructed a text by a collation of several manuscripts. Both Wheloc and Gibson gave Latin translations, and Gibson's is, for the time, excellent. The first translation into English was by Miss Gurney. It was privately and anonymously printed (Norwich, 1819). The next edition was in 1823, by Dr. Ingram, with English parallel to the Saxon. The next edition appeared in the folio Monumenta Historica Britannica (1848); and here the plan of a composite text was carried to its extreme perfection. That plan has since been abandoned. In 1861 appeared the Rolls edition, by Thorpe, where all the texts are printed parallel in vol. i., with a translation in vol. ii. In 1895 came Two Saxon Chronicles Parallel, with Supplementary Extracts from the Others, ed. J. Earle: Clarendon Press, Oxford.

Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms. Much that specially distinguishes the development of our national history is due to the fact that the English Conquest was carried out, not by a single people or confederation of peoples, but by independently-acting bodies of adventurers who were sprung from a common stock, and had been living for ages under similar institutions. For thus it came about that, when the success of the long series of separate invasions was assured, and at least half of Britain south of the isthmus of Forth and Clyde had received an English population, and passed under the sway of the English system of rule, this newly-subjugated land was necessarily divided among a large number of distinct, almost isolated, kingdoms and states. By the last quarter of the sixth century, the whole of the eastern and southern coast, from Queensferry to Portland Bill, formed an exclusive sea-board for an Anglian, Saxon, and Jutish territory, while a traveller might still make his way from Stirling to the shores of West Bay entirely through Celtic land, without having once to cross tidal water save at the point where the Severn broadens into the Bristol Channel. But the line that parted the two races was somewhat irregular, and, owing to incessant warfare between them, continually changing. In the upper reaches of the English side of the island, two kingdoms had established themselves—Bernicia (Welsh, Bryneich, the country of the bræes) and Deira (Deifyr), stretching, the former from the Forth to the Tees, the latter from the Tees to the Humber. These are both usually reckoned among the states founded by the Angles, though certain inquirers profess to have detected a Frisian element in their population. Below the Humber a cluster of Anglian settlements—Gainas, Lindisfaras, Mercians, Middle Angles, and others—covered a broader area of considerable but indefinable length, and would seem to have been already consolidating into the great kingdom of the Marchland, or Mercia. East Anglia filled the space between the lower half of the Mercian land and the eastern sea, and had the Stour as its southern boundary. Between the

Stour and the Thames dwelt the East and the Middle Saxons, already, it would appear, united into a single kingdom. Westward to the lower Severn and the Forest of Selwood, and southward to the English Channel, spread the kingdom of the West-Saxons, in which Surrey had probably been already included. The belt of cleared land that ran, thrust in between the huge forest of Anderida and the sea, from Chichester harbour to the Rother, formed the territory of the South-Saxons; and the Kentish kingdom must have had pretty much the same limits as the present county of Kent. Though the men of Kent, Wight, and the part of Hampshire that bends round the Southampton Water, are called Jutes in early authorities, the distinctive name was not long maintained; and the four southern kingdoms may be taken to compose the Saxon constituent of the English race in Britain. It must also be borne in mind that, scattered over the newly-conquered country, there were not a few smaller states, such as the Hwiccas, the Gyrwas, the Meanwaras, either independent or owing an incomplete allegiance to one or other of the kingdoms; that Deira and Bernicia showed a disposition to combine into one state, had already once combined, and were sure to become soon permanently incorporated into a Northumbrian kingdom, while the co-existence of the two dioceses of Rochester and Canterbury, from the first organisation of the Church in England, has led to the belief that there may have been originally two kingdoms in Kent, the earliest dioceses being generally co-extensive with kingdoms. As yet these several kingdoms and states—at any rate, the greater among them—held aloof from one another. Nor had they yet learned—perhaps the resistance of the natives did not allow them the necessary leisure—even to quarrel among themselves. In fact, each, as a rule, went about its business of fighting with the Welsh, of settlement and apportionment of the soil, of general organisation, on its own forces only; loosely speaking, they had no relations with one another; the conditions that made the first step towards union possible did not exist. It is true that Ella, the first king of the South-Saxons, is represented by Bede as holding a sort of imperium, or military overlordship, over the "provinces" south of the Humber; but Bede's statement must be either an exaggeration of some insignificant fact, or altogether baseless. An imperial king of the South-Saxons in the fifth century is inconceivable. In another century (circa 686) a great change had taken place. The southern part of Northumbria now stretched from sea to sea, its western border-line joining the coast at the head of Morecambe Bay. Mercia had grown considerably towards the south and the west; part of the lower Dee and half the Wye flowed within her confines, and her kings had pushed their conquests from Wessex almost to the Bristol Avon and the upper Thames. But Wessex had helped to make up for these losses by extending her western frontier to the mouths of the Parret and Exe, and by taking Wight within her kingdom. East Anglia, Essex, Kent, and Sussex, having no weaker race in their neighbourhood to encroach upon, were substantially unaltered.

Among these kingdoms a state of things had arisen which Milton in his ignorance of the real facts of the case only caricatures when he calls their mutual dealings "the wars of kites or crows, flocking and fighting in the air." Strife and bloodshed were universal; no kingdom escaped them; even Christianity brought a sword; by far the greater number of battles that are henceforward recorded were fought between Englishmen. Indeed, the several peoples seldom came together save as enemies. And in the course of this warfare the vicissitudes of success were many and sudden; the irresistible conqueror of one day was the hunted fugitive or mangled corpse of the next. Ceawlin of Wessex, after years of nearly unbroken success, in which Briton and Jute went down before him, was, in 591, himself beaten down by his own subjects, and driven from his kingdom. Kent then rose to greatness under the guidance of Ethelbert, who won a sort of supremacy that is stated by Bede to have reached the Humber, at the same time that another restless warrior, Ethelfrith, was making the might of Northumbria terrible to the north and west of that river. But Ethelbert shrank back, and Ethelfrith fell in battle before the growing power of Redwald, King of the East Angles; and for a few years Redwald held the foremost place among the kings that ruled south of the Humber. Then the turn of Northumbria came: in 630 the authority or influence of her king, Edwin, bore undisputed sway from the Forth to the English Channel, save in Kent alone. Then Penda of Mercia vanquished and slew Edwin (634), and seized a part of his supremacy; but was himself vanquished and slain in 655 by a successor of Edwin's, Oswy, under whom Northumbria regained a fair share of her former ascendancy. But with the death in battle of her next king, Egfrith, in 685, the glory and greatness of the northern kingdom passed away for ever. For a hundred and forty years longer she kept her independence, and at times acted with vigour to the north and west; but her part in determining the destiny of England was played out. These were not futile fightings, after all. The kingdoms were merely taking the best way they knew of settling among themselves which was the most worthy to fulfil the trust of making England a nation. To bringing about this end, the newly-founded

Church proved an effective ally. Her authority, being an undivided force that proceeded from a single centre, and her organisation covering the whole land, gently drew the separate communities together, made the idea of unity familiar, and must have fostered a vague longing for political union. And the practical effacement of all the smaller kingdoms except East Anglia must also have done something to smooth the way towards this consummation. Essex sank, first into a Mercian, then, seemingly, into a West-Saxon dependency; in the last quarter of the seventh century Ceawalla of Wessex and his successor, Ina, reduced Sussex and Kent beneath their dominion; and these states, without as yet losing their separate existence, never again enjoyed a separate political life.

In the rivalry that was thus narrowed to Mercia and Wessex, the tide of success, during the greater part of the eighth century, ran decidedly in favour of the former; one of the Mercian kings, Ethelbald, was strong enough to fasten his yoke on the neck of Wessex itself. And, though the stubborn land succeeded in shaking off this yoke by a decisive victory at Burford (752), Offa, a later Mercian king, managed in his long reign (756—794) to raise his power to an unexampled height. Wessex was beaten in battle, and driven below the Thames; Essex and Kent had become almost parts of the Mercian kingdom; and in 792 a deed of the foulest treachery gave Offa the command of East Anglia. From the Welsh, too, the masterful king wrested the wide sweep of scrub-land that lay round Pengwern, and on the site of this place built the town of Shrewsbury (Scrobbesbyrig, Scrub-bury), and made the dyke that is still called after his name the western limit of his kingdom, thus bringing the area of England almost to its furthest expansion on the side of Wales. But the sceptre was destined for Wessex, notwithstanding. Pressed down from her northern frontier, and forced, as it would appear, to give up Surrey and Sussex also, she never paused in her slow advance towards Cornwall. Somerset was completed, and the making of Devonshire begun; by the end of the century the Exe, from source to sea, was a West-Saxon river. With the first years of the next Egbert, a wise and valiant descendant of earlier kings came from exile in Charlemagne's court, to take on himself the rule of the kingdom; and under his direction the West-Saxons went steadily forward on the path that led to national greatness. Egbert was long content to repel Mercian invasion, and to push his conquests further into the Cornish peninsula; in his reign Devon reached its final limits, and the men of Cornwall were driven to accept him as their overlord. At length, in 823, on the field of Ellandune, Mercia and Wessex measured their strength for the last time; and there the might of Mercia was broken. Ere the year was over, Sussex and Surrey had rejoined, Kent and Essex been added to, the victorious kingdom; and the East Anglians had successfully revolted from Mercia, and put themselves under the protection of Egbert. The crowning year of triumph for Wessex was 827; then a single campaign made her king master of Mercia, and awed Northumbria into submission; from Edinburgh to Land's End he was supreme lord or immediate king. Of the nature and measure of this West-Saxon supremacy, no exact knowledge can be gained; doubtless it gave the right to demand help in war, and a commanding voice in the higher concerns of each kingdom. An unlooked-for force created the conditions that converted this supremacy into actual kingship. Northumbria, Mercia, and East Anglia, though bound to Wessex, still remained distinct kingdoms, each with its dependent king. These kingdoms the Danes laid in ruins; and after the narrow escape of Wessex from the same fate, the line of the Lea, the Ouse, and Watling Street divided England into two political systems, Wessex and the Danelagh, that were practically two hostile camps. Between these, after Alfred's death, the battle was fought out to the bitter end; and this end, when it came—as it did in the reign of Edgar (958–975)—made the whole of England a single kingdom. But either in this or in Canute's reign, the country between the Forth and the Tweed—the Lothians, as they are called—fell, or was torn, away from England: under what circumstances there is no record can tell us.

The Anglo-Saxon Chron., Bede, and Ethelward, are our chief authorities for the history of these kingdoms. See also Leppenberg, Anglo-Saxon Kings, vol. i.; J. E. Green, The Making of England. [J. R.]

Angoulême, or Angoumois, a province in the south of France, was united with England by the marriage of Henry II. with Eleanor of Aquitaine. In 1218 it passed into the possession of the Count de la Marche, stepfather of Henry III. In 1303 it was annexed to the French crown, but by the Treaty of Bretigni in 1360, was restored to England, only to be re-conquered by the French in 1370.

Angria was a pirate-chief, who occupied the rock of Gheriah, off the Malabar coast of India. His depredations had caused him to be regarded as the scourge of the adjacent seas. Clive, on his return to India, in 1756, and Admiral Watson, with the English fleet, attacked and destroyed his station.

Angus (the older name of the county of Forfar) was the territory of one of the great Pictish tribes, or sub-kingdoms, and was governed by a succession of Celtic "maormors," one of whom, Dufugan, is styled

"Comes" in the reign of Alexander I., and "was," says Mr. Skene, "no doubt, the first Earl." After him there is a further succession of four Celtic earls from father to son. Maud, the heiress of the last of these, carried the earldom by marriage first to the family of the Comyns, then to that of the Umphravilles. In 1297 Gilbert de Umphraville was summoned to Parliament as Earl of Angus. It is somewhat doubtful whether this was not merely a courtesy-title, and whether Umphraville was not in reality summoned in virtue of his barony of Prudhoe, in Northumberland (see Sir H. Nicolas, Historic Peerage); but his descendants were, at any rate, regularly summoned as Earls of Angus. By the marriage of Margaret, Countess of Angus, with William, first Earl Douglas (as his third wife), the earldom passed into one branch of the house of Douglas. In 1633 William, eleventh Earl of Angus, was created Marquis of Douglas. In 1700 James, third Marquis, was created Duke of Douglas. Archibald, son of the first Marquis, was created Earl of Ormond in 1651, and his son Archibald was created Earl of Forfar in 1661. His title and estates devolved, in 1716, on the Duke of Douglas, on whose death, in 1761, the honours of this family passed to the Dukes of Hamilton, for whom, and for the celebrated lawsuit which arose out of this succession. Angus, ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS, 5TH EARL OF, quarrelled with his kinsmen of the royalist party, and at the head of the partisans of James II., defeated them at Arkenholm (1455). At the siege of Roxburgh, 1460, he was wounded by the bursting of the same cannon which killed James II. He was the leader of the baronial party in the conspiracy against the ministers of James III. at Lauderbridge, and from his famous remark on that occasion, "Heed not, I am he who will bell the cat," was ever afterwards called Archibald Bell-the-Cat. He commanded one wing of the insurgent army at the battle of Torwood, where James III. was killed. He became Chancellor of Scotland, and in 1488 was one of the leaders of the barons at Sauchieburn. In 1491 he entered into a private treaty with Henry VII. by which he agreed to do his utmost to promote harmony between the kings of England and Scotland.

Angus, ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS, 6TH EARL OF (d. 1556), was the grandson of Earl "Bell-the-Cat." In August, 1514, he married Margaret, the Queen Regent of Scotland, and mother of James V.; but was shortly afterwards carried off to France at the instance of John, Duke of Albany. Returning to Scotland in 1519, he defeated his enemies, the Hamiltons, in the following year, in the battle of "Cleanse the Causeway," and seized Edinburgh, though he soon found himself compelled to seek a temporary asylum in France. In 1525 he returned, and became guardian of the young king, whom he kept in close restraint for three years, until one of his many attempts to escape proved successful (1528). On the death of James V., he returned to his native country, after coming to a secret understanding with the English king that he would do all in his power to serve his cause in Scotland. In 1543, he received Sir Ralph Sadler, the English ambassador, at his Castle of Tantallon; but in the following year Angus with the Assured Lords threw over Henry, and joined the national party, an act which drew down on his lands the army of Lord Hertford. Shortly afterwards he defeated the English at the battle of Ancrum Moor.

Burton, Hist. of Scot., iii. 85, &c.

Angus, McFergus (d. 761), obtained the Pictish throne, 731, after defeating the previous king, Alpin, at the junction of the Tay and the Earn, and annihilating the forces of Nectan MacDenli at Loch Inch. In 732 Angus invaded Dalriada, and drove its king to Ireland. In 736 he again laid waste the kingdom of the Scots, taking the capital, Dunad, and throwing Dungal into prison; this devastation was repeated in 741, when Dalriada for some years sank into the position of a Pictish dependency. Shortly afterwards Angus entered into an alliance with Eadbert of Northumbria against the Britons of Strathclyde, who submitted in 756.

Animals, CRUELTY TO. In 1822, chiefly owing to the exertions of Mr. Martin, M.P., an Act was passed to repress the practice of cruelty to animals. Subsequently Acts with the same object were passed in 1827, 1835, and 1854, in great part through the efforts of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, instituted in 1824. In 1875 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the question of the vivisection of animals. In 1876 an Act was passed regulating (but not abolishing) vivisection, and compelling physiological demonstrators and others to take out a certificate to vivisect.

Anjou, MARGARET OF. [MARGARET OF ANJOU.]

Anlaf (or Olaf) Cuaran (d. 980), was the son of Sihtric, Danish King of Northumberland. After his father's death, Anlaf went to Dublin, but soon left Ireland for Scotland, where he married the daughter of Constantine, King of Alban. It was this match which probably provoked Athelstan's invasion of Scotland in 933. Anlaf next appears as his father-in-law's ally at Brunanburh in 937. In 943, after his cousin Anlaf Godfrithsson's death, we find him ruling in Northumberland with Rægnald Godfrithsson. When Edmund conquered the five boroughs, Anlaf opposed him, and took Tamworth by storm, but being beset in Leicester he made peace with the English king. In 944, however, Edmund drove both his godsons from their kingdom. But Anlaf again appeared in arms in 949, and was received by the people, till in 952 he was driven abroad for the last time by his turbulent subjects. He now ruled in Dublin for several years, and commanded at the great battle of Tara; but his defeat there by the high king of Ireland seems to have wrought a change in the old warrior, for he started the same year on a pilgrimage to Iona, where he died.

The famous legend of Havelok the Dane, extant in old English and French, contains a romantic account of the early years of Anlaf Cuaran, and long served to keep his fame alive in Northern England, especially in Grimsby, the port of Scandinavian shippers, which is fabled to have derived its name from one of the characters in the story. See the poem edited by Sir F. Madden and Mr. Skeat for the Early Eng. Text Society; Ang.-Sax. Chron.; Florence of Worcester, Chron. sub an. 937, &c.; Skene, Celtic Scotland, i. 352, &c.

Anlaf (or Olaf) Godfrithsson (d. 941), King of Dublin and Northumberland, succeeded his father as King of Dublin in 933. He came with a great force of Irish and Danes to the assistance of his cousin Anlaf Cuaran at the battle of Brunanburh, whence he fled, as the English song of triumph tells us, "over the dark waste Dublin to seek." On the death of Athelstan he was called by the Northumbrians to rule over them, but he perished soon after of a grievous disease.

Annates, or FIRST-FRUITS, was the first year's income of newly-appointed archbishops and bishops which was exacted by the Pope before he would confirm the election. According to Blackstone, these payments were "part of the papal usurpations over the clergy of these kingdoms, first introduced by Pandulph, the Pope's legate, during the reigns of King John and Henry III." Frequent attempts were made to check the payment of such large sums to the court of Rome, and in 34 Ed. I., when there was great complaint of the oppressive manner in which the papal legate exacted them, the first-fruits were granted to the king for two years. It was not, however, until 1532 that a bill was brought in declaring, that whereas "annates had risen, grown, and increased by an uncharitable custom, grounded upon no good or just title, and the payment thereof was enforced by the restraint of bulls, against all equity and justice," the payment of such annates should be discontinued, and that any bishop making such payments should forfeit all his lands and goods to the king, whilst any bishops whom the Pope refused to consecrate for non-payment of first-fruits, should be consecrated in England, and "should enjoy their spiritualities and temporalities as completely as if they had obtained their bulls from Rome." The operation of this Act, however, was suspended for a time, as Henry waited to see whether the Pope would grant him the wished-for divorce from Catherine of Aragon; on his refusal the rupture with Rome took place, and the statute was re-enacted 1634, whilst a clause was introduced providing that archbishops and bishops should not "be presented to the Bishop of Rome, otherwise called the Pope, for confirmation, or sue out any bulls at his court; but that they should be elected by congé d'élire." In consequence, the payment of episcopal first-fruits to the Pope ceased from this time.

ANNE, QUEEN (b. Feb. 6, 1664, s. March 9, 1702, d. Aug. 12, 1714), the last of the Stuart sovereigns, was the second daughter of James II. (while Duke of York) and Anne Hyde. She was bred a Protestant by the express command of Charles II., under the care of Dr. Henry Compton, afterwards Bishop of London. While still very young, her hand was sought by George Louis, electoral prince of Hanover, who eventually succeeded her on the English throne; but in 1683 she married George, brother of Christian V., of Denmark. Prince George was a personage completely without talent, capacity, or ambition, so that throughout his life his political position was altogether insignificant. Already, before her marriage, Anne had conceived what were, perhaps, the two strongest emotions of her life. The teaching of Compton, a zealous Anglican, who had suffered for the cause of Church and King in the rebellion, had made her a steadfast and devoted adherent of the Church of England. The design of altering the succession to the throne, on condition that Anne would become a Roman Catholic, entertained by the French and English courts, was nullified by the steady attachment of the princess to the Protestant faith; and Anne had already conceived that violent affection for Sarah Jennings, who became in 1678 the wife of John Churchill [MARLBOROUGH], which lasted during the greater portion of her life. It was owing to the Churchill influence chiefly that Anne consented to notify to William of Orange her approval of his landing, and that in the crisis of affairs she fled from Westminster to Dorset's house in Epping Forest. In spite of the efforts of her uncle, Clarendon, she made no objection to the accession of William III. and Mary. She was herself declared heir to the throne, failing issue to the sovereigns, and an allowance of £20,000 settled on her. Soon after the Revolution she gave birth to William, Duke of Gloucester, the only one of her numerous children who survived infancy, and he died in 1700 at the age of eleven. Anne gradually became completely estranged from the king and queen, and a party, of which the Churchills were the heads, was formed about her in opposition, and came to be known as the "Princess Party." One of the points this party constantly pressed forward was an increase in Anne's income. In 1691, Anne's estrangement from the king went so far that she wrote a letter to James II., begging his forgiveness. On the disgrace of Marlborough, in 1692, Anne quarrelled with her sister, the queen; her guard of honour was taken from her, and she was treated with injudicious coldness and disrespect. After the death of Mary a formal reconciliation was made, through the mediation of Somers, but there was little friendship on either side. Anne resided at St. James's Palace during the remainder of William's reign, with some of the state befitting the heiress to the throne.

With the death of William, Anne became queen, and reigned over England during a period of twelve years crowded with important events, and singularly distinguished by illustrious men. The earlier portion of the period is that in which the influence of the Marlboroughs prevailed; in the second that of their opponents was predominant. By the year 1702 the Tories, Godolphin, Nottingham, Normanby, and Pembroke, had supplanted the great Whig ministers, who were chiefly responsible for the Revolution settlement. The war was entered upon with vigour, under the auspices of Marlborough and Godolphin; a commission was appointed to draw up terms of union between England and Scotland; and the union of the two rival East India Companies accomplished. The chief military events of the year were the capture of Venloo, Ruremond, and Liège, and the expedition against Vigo Bay. In 1703 violent opposition was offered in the Scotch Parliament to the Union scheme. The Methuen Treaty was concluded with Portugal. Queen Anne's Bounty, for the augmentation of the livings of the poorer clergy, was instituted. Next year some changes occurred in the ministry. The High Tories, Nottingham, Jersey, and Seymour, who thwarted Marlborough's war policy, were dismissed, and their places supplied by the Moderate Tories, Harley and St. John. In July Gibraltar was captured, and Marlborough won the great battle of Blenheim in August. An attempt to tack the Occasional Conformity Act to the Land Tax Bill was defeated in the Commons. The Aylesbury election case threatened a permanent breach between the two bodies of the Legislature. In 1705, Peterborough, in Spain, captured Barcelona, and established the authority of Charles II. in Catalonia and Valencia. Commissioners were appointed by the Scotch Parliament to discuss the terms of the Union in London. It was gradually becoming evident that Marlborough would have to rely on a Whig ministry. In 1706 the chief event was the consummation of the Union with Scotland. The labours of the commission lasted through the year, and the royal assent was given in March of the following year. Marlborough gained the battle of Ramillies, thereby driving the French from the Netherlands; but in Spain Charles II. had to evacuate Madrid. Mrs. Hill now began to supplant the Duchess of Marlborough in the royal favour, and the influence of Harley commenced to be appreciable. He instituted a series of intrigues in company with St. John, with a view to drive the Whig ministers from office. Meanwhile, Louis had made offers for peace, which were rejected. In the following year, Harley's intrigues, which took the form of an attack on the naval administration, were discovered, and he was forced to resign. On the failure of a composite ministry, the Whig junto came into power. The military events of the year were unfortunate. In Spain the allies were utterly defeated at Almanza; nor was Eugene's attack on Toulon successful. In 1708 the Pretender made an unsuccessful expedition to Scotland; and Marlborough, in Flanders, gained a great victory at Oudenarde. The queen suffered great grief from the loss of her husband, to whom she was sincerely attached. Meanwhile, it was evident that the Whig ministry was insecure. Once more Louis offered to treat. His terms were rejected; and Marlborough won a bloody victory at Malplaquet. In 1710 important changes took place at home. Mrs. Hill, now Mrs. Masham, had completely supplanted the Duchess of Marlborough in the royal favour. The nation was weary of the war; and the injudicious prosecution of Dr. Sacheverell by the Whig ministry produced a violent outcry against them. Sunderland and Godolphin were dismissed, and Harley was entrusted with the formation of a Tory ministry. The conference at Gertruydenberg resulted in nothing. In Spain the allies gained victories at Almenara and Saragossa, and Charles was once more established in Madrid; but these results were neutralised by the defeat of Stanhope at Brihuega. It soon became evident that the new ministry had determined on a peace policy, and that some of them, at all events, were willing that the Stuarts should be restored. The chief event at home in 1711 was the formation of the South Sea Company. Harley, now exceedingly popular on account of Guiscard's attempt to stab him, rapidly opened negotiations for peace. Marlborough's campaign in the year was resultless. On his return he was violently attacked in Parliament, and deprived of his offices. Twelve new peers were created, in order to "swamp" the majority in the House of Lords. In 1712 Ormonde was placed in command of the army, with instructions to attempt nothing. The conference was opened at Utrecht, and the terms of peace were laid before the House. In July Ormonde separated from the allies. Marlborough quitted England in November, and remained abroad until the queen's death. The Treaty of Utrecht was signed in March, 1713. Meanwhile, the failing health of the queen made the succession question open. Harley was evidently unwilling to consent to a return of the Stuarts; but no such scruples restrained St. John, now Viscount Bolingbroke. The remodelling of the army was entrusted to Ormonde, but the scheme failed owing to the neglect of Harley to supply the necessary funds. As a blind, Bolingbroke introduced into the House a proposition that the Protestant succession was in no danger. The design of the Whigs to bring the Electoral Prince over to England was thwarted by the wise caution of George, and by the evident dislike of the queen to such a step. Bolingbroke now saw that he must drive Harley from office; and he therefore introduced his Schism Bill, which Harley, who was of Low Church principles, could not support. He was accordingly dismissed. Everything was now in Bolingbroke's favour, but his plans were foiled by the fatal illness of the queen. As she lay on her death-bed, she was induced by a deputation of the Council to entrust the Lord Treasurer's staff to Shrewsbury, now firm in his attachment to the house of Hanover. There is considerable reason, nevertheless, to believe that Anne would have consented to her brother's succession to the throne if only he would have changed his religion.

Anne was very popular with the nation, but this, perhaps, was rather due to the fact that she was the last of the dynasty, which, in spite of its faults, retained a strong hold on the sympathies of Englishmen, than to any special merits of her own. She was a woman of somewhat narrow intellect, violent prejudices, and weak judgment. Her strongest political passions were devoted attachment to the Established Church, and dislike to the Whigs, whom she regarded as the enemies of legitimacy and of royalty itself; but, except when her prejudices and her obstinacy were roused, she had little strength of will, and was easily led by her female favourites. While she was under the fascination of the Duchess of Marlborough, she lent herself readily to the great schemes of the duke; when, subsequently, the influence of Abigail Hill was completely established over her, she allowed herself with no less willingness to countenance the projects of Harley. Of taste and wit she had little, and she showed scarcely any conception of the great intellectual movement which has rendered her reign an illustrious period in English literary history. She had, however, some compensating qualities. Her private life was exemplary and excellent; she was a good wife and a devoted mother. Her long and much-trying friendship with her haughty favourite was, at any rate, a testimony of the goodness of her heart and the strength of her affections. "Scarce any person," says Lord Stanhope, "ever endured more for a friend, or from a friend." As applied to her private character, at least, the familiar appellation of "good" Queen Anne is, perhaps, not undeserved.

Anne Boleyn, QUEEN, second wife of Henry VIII. (b. 1507, d. 1536), was the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, who married the Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the Duke of Norfolk. She was in her youth taken by her father to the French court, but returned in 1522. She is described as a little lively brunette, with long black hair and beautiful eyes. She was the object of much dirtation in the English court, and Henry VIII., beginning from idle gallantry, advanced to an uncontrollable passion for her. Honours and emoluments were showered upon her father. At last, in 1527, Henry VIII. resolved to divorce Catherine that he might marry Anne, whom he lodged magnificently in his palace. The momentous proceedings to obtain a divorce were entrusted to the charge of Wolsey, and when, in 1529, his failure was manifest, his fall rapidly followed. Henry VIII. still pursued his efforts to obtain a divorce, and meanwhile went about the country in company with Anne Boleyn. This created much indignation amongst the people, and the mode of life of the King and Anne Boleyn was generally regarded as dishonourable. The vacillation of Pope Clement VII. had lasted too long for his firmness to be successful; when, at the end of 1532, he issued a brief, bidding Henry to take back Catherine, and forbidding him to marry Anne Boleyn, Henry VIII. had gone too far to retrace his steps. On Jan. 26, 1533, he was privately married, and the new Archbishop (Cranmer) pronounced his divorce from Catherine. The marriage with Anne was then avowed, and confirmed by the archbishop, and the new queen was crowned in June. On Sept. 7 she gave birth to a daughter, Elizabeth. But Anne Boleyn had but a brief enjoyment of the position for which she had waited so long. On January 7th, 1536, Catharine of Aragon died, and Anne Boleyn could not conceal her delight. Shortly afterwards she brought into the world a dead child, to the king's great disappointment, as he wished for a male heir. He looked on Anne's conduct with suspicion. The light-heartedness and brilliancy which had once attracted him now seemed to be culpable frivolity. On May-day the king abruptly left some games at which he was present with the queen, and on the next day Anne was committed to the Tower on the charge of treason and adultery. Her brother, Lord Rochford, Sir Henry Norris, Smeaton a musician, and Brereton and Weston, gentlemen of the bedchamber, were apprehended as her accomplices. Smeaton and Norris made some confessions of guilt, but it is hard to estimate how far they were true. That Anne was frivolous, and had behaved with some indecorum, may be admitted; but opinions must continue to differ as to the degree of her guilt. She was arraigned before a commission of twenty-seven peers, presided over by the Duke of Norfolk. The evidence of the confessions was regarded as sufficient for her condemnation. Cranmer was induced to declare her marriage null and void, and on May 19, 1536, Anne Boleyn was beheaded.

Anne, DAUGHTER OF EDWARD IV. (b. 1475, d. 1511), was married in 1495 to Lord Thomas Howard, son of the Earl of Surrey, by whom she had one son, who died in infancy.

Anne, DAUGHTER OF RICHARD, DUKE OF YORK (d. 1475), was married first to Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter (q.v.), from whom she was divorced, and secondly to Sir Thomas St. Leger.

Anne Neville, QUEEN (b. 1454, d. 1485), wife of Richard III., was the younger daughter of Richard Neville, the great Earl of Warwick. In 1470 she was betrothed (though it is doubtful whether she was actually married) to Edward, Prince of Wales, son of Henry VI. After his death at Tewkesbury, in 1471, she was sought in marriage by Richard, then Duke of Gloucester. Clarence, who had married her sister Isabel, strongly opposed the match, and disguised her as a cookmaid; but she was discovered by Richard, married to him in 1473, and bore him a son in 1474. In 1483 she was crowned queen with Richard. In 1484 her young son died, "an unhappy death," according to the Continuator of the Croyland Chronicle; and the queen did not long survive him, dying on March 16, 1486.

Anne of Bohemia, QUEEN (b. 1367, d. 1394), wife of Richard II., the daughter of the Emperor Charles IV., was married to Richard in 1382. Her sweet and gentle disposition earned for her the title of "Good Queen Anne," and her influence seems to have had some effect in mitigating the violence and disorder of her husband's reign. It is said that the cruel reprisals taken on the Kentish revolt were discontinued at her intercession; and that the quarrel between the king and the citizens of London, which culminated in the riot of 1392, was healed by her mediation. In one instance only does her influence appear to have been bad. She took an active part in attempting to bring about the divorce of the king's favourite, De Vere, Earl of Oxford, from his wife, who was connected with several of the great noble families, in order that he might marry one of her German ladies, "the landgravine," as Froissart calls her. Anne of Bohemia was said to be well versed in the Bible, and to have read it in a Bohemian or German version; and she and her attendants, English and Bohemian, looked with considerable favour on Wiclif and his followers. The proscriptions of the "merciless" Parliament of 1386 were specially directed against the queen's attendants, and King Richard afterwards declared, at the trial of the Earl of Arundel (see State Trials, vol. i.) that the queen was three hours on her knees before the earl, pleading with tears for the life of John Calverley, one of her esquires. There is little doubt that the connection between England and Bohemia, brought about by Anne's marriage, must have done much to make the writings of Wiclif better known on the Continent, and especially in Germany.

Anne of Burgundy (d. 1432) was the daughter of John Sans Peur and sister of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy. She was married in 1423 to John, Duke of Bedford (q.v.).

Anne of Cleves, QUEEN (b. 1517, d. 1557), fourth wife of Henry VIII., was the daughter of John, third Duke of Cleves, by Marie, daughter of William, Duke of Jülich, Berg, and Ravensberg. Anxious to secure for England the goodwill of the Schmalkaldic League, Thomas Cromwell, after the death of Jane Seymour, proposed to Henry an alliance with the German Protestant princes by means of a marriage with Anne of Cleves; and the king, who was greatly pleased with a portrait he received of his intended bride, willingly lent himself to Cromwell's proposition.

Landing at Deal Dec. 27, 1539, Anne proceeded to Rochester, where Henry first saw her. Her person, however, failed altogether to come up to the expectations he had formed from her portrait. He called a council to consider if there was any possibility of getting out of the marriage engagement to her without involving himself in a quarrel with her family. A sort of prior contract between Anne and Francis, son of the Duke of Lorraine, was, however, the only respectable objection to the marriage that could be raised; and this, when named to the Duke of Cleves's ambassadors, was completely disposed of by an offer on their part to produce a formal renunciation of the contract. Henry was therefore obliged to submit to the distasteful marriage, which was celebrated at Greenwich on January 6, 1540. For a time Henry was able to treat his queen with a fair show of respect; but after the execution of Cromwell, the original proposer of the marriage, he sought no longer to conceal his feeling of aversion for her. The marriage was finally annulled, and the decision to that effect duly ratified by Parliament, on three grounds, viz. (1) that she had been previously contracted to the Duke of Lorraine; (2) that he, Henry, had not inwardly given his consent; (3) that the marriage had never been consummated. As some consolation to Anne for this loss of position, it was arranged that she should be treated as an adopted sister, and that she should enjoy the honours of precedence next to the queen and the king's daughter. These terms, and the further promise of an annual settlement of £3,000, procured Anne's willing assent to the proposed divorce. She passed the remainder of her days in England, where she died at her palace of Chelsea, July 16, 1557. By Queen Mary's orders her funeral was solemnised in Westminster Abbey with regal splendour.

Anne of Denmark, QUEEN (b. 1575, d. 1619), wife of James VI. of Scotland and I. of England, was the second daughter of Frederick II., King of Denmark, and was married to James in 1589. She seems to have been at one time a strong Roman Catholic, and at her coronation as Queen of England refused to receive the sacrament according to the rites of the English Church. But she took little part in politics, and the Roman Catholic party quickly found it was useless to hope for anything from her. With the exception of some occasional interference in the cause of a favourite, she seems to have contented herself with entertaining the king and his courtiers with balls and masques. She was never on very good terms with her husband, and took great delight in making him jealous and exposing him to ridicule. She is reported to have been on rather intimate terms both with the Earl of Murray, who was assassinated (it is suggested with the king's connivance) by the Earl of Huntley, and with Alexander Ruthven, brother of the Earl of Gowrie, who met with a similar fate. The pleasantest fact that is recorded about her is her intercession for Sir Walter Raleigh's life. Her character has been very differently represented, but perhaps Hume's estimate, that she was "a woman eminent neither for her vices nor her virtues," is on the whole the fairest one.

Annesley Case, THE (1743), arose out of a disputed claim to the honours and estates of the Anglesey peerage. Soon after the assumption of the title by Richard, sixth earl, James Annesley, who professed to be the son of Lord Altham, elder brother of the earl, laid claim to the title and estates. The claimant, who was popularly known as "the unfortunate young nobleman," stated that he had been kidnapped in infancy by his uncle's orders, and sent to the American colonies. On November 11, 1743, he commenced an action against his uncle in the Irish Court of Exchequer. The result of the trial (which was said to have been the longest known up to that time) was that he gained a verdict, but made no further effort to obtain his title. On the death of Richard, sixth earl, in 1761, the right of his son Arthur to succeed him was disputed. The Irish House of Lords confirmed his title. The English House of Lords, however, held that the earldom of Anglesey had expired with the father of this nobleman, who, however, continued to sit in the Irish Parliament as Viscount Valentia, and was subsequently created Earl of Mountmorris.

State Trials, xvii. 1139, &c.; Gentleman's Magazine, vol. xiii.

Annesley's Case (1719) produced an important constitutional dispute between the English and the Irish Houses of Lords. A suit for the possession of certain lands in Kildare, between Hester Sherlock and Maurice Annesley, had been decided in favour of the latter by the Irish Court of Exchequer. On appeal, the Irish House of Lords reversed the decision. This might have been considered final; but Annesley appealed to the English House of Lords, who affirmed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, and ordered Annesley to be put in possession of the estate. The court made an order accordingly, but the Sheriff of Kildare refused to execute it. He was thereupon fined £1,200, and brought his case before the Irish House of Lords. That body resolved, after taking the opinions of the judges, that the final right of appeal from the Irish courts lay with them, and ordered the Barons of the Exchequer into custody for acting on the decision of the English House. The latter, however, caused a Bill to be brought in (which passed by a majority of 63), asserting the inferior position of the Irish House of Lords, and depriving it of all appellant jurisdiction whatsoever. This Act was a mere stretch of power, for the Irish Lords had frequently entertained both writs of error and appeals in equity.

Annuities are certain sums of money paid yearly, and are charged upon the person or personal estate of the individual from whom they are due. If an annuity is charged upon real estate it is called a rent charge. Before the reign of Anne the annuities which had been granted by the crown as a reward for services performed, or for other reasons, had been charged upon the hereditary revenues, and it had been held that the king had power, in law, to bind his successors. On the accession of Queen Anne an Act was passed to restrain the alienation of any portion of the hereditary revenues for a longer period than the life of the reigning sovereign; so that it became the practice to re-grant annuities and pensions at the beginning of a fresh reign. On the establishment of a civil list under George III., government annuities were charged on it instead of on the hereditary revenues; and the indiscriminate granting of pensions by the crown was checked by Act of Parliament, 1782, the Irish annuities being regulated in 1793, and the Scotch in 1810. In 1837 the right of the crown to grant pensions was restricted to £1,200 a year, and to "such persons as have just claims on the royal beneficence." The system of granting annuities as a political bribe, which had been much in favour under the Stuarts, was done away with in 1706, when holders of government annuities were declared incapable of sitting in Parliament, though the Act was occasionally evaded by the granting of secret pensions. The system of raising government loans by means of annuities began in 1692, when the "Million Act" empowered the raising of that sum for the expenses of the French war by means of a tontine annuity, and several similar statutes were passed during the war of Queen Anne's reign. During the Austrian Succession and Seven Years' Wars, government annuities were frequently granted by way of bonus or premium to the subscribers of government loans. In 1773 a measure was passed through the House of Commons, under the auspices of Burke, to enable the working classes to invest their savings in the purchase of deferred annuities, but it was rejected by the Lords. In 1779 the government was authorised to raise £7,000,000 by annuity. "The government of that period," says Mr. Walford, "was driven to great extremities for raising money; nearly every session one or two Annuity Acts were passed, generally accompanied by a lottery." Acts were passed on the subject in 1808, 1817, and 1853; the last named, besides consolidating and amending the law on government annuities, inaugurated the system of granting annuities for small amounts through the medium of Savings Banks.

Anselm, St. (b. 1033, d. 1109), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at or near Aosta. His father, a vassal of Maurienne, was a man of some wealth and position, but of unthrifty habits and violent temper. When only fifteen Anselm ardently desired to enter the monastic life, but his father refused his consent. A severe illness did not soften the old man, and when his mother's death removed the last barrier to the father's tyranny, Anselm crossed the Alps with a single attendant to seek a career and escape his father's oppression. He spent three years in Burgundy, and was thence attracted to Normandy. After a sojourn at Avranches, where Lanfranc had once taught, Anselm removed to Bec, now flourishing under Lanfranc as prior. After a severe course of study and discipline he took the vows, at the age of twenty-seven. Three years later he was elected prior on Lanfranc removing to Caen. His administration made Bec inferior only to Cluny in general repute and superior to it in learning. Not only did Bec turn out great scholars, but Anselm infused a high intellectual tone into the whole monastery. He now published his famous Prologion and Monologion, and in 1078, when Herlwin died, was made abbot. This office led to several visits to England, to look after the estates Bec had obtained from the Conqueror. These visits made him widely known among all classes of Englishmen. He renewed his connection with Lanfranc, now archbishop, became acquainted with Eadmer of Canterbury, his future biographer, and established cordial relations with Earl Hugh of Chester. He had a good word to say for English saints like Alphege when Lanfranc denied their claims to martyrdom. Lanfranc died in 1089, and everyone recognised in Anselm the one man who could, as at Bec, continue Lanfranc's work and keep William II. in check. But William kept the see vacant four years, to secure, with the rich temporalities, freedom from unpleasant advice. In 1092 Anselm again visited England, very unwillingly, lest he should be accused of ambition, but overcame at last by the importunity for spiritual consolation of Earl Hugh, now very ill. Anselm was still in England when a sudden illness stirred Rufus's sluggish conscience, and he resolved to atone for his past crimes by making the Abbot of Bec archbishop. Anselm was almost dragged before the sick king's bed, and after a show of resistance, ludicrous if not sincere, was positively forced to accept the office. But if archbishop he would maintain all the rights of his church. Only on William's promise to resign the temporalities, to listen to Anselm's advice in things spiritual, and to acknowledge Urban II. instead of the imperial anti-Pope Clement, did he submit to consecration (Dec. 4, 1093). William soon recovered, relapsed into his old ways, and quarrelled with Anselm. Anselm's present of 500 marks was scornfully rejected as inadequate. His desire for the convocation of a council to check the tide of profrigacy and profanity was equally unheeded. At last William's refusal to acknowledge Urban, or to allow Anselm to go to Rome to receive the pallium from that Pope, led to a definite rupture. The Great Council of Rockingham failed to make Anselm give way to William; but the king ended the dispute himself by secretly acknowledging Urban, and getting from him Anselm's pallium. The fresh difficulty of Anselm's refusal to accept it from lay hands was got over by his taking it himself from the high altar of his cathedral. But within a year William brought him before the Curia Regis on a charge of inadequately fulfilling his feudal obligations in the Welsh war. Anselm now appealed to the Pope, wrung from Rufus a licence to travel, and left England in October, 1097. William at once seized on the estates of his see. At Rome, Anselm soon found that Urban, though very friendly, was too wary to quarrel with the English king. While in Italy he took part in two councils. At Bari he defended the double Procession against the Greeks. At the Lateran he shared in excommunicating all concerned with the sin of lay investiture. Tired of fruitless waiting, Anselm left Italy in the early summer of 1099, and lived chiefly at Lyons, till William's death and Henry's need of friends recalled him from exile. But though Henry had urged Anselm's immediate return, he required him before long to renew his homage, and be again "invested" with his archbishopric. Thus the investiture contest at last crossed over into England, but was conducted in a spirit different from that displayed by Gregory VII. and Henry IV. Anselm absolutely refused to yield; Henry insisted on prerogative and precedent; but king and prelate always treated each other with the utmost courtesy. An agreement to refer the matter to the Pope led only to Paschal II.'s strong support of Anselm; and as Henry would not give way, the primate went into exile a second time, in 1103. In 1105 Anselm felt compelled to threaten excommunication, but his ultimatum led to an interview and reconciliation with Henry, when the famous compromise was devised which half a generation later was accepted at Worms by Pope and Emperor. In 1106 Anselm returned. He gave canonical consecration to the bishops irregularly appointed during the rupture, and efficiently aided Henry against the feudalists. He found time to compose a treatise on the Agreement of Grace and Predestination with Free Will. He died April 21, 1109, aged seventy-six, and was buried next to Lanfranc at Canterbury. Not till the end of the fifteenth century did he receive formal canonisation from the worst of popes, Alexander VI.; but long before this Dante had placed him in paradise among the greatest saints of Christendom. Anselm's personal character was lofty and pure. But the saint in private life was also a churchman and a politician of high rank, the successful governor of a great abbey and greater see, and the author of the investiture compromise. He represented the highest ideals of mediæval Christendom. His contest with William and Henry was to him a struggle for principle and divine law against mere force and worldliness. That it involved the subordination of budding nationality to dying cosmopolitanism, the subjection of the state to a spiritual tyranny as ruthless as that of William, could not be seen by Anselm.

As the precursor of at least one side of scholastic philosophy, Anselm has an equal claim to fame. Although his unsystematic treatises became unduly neglected when brought into competition with the vast and methodical treatises of the later schoolmen, he, more than anyone else, gave that impulse to justify Scripture and the Church by reason and dialectic, which was the dominant idea of the most characteristic school of mediæval philosophy. In the Monologion, he tried to "elicit from the necessity of reason, without the aid of Scripture, the idea of God and the real foundation of it," by recourse to the Platonic theory of "ideas," as expressed by St. Augustine. In the Prosligion he pursues the same line still further, and anticipates Descartes' famous principle "that the idea of God in the human mind necessarily involves the reality of that idea." His Cur Deus Homo attempts to establish a logical and rational theory of the Incarnation, and has profoundly influenced all subsequent speculation on that subject. His crude realism passed away with the advent of more systematic thinking, but the impulse he gave remained permanent.

The best editions of Anselm's works are those of Dom Gerberon (Paris, 1675) and Migne (Patrologia Cursus Completus). Cur Deus Homo has been translated into English (Oxford, 1858), and the Monologion and Prosligion into French, with comments, in Bouchitté's Rationalisme Chrétien (Paris, 1842). Some of the Meditations have been done into English by Dr. Fusey.

Eadmer's Vita Anselmi and Historia Novella (printed in Migne, Patrolog., v. 159) are our great sources for the personal and political career of Anselm. After 1083 his history is the history of the time, and much therefore can be got from the general authorities for the period. They are fully and elaborately worked up in Mr. Freeman's William Rufus. Dean Church's Saint Anselm is the best general account of him in English, better than that in Dean Hook's Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury. Church's preface enumerates the chief modern works on Anselm. Professor Hasse's Anselm von Canterbury is full and careful. Professor Franck's work is shorter and more meagre. M. Charles de Rémusat's Saint Anselme de Canterbury is of great importance. There are other accounts by Möhler, Saisset, and Montalembert. An elaborate, though not altogether satisfactory, Life has been published (1888) by Mr. M. Eula.

ANSON, GEORGE, 1st BARON (b. 1697, d. 1761), in 1716 became second lieutenant of H.M.S. Hampshire, and during the two following years sailed under Admiral Byng in the Mediterranean. In 1724 he attained the rank of post-captain. He visited South Carolina, and founded the town of Anson (1738). In 1740 he was despatched with six vessels to sail round Cape Horn and rifle the shores of Peru. Beset by terrible storms, he appointed the island of Juan Fernandez as a rendezvous for his ships. Next scurvy broke out. The vessels at length arrived at the island, except the Wager, which was wrecked. The Spanish fleet sent to attack them was driven back into the Rio de la Plata. Foiled in his attempt to catch the Spanish treasure ship, Anson sailed westward from America with the Centurion, his sole remaining ship, and arrived at Spithead in June, 1744, after an absence of three years and nine months, during which he had circumnavigated the globe. He was at once appointed Rear-Admiral of the Blue and Commissioner of the Admiralty. In 1746 he was made Vice-Admiral. In the following year he commanded the Channel squadron, and defeated De la Jonquière off Cape Finisterre. For this exploit he was raised to the peerage. In 1749 he became Vice-Admiral of Great Britain, and in 1751 First Commissioner of the Admiralty. He commanded at the descent on Cherbourg in 1758. Anson's talents were of a rather mediocre order, and scarcely bore a proportion to the honours and success he attained. He was dull and somewhat unready in business, so that it was said of him after his famous expedition that he had been round the world but never in it. He was, however, a man of great courage, coolness, and determination.

ANSTRUTHER, SIR ROBERT (b. 1768, d. 1809), was quartermaster-general to Sir Ralph Abercromby's army in Egypt, in the campaign of 1801. In 1808 he went to Portugal with the reinforcements for Sir Arthur Wellesley's division, and was present at the battle of Vimiera, in command of a brigade. In the subsequent campaign of this year he commanded the rear-guard of Sir John Moore's army during the retreat. He died of exhaustion and fatigue, brought on by his exertions during the campaign, the day after the army arrived at Corunna, and was buried at that city by the side of his commander.

Antigua, the most important of the Leeward Islands, was discovered by Columbus in 1493. In 1632 an English settlement was founded in the island by Sir Thomas Warner, a further influx of colonists from Britain taking place in 1663, in which year a grant of the island was made to Lord Willoughby. In 1666 it was ravaged by a French expedition from Martinique, but by the Treaty of Breda, in the same year, was formally ceded to Britain. In 1710 an insurrection caused by the misconduct of the governor, Colonel Park, took place, and the governor was slain; in 1737 a proposed rebellion of the negroes was crushed before it came to anything. The emancipation of the slaves in 1834 was effected without any of the disturbances which took place in Jamaica. In 1871 Antigua became part of the Federation of the Leeward Islands, and is the residence of the governor-in-chief; even before that date it was a representative colony, its affairs being administered by a governor, a legislative council nominated by the crown, and an elective legislative assembly of fourteen members.

Anti-Jacobin, THE, was a magazine established in Nov., 1797, and brought out weekly until the following July, under the editorship of William Gifford. The object of the paper was mainly political, being intended to satirise the Jacobin principles of the Fox section of the Whigs. The most distinguished of its contributors were John Hookham Frere and George Canning, the latter of whom was the author of the celebrated story of the "Needy Knife Grinder." Though its object was political, it contained much parody of the literature of the day, especially of Southey and Darwin, both of whom afforded fertile subjects for Canning's wit. The Anti-Jacobin as at first projected had but a short life. The first number was published Nov. 20, 1797, and the last on July 9 in the following year. It was, however, continued on a new plan, with less of a political and more of a literary character, until 1818. Some of the papers that appeared in it have frequently been reprinted.

Antrim, ALEXANDER MACDONNELL, 3RD EARL OF (b. 1616, d. 1699), was a Roman Catholic, and an active supporter in Ireland of James II. after the Revolution. He was sent with 1,200 men to occupy Londonderry, but the inhabitants shut the gates in his face, and he thought it prudent to retire to Coleraine. At the battle of the Boyne his cavalry fled, without striking a blow, before the enemy. Lord Antrim was attainted of high treason, but was subsequently included in the provisions of the Treaty of Limerick, and his honours and estates were restored to him.

Antrim, RANDAL MACDONNELL, MARQUIS OF (d. 1682), was employed in 1641 to gain over the Irish army, and he greatly ingratiated himself with the Catholics. Though a Catholic and a Cavalier, he was eager to fight the Ulster rebels, and offered his aid to Monroe, who, however, treacherously seized him, and kept him a prisoner for eight months, when he escaped, joined Owen O'Neil, and became one of the Kilkenny Council, pretending that he would bring 10,000 men over to England. The 1,500 men under Kolkitto who joined Montrose in 1644 were sent by him. Clarendon says of him that he was a narrow-minded and vain man, and aspired to supplant Ormonde as a commander, though wholly unfit for the post.

Antwerp, THE SURRENDER OF (1706), was an important advantage for the allies in the War of the Spanish Succession. The town was the key to the Scheldt fortresses, and in fact commanded the whole of Brabant and West Flanders. "It might otherwise be described," says Mr. Burton, "as representing in enlargement the relation of its own citadel to the minor fortified works attached to its walls, since it was the centre of convergence to a group of fortified towns bound to it by an apparatus of dykes and canals." Marlborough was so convinced of its importance that he termed his plans against it "the great design." The fortress had previously been occupied by Boufflers, who had driven Opdam from it. After the battle of Ramillies, Cadogan was sent to summon the town. Marlborough awaited the news with anxiety, as a siege would cause great delay. The inhabitants were, however, to a man in favour of their new king, and the French were therefore compelled to give up the town. For the remainder of the war it remained in the hands of the allies.

Appa Sahib was the nephew of Ragojee Bhonslah [MAHRATTAS], on whose death (1816) he became regent of Nagpore, in consequence of the idiocy of the heir, Passwajee. Being opposed by a powerful faction in the court and zenana, he turned to the English, and a subsidiary treaty was concluded May 27, 1816, which provided that a force of 6,000 infantry, and a regiment of cavalry, together with the due proportion of artillery, should be subsidised by the Nagpore state at an expense of seven lacs and a half per annum; and that the rajah should engage in no foreign negotiation without the concurrence of the British government. On Feb. 1, 1817, Passwajee was strangled by order of Appa Sahib, who immediately mounted the throne with the title of Madajee Bhonsalah. Anxious to be freed from dependence, he entered into the Mahratta confederacy against the English, while professing the most inviolable attachment to the latter. On hearing of the attack made on Mr. Elphinstone by Bajee Rao on Nov. 5, he inveighed against such perfidy in very strong terms, though at the same time he was preparing his resources for a treacherous attack on the English residency. This actually took place soon after, and was followed by the gallant defence of the Tulbuldee hills by the British against the forces of the rajah, which terminated in his complete defeat. On Dec. 15 the Resident was able to require the rajah to surrender at discretion, on the understanding that his throne would be restored to him. He was restored to his dignities Jan. 8, 1818; but again proving treacherous, was once more dethroned, and died a pensioner on the bounty of Runjeet Singh.

Appeal of Treason. [TREASON.]

Appeals to Rome. [PAPACY.]

Appellants, or Lords Appellant, was the name given to the nobles who in 1387 "appealed" of treason Richard II.'s ministers, De Vere, Neville, De la Pole, Tresilian, and Brember. When it was known that the king, with the aid of his supporters in various parts of the country and the citizens of London, was attempting to resume the full exercise of his authority, of which he had been deprived by the commission forced on him the previous year, the Duke of Gloucester, with a large body of troops, marched to London, and compelled him (Nov. 17) to receive a petition of complaint against the royal counsellors. On this proceeding he immediately fled. The Appellants exhibited the bill of impeachment in the Parliament which met in Feb., 1388, and, in spite of the protests of the judges, it was carried. Three of the ministers had already escaped from the kingdom; but Tresilian and Brember were arrested and put to death. The Appellants were five in number—the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Derby, Nottingham, Warwick, and Arundel. [RICHARD II.; GLOUCESTER, THOMAS, DUKE OF.]

Appellate Jurisdiction is "the jurisdiction exercised by a court of justice at the instance of a person complaining of the decision of another court called, in reference to the court of appeal, the court below." Before the Norman Conquest no suit could be carried to a higher tribunal until it had been first heard in the Hundred Court; thence an appeal lay to the Shire Moot, and thence to the Witenagemot, which was the final court of appeal. Under the Norman kings, appeals were decided in the Curia Regis; while the appeal from the ordinary law courts under Henry II. lay to the sovereign as the source of justice, and to the Concilium Ordinarium. By degrees, however, petitions for redress were addressed to the Chancellor rather than the king; and in the reign of Edward III. the Court of Chancery was constituted as a Court of Equity, but not of appeal. The Concilium Ordinarium (and not the Commune Concilium) was for long the only court of appeal; by degrees its appellate jurisdiction passed to the House of Lords, whose power to hear common law appeals has never been questioned. In 1661, however, in the famous case of Shirley v. Fagg, the Commons denied that the Lords could hear appeals from equity; but this right, first asserted in the reign of Charles I., has never been attacked since. In 1358, the Court of Exchequer Chamber was created as an intermediate court of appeal between the Common Law Courts and the House of Lords; the powers of this court were extended in 1585, and reconstituted in 1831. Under Henry VIII., appeals from the ecclesiastical courts to Rome were forbidden under the penalty of præmunire, and appeals from the archbishops' courts were declared to lie to the king in Chancery, who was to appoint Lords Delegates of Appeals to hear appeals from the Admiralty, ecclesiastical, and baronial courts. In 1832 this appellate jurisdiction was transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. By the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (36 & 37 Vict., c. 60) of 1873, the appellate functions of this committee, and of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, were transferred to the High Court of Appeal constituted by that Act, with appellate jurisdiction from all courts of common law and equity, and from the Palatine Courts of Durham and Lancaster. The final appeal was still left to the House of Lords. [CHANCERY; EXCHEQUER CHAMBER; LORDS, HOUSE OF.]

Apprentices are persons bound by indentures to serve a master for a certain period, receiving in return for their services maintenance and instruction in their master's craft. The system of apprenticeship in England is of very ancient date, and probably was instituted as early as the trade guilds themselves. In mediæval times the principle of combination amongst members of one trade was universally recognised, and in order to practise any craft it was necessary to become free of the company or gild of that craft. This freedom was obtained by serving an apprenticeship of so many years; and as the number of apprentices which each master was allowed to take was usually limited, a material check was placed upon the numbers of those who were privileged to exercise each trade. Although the system of apprenticeship existed in England from about the twelfth century, and is occasionally referred to in Acts of Parliament (s.g., 12 Rich. II., c. 3), it was not until 1563 that the famous Statute of Apprentices was passed. By this Act no person was allowed to exercise a trade unless he had previously served a seven years' apprenticeship to it, though the restriction did not, of course, affect trades which were established in England after the passing of the statute. This Act was speedily found very burdensome, and, although it was held to apply only to towns, it was repealed in 1814 on the recommendation of a committee of the House of Commons; some reservations were, however, made "in favour of the customs and by-laws of the city of London and of other cities, and of corporations and companies lawfully constituted." In 1601 it was enacted that the overseers of a parish might bind pauper children as apprentices until their twenty-fourth year, but in 1728 the age was reduced to twenty-one. In 1845 an Act was passed which regulated the binding of boys apprenticed on board vessels, such boys to be between the ages of twelve and seventeen. The terms of apprenticeship in Ireland and Scotland were much less than in England, varying from five to three years, and in Scotland, says Adam Smith, "the corporation laws are less oppressive than in any part of Europe." Apprenticeship, though not now necessary, except in a few cases (as that of solicitors and the like), is frequently entered into by contract, the master being in all cases bound to provide necessary food, clothing, and lodging. The apprentices of the Elizabethan and Stuart periods were usually the sons of yeomen or tradesmen, and, being forbidden to wear the genteel rapier, carried a stout bat or club. Hence the cry when an uproar commenced of "'Prentices! clubs!" From the time of the Tudors the apprentices of London were the special "champions of mercantile jealousy arrayed against aristocratic arrogance; and are to be found in almost every London riot, until they were finally the conquerors at Marston Moor and Naseby."

Appropriation of Supplies. The successive maxims, the enforcement of which finally secured to the Commons the complete control of taxation, were: (1) that the Parliament alone could grant supplies, and the Commons alone originate such grants; (2) that their petitions for redress must be answered before supplies should be granted; (3) that the right to grant includes the right to decide the appropriation of the grant for definite purposes, and to demand the audit of its expenditure. The Parliament of the sixteenth century saw the two former of these claims constantly evaded by the arbitrary or underhand action of the crown. They began also to see that the way to counteract this, and to counteract at the same time the extravagance or dishonesty of the minister of the crown, was by putting in force the third claim. This had been suggested in the early struggles of the thirteenth century; as in 1237, when the crown offered to allow a committee of the Great Council to supervise the expenditure of the grant then asked for. The plan comes forward again in 1262 and in 1266; its importance, however, was not yet realised. No doubt under Edward I. it was felt to be enough that Parliament alone should make grants, while under Edward III., Parliament advanced to the principle of redress before supply; yet the principle of appropriation was, even in these reigns, plainly exhibited in the custom of explaining to the country in the writ of summons to Parliament what the specific purpose was of the grant about to be demanded, whether for a French, a Welsh, or a Scotch war, or for defence of the seas, or for protection against invasion. Indeed, under Edward III. the grant was commonly stated to be made for this particular purpose; while in 1377 the grant for defence of the seas is put by the Commons into the hands of the London citizens, Walworth and Philpot, to expend; and in 1390 is clearly displayed the distinction between the ordinary and the war expenditure, ten shillings and thirty shillings respectively being allotted to each, out of the forty shillings tax on every sack of wool. The principle thus established was fully accepted in the Lancastrian reigns. Tonnage and poundage, for instance, became the recognised appropriation for defence of the seas, as the household expenses were supposed to be provided out of the crown lands; and Fortescue wished the principle carried further, so that the crown lands should be redeemed, and inalienably set apart for such extraordinary expenses as embassies, pensions, protection against invasion, &c. It was, in fact, the increasing poverty of the crown that directed attention to the distinction of the various heads of expenditure, and the need of a strict system of appropriation; and it was natural, therefore, that when the crown, in Yorkist and Tudor hands, became wealthy as well as despotic, these distinctions, and the appropriations among them, should be lost sight of. Parliament met but rarely; tonnage and poundage were granted for the king's life; benevolences filled up the royal coffers, already enriched by forfeitures; and not till the reign of Charles II. is the control resumed by the old means—the first case being in 1665, when a grant was made for purposes of the war alone. After the Revolution, ministers brought in annual estimates of the sums required under different heads; and Fox's resolution in 1781 would have effected this still more completely, by making it illegal to issue any moneys not appropriated by Parliament. This has now become a constitutional rule, and in the annual estimates the sums asked of Parliament are specifically appropriated to their several purposes, and the Budget voted item by item. The principle has been completed by the reforms originated by Burke, which have reduced the Civil List to an amount fixed to meet the actual personal and royal expenses of the sovereign, and relieved him of many payments for national objects, so that Parliament no longer has schedules of crown debts to pay off at intervals, and its strict rights of appropriation now extend over crown expenses as over all other heads of public expenditure.

Aquablance, PETER OF (d. 1268), was one of the numerous foreign ecclesiastics who thronged to England in Henry III.'s reign. In 1240 he was made Bishop of Hereford, and was one of the most obnoxious foreign advisers of the king. He was driven from his see by the barons in 1262, and his goods were sequestered.

Aquitaine, THE DUCHY OF, in the south of France, which comprised Guienne, Perigieux, Limoges, Auvergne, Saintonge, La Marche, Poitou and Gascony, besides smaller territories, was first brought into connection with England by the marriage of Henry II. with Eleanor, heiress of the last Duke of Aquitaine. John lost Poitou, but the rest of the province remained in the hands of the English king. By the Treaty of Abbeville, in 1259, Aquitaine became a fief, held by the King of England as a vassal of the French crown. For a short while in Edward I.'s reign, Aquitaine was occupied by the French; and one of the chief causes of the war with France in the reign of Edward III. was the attempt of Philip VI. to regain possession of the duchy. In 1360 the Treaty of Bretigny once more secured Aquitaine to the English king, with the addition of Poitou, but not including Auvergne. But the renewal of the war brought defeats and losses on the English, with the result that in 1374 nothing remained to them of Aquitaine but some small pieces of territory round Bayonne and Bordeaux. Henry V. won back the province, only for his son to lose everything; and the final result of the Hundred Years' War was the incorporation of Aquitaine into the French kingdom.

Arabella Stuart, LADY (b. 1577, d. 1615), was the daughter of the Earl of Lennox, brother of Lord Darnley. Thus she was first cousin to James I. and great-granddaughter of Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. During her early life, Queen Elizabeth often spoke of Arabella as her possible successor, in case James did not conduct himself according to her satisfaction; and though on Elizabeth's death James I. succeeded to the English crown without opposition, there were some who maintained that Arabella, having been born in England, had a better title to the crown than James, who was an alien. [STUART, FAMILY OF.] One of the objects of the Main Plot would seem to have been to depose James and place Arabella on the throne, though it is very improbable that Arabella herself knew anything of the designs of the conspirators. She continued to live at court till 1610, when, contrary to the king's wishes, she privately married Sir William Seymour, afterwards Marquis of Hertford, and a member of the Suffolk branch of the royal family. This union of two possible claimants to the throne was regarded by James with great apprehension; Seymour was at once sent to the Tower, and Arabella confined at Lambeth, to be shortly after conveyed to Durham. While on her way thither she managed to escape, and took ship for France, her husband having got out of the Tower and fled to Ostend. But before Arabella could reach Calais, the vessel was captured, and she was committed to the Tower. Her reason gave way, and after four years' imprisonment she died. Her character was remarkably amiable, and she never appears to have engaged personally in the intrigues carried on in her name.

Aracan is a division of British Burmah, lying along the eastern coast of the Bay of Bengal, extending from Chittagong to Cape Negrais. The district at one time belonged to the Moguls, and was subsequently partly in the hands of the Portuguese. In 1783 it was conquered by the Burmese, by whom it was ceded to the English, as a result of the first Burmese War in 1826.

Arbuthnot, JOHN, M.D. (b. 1666, d. 1735), author, wit, and physician, the son of a Scottish Episcopal clergyman, after taking a medical degree at Aberdeen University, came to London in search of a fortune. He acquired some literary reputation by a criticism of Dr. Woodward's Account of the Deluge, and Tables of Grecian, Roman, and Jewish Measures, Weights, and Coins, a work of considerable research. About 1704 accident threw him in the way of Prince George of Denmark, Queen Anne's husband, and he became the queen's physician, and the intimate friend of the foremost political writers of the Tory party. In 1712 he wrote a political allegory, The History of John Bull, which Macaulay calls the most humorous political satire in our language. Its object was to throw ridicule on the War of the Spanish Succession, and he represents John Bull, the Englishman, Nick Frog, the Frenchman, and Louis Baboon (Bourbon), the Spaniard, as tradesmen squabbling over a lawsuit, Marlborough being the Attorney Hocus, who tries to prolong the contest. On the death of Queen Anne, in 1714, Arbuthnot joined Swift, Pope, and other Tory men of letters, in founding the Scriblerus Club, the object of which was to chastise literary quacks. The first book of their uncompleted work, The Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, was undoubtedly by his pen, and it is a very fine piece of light satire. Arbuthnot wrote besides many works on medical subjects, which had great reputation in their day.

Archbishops. The territorial extent of an archbishop's authority is called a province, from the name of an administrative division of the Roman empire. Archbishops do not form an order apart from bishops. An archbishop in England has a bishop's authority within his own diocese, and is also chief of the clergy, and has power to correct the faults of bishops throughout his province. When, in 597, at the bidding of Gregory the Great, Augustine was on his way to England, he received episcopal consecration at Arles. The design of Gregory was that there should be two metropolitan sees in England—at London and York—following the twofold division of the Roman province. Augustine, however, dwelt at Canterbury, which thus became the seat of the southern metropolitan. England was not wholly converted from Kent. Different missions succeeded at various dates in the kingdoms into which the land was divided, and in consequence a danger arose from lack of unity in the Church. From this she was saved by Archbishop Theodore (668—690). His plan was that there should be only one archbishopric, and he gathered all the bishops together in one synod. After his death his scheme perished. Pope Gregory's plan was revived as more in accordance with national feeling, and in 735 the see of York was made an archbishopric. Offa, King of Mercia, similarly attempted to give expression to the brief period of Mercian supremacy by setting up a third archbishopric at Lichfield, which lasted from 787 till 803. In 1143 Henry of Blois, Bishop of the royal city of Winchester, applied to Pope Innocent II. to convert his see into an archbishopric and rid him of the authority of Canterbury, but did not obtain his object. Before the Conquest the archbishopric of York was below that of Canterbury in dignity. In 1093 Thomas of York objected to the title of Metropolitan of Great Britain being applied to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The objection was held good. The Archbishop of Canterbury was declared to be Primate, first in rank, but York was and is also a metropolitan see, though the Archbishop of Canterbury has the title of Primate and Metropolitan of all England. In 1119 Thurstan of York defeated an attempt to make him profess obedience to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Welsh bishops owned the authority of Canterbury. An unsuccessful attempt was made in 1199 to restore to St. David's the archiepiscopal dignity which it had in the time of the British Church. Until 1152 the Irish bishops received consecration from the Archbishop of Canterbury; and in the twelfth century his authority in Scotland was disputed by the Archbishop of York, until, in 1188, the Scotch Church was made immediately dependent on Rome. The Archbishop of Canterbury had a kind of patriarchal authority, and Archbishop Anselm was greeted by Pope Urban II. as the Pope and Patriarch of a second world. His position in the state was one of great importance, and he has always stood next after the sovereign, whom it is his duty to crown. The right of electing the archbishops pertains, as in the case of bishops, to the Chapters of their churches. The dignity of the see of Canterbury caused frequent interference with the right of the monastic Chapter of Christ Church. A voice in the election was claimed by the suffragan bishops; but their claim was disallowed by Innocent III. The crown interfered oftener and more directly in the appointment of one who was its constitutional adviser than in the case of other elections. The Pope managed in many instances to secure the election of his nominee. His influence was insured (1) because it was held necessary that the archbishops should receive from him the pall, an ecclesiastical vestment, without which an archbishop did not consecrate bishops; (2) and because (in later times) the Pope also granted to the archbishop the authority of a legate. The right of the Archbishop of Canterbury to the legatine commission was asserted by Archbishop Anselm, and finally gained by Archbishop Langton in 1291. This right did not preclude the visits of special legates a latere, but it was an infringement of it to grant a permanent legatine commission for England to any one else, as in the case of Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, since the Archbishop of Canterbury was legatus natus. The Archbishop of York also had the pall, and from about 1350 the legatine commission. The provincial jurisdiction of the archbishops was exercised in their Provincial Courts. The judge of the Provincial Court of Canterbury was the Official Principal. In the Court of Arches, so called because held in St. Mary le Bow (de Arcebus), the Dean of Arches exercised the archbishop's jurisdiction over certain peculiars, or parishes exempt from the ordinary episcopal jurisdiction. As the offices of Official Principal and Dean of Arches were usually vested in the same person, the Court and Dean of Arches came to be inexactly spoken of as if they signified the court and judge of the archbishop's provincial jurisdiction. The final appeal from this court lay, after the breach with Rome, to a body called the High Court of Delegates (25 Henry VIII., c. 19). By 3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 41, the appellate jurisdiction of this court was conferred on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The office of Official Principal, both of Canterbury and York, is now, by the Public Worship Regulation Act (37 and 38 Vict., c. 85), merged in that of a judge appointed by the archbishops, subject to the approval of her Majesty. This judge exercises the provincial jurisdiction of both archbishops as the Official Principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury and the Chancery Court of York. The archbishops summon and preside over the provincial synods or Convocations (q.v.). [For Archbishops of Dublin, St. Andrew's, &c., see IRISH CHURCH; SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF.]

Architecture. In England there are many remains of the peoples who dwell in the land before the coming of the Romans. These remains are chiefly sepulchral, and show that the chief object of attention was the erection of memorials to the dead. These prehistoric remains may be roughly classified as (1) monoliths, single stones standing upright; (2) cromlechs, or table stones, consisting of one large stone supported by others, as at Kit's Coty House, near Maidstone; (3) stone circles, as at Stonehenge, Avebury, and Long Meg and her Daughters, near Penrith; (4) barrows, oblong or round, which consist of mounds of earth containing sepulchral chambers. These barrows are scattered over the country, but are generally to be found on moorland. Besides these are traces of lake dwellings—houses built on wooden platforms supported by piles driven into the bottom of lakes, accessible by planks from the mainland. There are also traces of sculptured ornaments on boulders of stone, which are especially frequent in Northumberland. There are also earthworks of camps and the foundations of fortified villages to be found in many places amongst the hills.

When the Romans came to Britain they brought with them the art of building in stone. They built towns and houses, which, however, were all destroyed, though the sites of Roman villas, their mosaic pavements, the hypocausts, or cellars with flues to warm the house, may be still traced in many places. But the greatest memorials of Roman building are their military works, especially the great wall extending from the Tyne to the Solway, whose course may still be traced, with its military stations and remains of buildings outside. The station of Housesteads, near Hexham, has been called "the English Pompeii." After the departure of the Romans the English conquest drove the Britons from the cities, which fell into decay. The English themselves lived in villages, in houses built of clay, or wood, or wattles. After their conversion to Christianity they began to build churches, of oaken planks, sometimes covered with lead. Benedict Biscop, a Northumbrian thegn, went over to Gaul and brought back workmen, who, at the end of the seventh century, built a stone church, or basilica, for the monastery of Wearmouth. Wilfrid followed, and built churches at York and Hexham, remains of which may still be seen. Still, before the Norman Conquest architecture did not make much advance in England. Stone towers were built with wooden naves, and the remains of what is called Saxon architecture are few. The tower of Earl's Barton Church, in Northamptonshire, is one of the most important examples.

The Norman Conquest gave the signal for a great age of ecclesiastical architecture in England. Vast cathedrals were built in the massive, round-arched style which had gradually developed from the Roman constructions, and which is known as Romanesque or Norman. Of this style, very striking specimens are the cathedrals of Norwich, Peterborough, and Ely, and Malmesbury Abbey. The cathedral of Durham shows an attempt at emancipation from the traditions of the Norman builders. The introduction of the pointed arch, which was probably first employed in rebuilding the east end of Canterbury Cathedral after the fire in 1174, made a great change in architectural construction. The activity in the way of church building in the north, as shown in the Yorkshire abbeys, still further developed an English style of architecture, which first made itself manifest in Lincoln Cathedral (1200), and Salisbury (1220—1258). This style, which is known as the Early English, is remarkable for its lancet windows, which are either single or grouped in graceful designs. The increase of the use of painted glass as a necessary part of church decoration led to an adoption of French principles and the introduction of geometrical tracery, which marked the architecture of the reigns of Edward I. and Edward II. The Angel Choir at Lincoln, the abbeys of Tintern and Gainsborough, and the chapel of Merton College, Oxford, may be given as examples of the progress of this geometrical style. It lasted, however, but a short time; the restlessness which marked the reign of Edward III. was expressed in the desire for new inventions, and geometrical tracery gave way to flowing or curvilinear tracery of the style that is called Decorated, specimens of which may be seen in Carlisle Cathedral. It would seem that the vagaries of the Decorated style awakened a reaction. In the flowing tracery strength and construction were alike lost sight of, till the Perpendicular style was hailed with delight as being sounder. This style was first made popular by William of Wykeham, in his buildings at Winchester and at Oxford, and prevailed for above a century, during the fourteenth and first half of the fifteenth centuries. Its characteristics were a stern regard to the needs of construction. Straight lines ran from the bottom to the top of the window, which was regarded as merely a frame for painted glass. Regularity and proportion were everywhere insisted upon, and fancy was no longer allowed a place. The chapel of King's College, Cambridge, is a good example of the Perpendicular style, but there are many instances to be found in every locality of a style which was so long in use.

The development of ecclesiastical architecture was the chief feature of this period. England produced no great municipal buildings. The towns did not rise to the same independent position as that which fostered the development of municipal architecture on the Continent. The dwellings of the barons were military fortresses, and were at first reproductions of the castles of Normandy. Castle-building, however, soon became an eminently English art. The massive keeps of the Norman castles were surrounded by curtain walls connecting one tower with another, and weaving the whole pile into a strong and picturesque mass of buildings. In the reigns of the Edwards these castles assumed their largest proportions, and their remains are to be seen most clearly on the Welsh and Scottish marches. Some may be traced in ruins, others have been altered into modern dwellings, but still retain many of their ancient features. The castles of Alnwick, Berkeley, Chepstow, Kenilworth, Warwick, Rochester, and Windsor are amongst the most striking examples. Another class of mediæval buildings peculiar to England is found in the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, and the schools of Eton and Winchester. Taking as their model monastic buildings, the architects adapted them to the conditions of secular life, and built quadrangles round the chapel and common hall. The great hall was, moreover, a feature of the castle, and received the greatest architectural care; particularly in the construction of the roof. The halls of the royal palaces of Westminster (Richard II.) and Eltham (Henry IV.) still remain as examples of the constructive ingenuity of their builders.

The Tudor reigns saw a great increase in the material prosperity of England and in its internal quiet. The suppression of the monasteries removed one of the principal supports of ecclesiastical architecture. The comforts of domestic life increased. The castles and fortified manor-houses of the troubled times of the Middle Ages were either abandoned or were converted into dwelling-houses more suitable for peaceful times. At first this was done in accordance with the principles of Gothic architecture. But the movement of the Renaissance towards a revival of the classical style had begun in Italy, and spread over France. It was long in taking possession of England, but it affected it unconsciously in details. The style known as Jacobean was Gothic in feeling, but adopted with some timidity classical ornamentation. It corresponded to the change through which England was passing in religion and literature alike. The memorials of this style are chiefly to be found in dwelling-houses. Churches were not required, as the number already existing was more than ample for the population. The University of Cambridge, which was at that period very flourishing, has some excellent examples in Caius and Clare Colleges, and in Neville's Court in Trinity. The great houses that were now built served for some time as models for English houses. They differed from the designs in vogue on the Continent, and showed an adaptation to the needs of English climate. They were built round courtyards, after the old fashion; but the entrance was on the outside, and the windows of the main rooms looked outwards to the country, not into the courtyard. Knowle may be taken as an example of the Gothic style of dwelling-house. Longleat, Temple Newsam, Longford Castle, Hardwicke Hall, and Hatfield House are examples of various forms of classical adaptations. All of them are picturesque, graceful in proportions, and comfortable in their arrangements, though their ornamentation shows learning misunderstood and improperly applied. The most conspicuous instance of this is the gateway of the Bodleian Library at Oxford, where the five orders of classical architecture are piled one upon another, and the whole is crowned by Gothic pinnacles.

In the reign of Charles I., the architectural style of the Italian Renaissance found its full development in England under the influence of Inigo Jones, an architect of great ability, who studied in Italy under the last great Italian architect Palladio. On his return to England, Inigo Jones designed a mighty palace for the king at Whitehall. The Banqueting House was executed from his designs, but the troubles of Charles I. prevented the plan from being carried out. Jones's scheme was conceived on a gigantic scale; had it been executed, the Palace of Whitehall would have been the most splendid in Europe. Jones showed the possibility of dignified simplicity in a Protestant church, by the building of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, the first ecclesiastical building of any importance since the Reformation. The Restoration found its architect in a man of real learning and cultivation, Sir Christopher Wren, whose earliest work is the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford. The Great Fire of London, in 1666, gave Wren an opportunity, such as few architects have enjoyed, of modelling the architectural aspect of a great city. He prepared a plan for the rebuilding of London, which unfortunately was not carried out. However, he was asked to rebuild St. Paul's Cathedral and nearly fifty other churches. In St. Paul's Cathedral Wren built the largest and most splendid church, after St. Peter's in Rome, that had been attempted in the classical style. Besides this, he studded the city with graceful steeples, that lent dignity to the proportions of St. Paul's dome, which towered above them. The chief of these are the spires of Bow Church; St. Bride's, Fleet Street; St. Michael's, Cornhill; St. Stephen's, Walbrook; and St. Dunstan's-in-the-East. In all his buildings Wren showed great constructive ingenuity and a delight in solving difficult problems, though at times he has allowed this to overcome his artistic taste. Few cities bear so clearly the impress of one man's architectural genius as does London that of Wren.

The successors of Wren in the beginning of the eighteenth century were Hawksmoor, who built the church of St. George's, Bloomsbury, and Sir John Vanbrugh. Vanbrugh, a Dutchman by descent, was happy in the opportunity of having entrusted to him a monumental work of national importance. He was commissioned to build Blenheim Palace as a gift of the nation to the Duke of Marlborough. His plan is vast and grand. He certainly aimed at giving enduring stability to his work. But though the general design was dignified, there is a clumsiness and want of proportion in the adaptation of details that leaves an impression of heaviness and gloom. In the building of Castle Howard, Vanbrugh shows the same attempt at grandeur, but with more sobriety. An architect whose work shows more artistic feeling is James Gibbs, whose most important buildings are the church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields and the Radcliffe Library at Oxford.

The middle of the eighteenth century saw a development of the study of classical archaeology, which immediately reacted on architecture. Especially Stuart's work on The Architecture of Athens, commenced in 1762, affected popular taste. The architecture of the Italian Renaissance, which had hitherto been pursued in England, was classical in sentiment, and used classical details while freely adapting them to its own purposes. The end of the eighteenth century saw a learned revival of pure classical architecture, freed from its Italian adaptations. This absolute copying of classical antiquity became a fashion. Churches were built like Grecian temples, as, for instance, the church of St. Pancras, with its caryatid porticoes and model of a small temple erected by way of a spire on a larger one. No large building was erected except in the severest classical style, with portico, whether needful or not. The British Museum is one of the least successful of the buildings of this school; St. George's Hall at Liverpool is one of the most happy. But this classical revival in architecture was soon met by a Gothic revival, which may be said to date from Horace Walpole, but took a great hold on popular taste after Beckford's revival of Fonthill Abbey in the shape of a gentleman's house. Its architect, Wyatt, was entrusted with the restoration of several of our cathedrals. Houses were built in the form of Gothic castles or abbeys. The rage for strictly classical imitations was succeeded by a rage for exact reproduction of Gothic designs. The writings of Britton, Rickman, Pugin, and many others lent the resources of careful archaeology to this revival, which corresponded also with the Tractarian movement within the English Church. In obedience to the desire of restoring the assumed reverence and faith of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, churches throughout England have been "restored," or brought back, to what some ingenious archaeologist guesses to have been their original aspect. Innumerable churches have been built in imitation of Gothic models; and in secular buildings, the Houses of Parliament, and more recently the Law Courts, were erected in Gothic style, and have taxed the ingenuity of their architects to find the accommodation necessary for modern purposes in buildings constructed in the style of an age when such purposes were unknown.

Arcot, DEFENCE OF (1751). The victories of the confederation formed by Duplex against the English were checked by the expedition to Arcot under Clive. Chunda Sahib was obliged to detach a large force, thereby relieving the pressure on the British garrison cooped up in Trichinopoly. The fort of Arcot was defended only by a low and lightly-built parapet; several of the towers were decayed, and the ditch was partly choked up. From the day of its occupation, August 30, 1751, Clive had been incessantly employed in repairing the defences, but the place seemed little capable of standing a siege. Of his eight officers, one had been killed, and two wounded, in successive encounters with the enemy, and a fourth had returned to Madras. The troops fit for duty had been reduced by casualties and disease to 120 Europeans and 200 sepoy, and it was with this small body that Clive sustained for seven weeks the incessant assault of 10,000 native troops and 150 Europeans. On the last day of the siege the enemy endeavoured to storm the fort, but, during a conflict which lasted more than eighteen hours, they were repulsed on every point, and next morning retired from the town.

Ardanesbi, BATTLE OF (719), was a naval engagement fought between the two branches of the Scots of Dalriada—the Cinel Gabran and the Cinel Loarn. Dunchadt, King of Kintyre, was chief of the Cinel Gabran, and Selvach, at the head of the Cinel Loarn, the latter being defeated. Ardanesbi, according to Mr. Skene, is "probably the point of Ardmirish, on the island of Gigha."

Arden, EDWARD (d. 1583), was implicated in a project for the assassination of Elizabeth, by the confession of his son-in-law, the conspirator John Somerville. He had incurred the enmity of the Earl of Leicester, and, after an unfair trial, was executed at Tyburn, December, 1583. His guilt, however, is very doubtful, and he probably fell a victim to the enmity of Leicester.

Ardwulf (EARDWULF), King of Northumbria (798—810), was placed on the throne after the interregnum which followed the murder of Ethelred. He found anarchy throughout the kingdom, but eventually succeeded in restoring something like order by making a treaty with Cenwulf of Mercia, whose kingdom had been the refuge of all Northumbrian conspirators. His journey to the Emperor Charles the Great, and Leo the Pope, is the most interesting event of his reign. He obtained their mediation between himself and his rebellious nobles, and by their assistance was firmly re-established on the throne of his kingdom.

Argaum, BATTLE OF (Nov. 28, 1803), was fought during the Mahratta War, between General Wellesley and the Rajah of Berar. The rajah, who had been long pursued by Wellesley, attempted to raise the siege of Havilgur, a strong fortress in the Berar territory, and was caught by Wellesley on the plain of Argaum. Though late in the day, Wellesley resolved to engage, but his troops had no sooner come within range of the enemy's guns, than three battalions, who had behaved with distinguished gallantry on the field of Assaye under a far hotter fire, broke their ranks and fled. Fortunately the general succeeded in rallying them, or the battle would have been lost. They returned to the field, and after some hours of severe fighting, the Berar troops were compelled to retreat. The rajah abandoned all his cannon and ammunition; and few of his troops would have escaped, if there had been an hour of daylight left.

Argyle, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, 5TH EARL OF (d. 1575), although a member of the Congregation, attached himself to the side of the Regent, Mary of Guise, and was of great service to her in averting a collision between the Reformers and the French troops in 1559. He was said to have formed a plot to carry off Mary Queen of Scots almost on the eve of her marriage with Darnley; and he acted as president at the mock trial of Bothwell for Darnley's murder, in 1567. On the abdication of the queen he was appointed one of the Commission of Regency during Murray's absence, but on her escape, 1568, joined her party, and commanded her troops at the battle of Langside. A year or two later, however, he submitted to the government of Morton and obtained an indemnity. He married the widow of the Regent Murray, and thus became possessed of some of the crown jewels, his enforced restoration of which by Morton caused him to head the party then forming against the Regent.

Argyle, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, 8TH EARL and also MARQUIS OF (b. 1598, d. 1661), succeeded his father in 1638, and at once joined the Covenanters, whose forces he commanded when they were defeated by Montrose at Inverlochy and Kilsyth. His cruelties towards the Royalists in 1640-1 earned him the bitter hatred of all his opponents, and in 1641 a plot to murder him, known as the Incident, was formed. The same year he was created a marquis, and in 1661 supported the cause of Charles II., whom he crowned at Scone. Immediately afterwards, however, the marquis was taken prisoner at Worcester, and was supposed to have entered into close relations with Cromwell. In Richard Cromwell's Parliament of 1659 he represented Aberdeenshire. As a consequence, he was impeached for high treason immediately after the Restoration. He was executed at Edinburgh, suffering as much for his great power, which was an object of dread to Charles II., as for his treason.

S. E. Gardiner, Hist. of Eng.; Burton, Hist. of Scotland, vi. 205, vii. 146, &c.

Argyle, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, 9TH EARL OF (d. 1685), was the son of the preceding. He was restored to his estates and earldom in 1663, which had been forfeited by his father's treason, and joined the Royalist party in Scotland. On the passing of the Scotch Test Act, in 1681, Argyle refused to take the required oath, except with a reservation, stating that he did not thereby debar himself from attempting any amendment in Church or State. For this he was brought to trial, and being found guilty of "leasing-making," was sentenced to death. He, however, managed to escape to Holland, where he remained till 1685, when he joined Monmouth in his attempt to dethrone James. But there seems to have been no sympathy between the two, and Argyle was suspected and distrusted by the English. Argyle landed in Scotland in May, 1685, but found himself joined by very few followers except his own clansmen. Divisions were rife in his councils, and after an abortive march on Glasgow, his followers dispersed without striking a blow, and he himself was captured in the disguise of a carter, taken to Edinburgh, and executed on his former sentence of death.

Argyle, GEORGE DOUGLAS CAMPBELL, 8TH DUKE OF (b. 1823), was, as Marquis of Lorne, very prominent in the controversy in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland relating to patronage. In 1852 he accepted office under Lord Aberdeen as Lord Privy Seal, and retained the same office under Lord Palmerston. He was Lord Privy Seal again under Lord Palmerston in 1859, Postmaster-General in 1860, and Secretary of State for India in Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet from 1868 to 1874. He joined Mr. Gladstone's second administration (1880) as Lord Privy Seal, but retired owing to a difference of opinion with his colleagues on their Irish policy.

Argyle, JOHN, MARQUIS, afterwards DUKE OF (d. 1743), as Lord Lorne, was made commander of a regiment of foot by William III. In 1692 he, together with his kinsmen Breadalbane and the Master of Stair, planned the infamous massacre of Glencoe. The greater part of the troops employed in that affair were Campbells. In 1703 he succeeded to his father's honours and estates, and was sworn of Anne's Privy Council. In 1705 he was appointed Lord High Commissioner to the Scottish Parliament, in which he zealously advocated the Union. For these services he was created a peer of England and Earl of Greenwich. In 1706 he fought under Marlborough at Ramillies, and commanded in the attack on Menin. He returned to Scotland, where he supported the efforts of the Commission for the Union. He fought at Oudenarde and Malplaquet; but was at enmity with Marlborough, his commander-in-chief. At this time he was closely connected with the Tories, and was appointed to the command in Catalonia in 1710. The army was demoralised by the defeat at Almanza, and he could obtain no supplies. He returned to England, and was made commander-in-chief of the land forces in Scotland. He was soon at variance with the ministry; and opposed, in the Upper House, a motion to the effect that the Protestant succession was in danger. As Queen Anne lay dying, Argyle entered the Council with the Duke of Somerset, and proposed that the queen should be requested to make the Duke of Shrewsbury Lord Treasurer. It was done; and it was owing to this vigorous action that Bolingbroke's plans at once fell to the ground. On the accession of George I., Argyle was continued in his employments, and on the outbreak of Mar's rebellion, in 1715, Argyle, as commander-in-chief in Scotland, met the rebels at Sheriffmuir, where Mar was defeated. But the conduct of Argyle caused it to be suspected that he was unwilling to drive the Jacobites to extremities. Cadogan was sent to reinforce him. As soon as the duke marched forward, the Jacobites retreated before him; the Pretender fled to France, and the rebellion was crushed. Argyle was a follower of Walpole during the greater part of his long ministry, but in 1739 he distinctly joined the Opposition. Walpole, wishing to preserve so powerful a support, kept him in his places, but at length was compelled to dismiss him. On the resignation of Walpole, Argyle was again placed in office; but he was dissatisfied with the arrangement of the ministry, and resigned. Towards the end of his career, he intrigued with the Jacobites. It was only after Sir John Hinde Cotton, a noted Jacobite, had been placed on the Board of the Admiralty, that the duke condescended to join Pelham's administration. Argyle was a brave soldier and an accomplished orator; but his political career was one long course of inconsistencies.

Argyle, PEERAGE OF. In 1445 Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochow, the head of the great Argyleshire family of the Campbells, was raised to the peerage as Lord Campbell, by James II. of Scotland. His grandson, Colin, was created Earl of Argyle in 1464. He married Isabel Stewart, daughter of the Lord of Lorne, and added to his titles that of Lord Lorne. Archibald, the eighth earl, who was subsequently executed for treason in 1661, was created a marquis in 1641. His son Archibald, ninth earl (who was restored to the family estates and the earldom), was attainted for treason in 1685. The attainder was reversed at the Revolution of 1688, and Archibald, the son of the last-named earl, was advanced to the dignity of Duke of Argyle. His son John, second duke, received a British peerage as Duke of Greenwich in 1719. He left no male issue, and his English honours ceased; but his daughter Caroline was created in her own right Baroness of Greenwich. His Scotch honours devolved on his brother Archibald, third duke, from whom they passed to his nephew Archibald, the ancestor of the present holder of the title. John, the fifth duke, was created a peer of England as Baron Sundridge in 1766.

Arikera, BATTLE OF (May 13, 1791). After the capture of Bangalore, during Lord Cornwallis's campaign in Mysore, the English army marched to Seringapatam, and (May 13) reached Arikera, about nine miles from that city. Tippoo was encamped between them and Seringapatam, with his right resting on the Caverry. Lord Cornwallis hoped by a night march to turn the enemy's left before daylight, and cut off his retreat. A terrific storm arose, and delayed the march by repeated halts, till it became impossible to carry out the original plan. In the morning Lord Cornwallis determined to gain a hill commanding the left of the enemy, and organised an attack in front, under cover of which Colonel Maxwell was to seize the hill. Tippoo perceived this, and made his preparations accordingly; but in spite of this Maxwell crossed a difficult ravine and gained the hill. The attack became general along the front, and was assisted by Maxwell's flank attack along the hill, and Tippoo's army was already wavering when Colonel Floyd and the cavalry charged his rearguard and nearly destroyed it, nothing but the unwieldy movements of the Nizam's horse, which now came up, allowed Tippoo's army to escape a total rout.

Arkenholm, BATTLE OF (May 1, 1455), was fought in the valley of the Esk between the supporters of James II. of Scotland and James, Earl of Douglas, and his brothers. The rebels were defeated. Archibald Douglas, Earl of Murray, fell in the combat; Hugh Douglas, Earl of Ormond, was captured and beheaded; and James Douglas was forced to take refuge in England. [DOUGLAS.]

Arklow, THE BATTLE OF (1798), was fought during the Irish rebellion. The town was defended by General Needham with 120 Ancient Britons, 800 Irish militia, 300 Durham Fencibles, and some yeomanry, against Father John Murphy, who led some 27,000 rebels with a few guns to the attack. In spite of the determined fury with which they came on, the rebels were beaten back with great loss, and had to give up the idea of marching on Dublin.

Arlington, HENRY BENNET, EARL OF (b. 1618, d. 1685), was originally intended to take orders in the Church, but on the outbreak of the Civil War he joined the Royalist army as a volunteer. After the death of Charles I., he joined Charles II., and was employed by him as ambassador to Madrid. In 1662 he was made one of the Secretaries of State, and in 1664 was created a baron. In 1667 he joined the Cabal ministry. In 1674 he was impeached by the House of Commons, and sold his office to Sir J. Williamson, purchasing in his turn the post of Lord Chamberlain, which he held till 1681. Arlington was a Catholic, but never showed himself very zealous for his religion, though ready to sign the secret clauses in the Treaty of Dover. Sharing the want of political principle, and "the cosmopolitan indifference to constitutions and religions" which distinguished the politicians with whom he was associated, Arlington was nevertheless in many respects superior to most of them. He was resolved to maintain himself at court, and in the pursuit of this object he displayed great subtlety, resource, and flexibility of temper; but "he was regarded as the man in England who least overstepped the line of good conduct. He possessed the culture of European society at that time; by the excesses which were in favour at the court he was little affected; his hours of leisure he devoted to the study of the literary products of that fruitful age." Arlington's Letters to Sir W. Temple (published posthumously in 1701) are of some importance for the diplomatic history of Charles II.'s reign.

Armada, THE SPANISH, is the name usually applied to the great military and naval expedition despatched by Philip II. of Spain against England in 1588. The equipping of his great fleet was protracted by his incorrigible habits of delay and hesitation, but it is probable that it was ready to sail in 1587. It might in any case have been kept waiting one year more till the Prince of Parma had his army ready in Flanders, but, however that may be, it was delayed by Drake's vigorous action on the coasts of Portugal and

Andalusia. Early in 1588 the damage he had done was repaired, and the Invincible Armada sailed from Lisbon in the latter days of May. It was commanded by Don Alonso de Guzman, Duke of Medina Sidonia, who succeeded to the command on the death of Don Alvaro de Bazan, the Marquis of Santa Cruz. It consisted of 130 vessels, manned by 8,450 sailors, and 2,088 galley-slaves. It carried 19,295 soldiers, and 2,680 pieces of artillery. The provisions of food and ammunition were abundant, but the ships were ill-fitted for the navigation of the Channel, of which the Spanish sailors knew nothing. From the beginning it met with losses and misfortunes. It was scattered by a gale immediately after leaving Lisbon, during which one galley went down, and two were seized by the slaves who revolted, and overpowered the soldiers. It was not till Friday, July 22 (N.S.), that Medina Sidonia could rally his ships, and sail from Corunna. On Thursday, July 28, the fleet was off the Lizard, and had its first sight of the English fleet on Saturday the 30th. The English Lord High Admiral, Lord Howard of Effingham, had thirty ships of the Royal Navy, and a large number of volunteer ships, with him, and was assisted by Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, Winter, Raleigh, and other seamen. The Armada was steered for Calais Road. On Sunday, July 31, some fighting took place, in which the unwieldy Spanish ships were completely outmanœuvred. They were built so extremely high, and drew so few feet of water in proportion, that they could not carry enough sail. The handy English vessels closed and drew off as they pleased. Our seamen, acting on the principle which has always been followed in the English navy, trusted to their rapid and accurate artillery fire, and refused all temptations to board the enemy, whose vessels were crowded with soldiers. The first encounter proved the wisdom of this system of tactics. The flagship of the Andalusian squadron was disabled, and fell into the hands of Drake after a long fight. The Armada, arranged in the half-moon formation which had been adopted at Lepanto, continued its way through the Channel, keeping indifferent order. On August 2 there was another indecisive cannonade off Portland, in which the English seamen followed their usual system of attack; and though they did not do the Spaniards any considerable damage, they further proved their superiority in seamanship, and convinced the enemy that he could only hope to fight them on their own terms. By Saturday the 6th, the Spanish Armada had reached Calais, and waited for the Prince of Parma, who was to join it from Flanders. But the prince, by one of the extraordinary oversights which ruined all Philip's plans, had no armed ships, and was closely blockaded by the Dutch. On Sunday night (August 7) the English admirals sent fire-ships among the Spaniards, who cut their cables and stood to sea in a panic. On Monday they were fiercely attacked, and soon became utterly disorganised. On Tuesday, August 9, the Armada, greatly diminished by loss of vessels, which had been sunk or compelled to strike, or driven on shore, was drifting helplessly on the coast of Zealand. A sudden change of wind saved it for the moment, but the crews had no more stomach for the fight. By the next day they had quite lost heart and begun to fly to the north. They were followed for some distance by a few English vessels, but there was no effectual pursuit. Elizabeth's fleet had been ill-provided with powder and shot, and still worse with food. They had put to sea in a hurry, and they had moreover been now engaged almost incessantly for days. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that after three general engagements and numerous skirmishes the ships were out of ammunition. The want of provisions is less excusable. It appears, however, that the volunteer vessels were almost as badly found as the queen's, and that what is often called Elizabeth's parsimony was in fact want of experience in equipping a large force, and was common to her with her people. The brunt of the fighting fell on the vessels of the Royal Navy; the volunteers, though they proved the spirit of the nation, and helped to make a moral impression on the Spaniards, did comparatively little of the real work. The preparations on shore were probably distinguished more by spirit than efficiency, but they were never tested, and it is impossible to know what they would have done. It must not be forgotten, that though the Prince of Parma had a veteran force in Flanders, the majority of the soldiers on board the Armada were as new as the English militia. The Spaniards straggled home round the north of Scotland, through continual storms, in which the greater part of their vessels went down or were driven on shore. Only fifty-three ships reached Spain, and the loss of life was so terrible, that it was said that every family in the country lost a member.

The standard historians of Elizabeth's reign, and Camden, Fuller, or Hakluyt, need scarcely be mentioned, and the same may be said of Froude or Motley. There is a very good account of the Armada in Southey's Life of Lord Howard of Effingham, in the Cabinet Cyclopædia, with copious citations of authorities; and a French writer, M. Forneron, has told the story very fully in his recent Life of Philip II. On the Spanish side, may be mentioned Strader, Herrera, and Cabrera, in their Lives of Philip. Cabrera was an official historian, who wrote under royal dictation, and gives, of course, the royal view. He is chiefly valuable as showing what the Spanish government wished to be believed. Several accounts by eye-witnesses are to be found in the Documentos Inéditos (Spanish State Papers), particularly in the fourteenth and forty-eighth volumes.

Armagh, THE SCHOOL (OR UNIVERSITY) OF, was the centre of early Irish monastic civilisation and learning. It was from here that the scholars who made Ireland famous in France, and those who founded Glastonbury, came. The most famous among the Irish scholars trained at Armagh is of course John Scotus Erigena, whose death may be placed in the year 875. Even the capture of Armagh by Olaf's Danes was not sufficient to destroy entirely its school and its fame for learning. The continuance of the existence of a school there is vouched for by the proceedings of a synod in 1158, which decided that no one was to be instituted as a professor of theology who had not completed his education at Armagh. The presence of foreign students can be traced at least as far as the eleventh century. The existence of a learned body in Armagh is all the more remarkable as the see was, after the arrival of the Ostmen, almost always in the hands of laymen.

Armagh, THE SYNOD OF, was held in 1170, when the Irish prelates, alarmed at the English invasion, which they regarded as a divine visitation, determined that all English slaves should be set free.

Armed Neutrality. In 1780 a coalition known as the First Armed Neutrality was entered into by the northern powers, who represented the right of search which was claimed by England in respect of all neutral vessels. In the treaty then made between Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, the principle was proclaimed that "free ships make free goods," that the flag covers the merchandise, and that a port is to be considered blockaded only when a sufficient force for its blockade is in front of it. There was some ground for the contention that the rights of neutrals on the sea should be the same as on land. At this time Great Britain was in the midst of the war with the American colonies; France and Holland were also at war with her; and the right of search was indispensable, if she was to make any use of her naval superiority. Nevertheless, pressed as she was, it was impossible for her to take any active steps in opposition to the treaty, though she continued to exercise her right, which had been admitted by the several powers in former treaties. The armed neutrality was abandoned by Sweden in 1787; in 1793 Russia entered into a treaty with Great Britain, which expressly recognised the right of search on neutral vessels; and in the same year America made a similar treaty with Great Britain. But in 1799 Napoleon, by a remarkable exercise of diplomatic skill, induced the Americans to adopt a maritime code on the basis of the Armed Neutrality of 1780; and at the same time the other powers saw an opening for a profitable trade with France, if the right of search were abolished. The principles of the Armed Neutrality were accordingly revived, and the determined persistence of the British government, combined with the skilful diplomacy of Napoleon, induced the northern powers again to enter into a coalition, known as the Second Armed Neutrality (1800), to enforce its principles. The English government acted with decisive energy. A fleet was despatched to the Baltic; and the bombardment of Copenhagen, followed by the death of Czar Paul, effectually broke up the northern coalition. On June 17, 1801, the Maritime Convention of St. Petersburg was opened; and finally a series of treaties was made between Great Britain and the northern powers by which the Armed Neutrality was abandoned, but the right of search was strictly defined, and it was agreed that blockades must be efficient to be valid. Arminians was the name sometimes given to the High Church party in the reign of Charles I. Strictly speaking, the Arminians were those Dutch Protestants who followed Arminius (Harmenissen), in opposition to the more rigid followers of Calvin. The party was the fruit of the reaction which had arisen in the beginning of the seventeenth century in the minds of many men against what seemed the bigotry of extreme Protestantism, and which made them inquire whether the Reformers, in their desire to get rid of the evils of Popery, had not also destroyed much that was vital in Catholic Christianity. In the Netherlands the controversy between the Arminians and "Gomarists" led, early in the 17th century, to violent commotions. To disputes of dogma were added those concerning the rights of the Church with reference to the authority of the civil government in ecclesiastical affairs. The Arminians, with their leanings to the doctrines of Zwingli, maintained the right of the State to conduct the government of the Church, in conformity with the model of Scripture, and urged that, by the independence claimed by spiritual authority in the Reformed Church, a new popedom was being set up. The Gomarists, on the other hand, strictly adhering to the principles of Calvin, demanded the complete autonomy of the Church. This schism spread to the political world. The heads of the municipal oligarchy sided with the Arminians. The leaders of the popular party, under Maurice the Stadtholder, declared against their rivals for the Gomarists. At the national Synod of Dort, which commenced its sittings in 1618, the victory rested with the latter in regard both to doctrine and Church authority. The Synod declared its adherence to the strict Calvinistic views on unconditional election by grace, and the independence of the Church. Silenced in Holland, Arminianism took firm root in England, and was welcomed by many who shared in the reaction against Puritanism. A violent controversy began between Calvinists and Arminians. James I. attempted to silence it (1622); but, in fact, in his later years, the king, who had been a Calvinist all his life, and had even written a book against Vorstius, the successor of Arminius, leaned towards Arminianism. For the Synod of Dort, by ascribing equal authority to all ministers of God's Word, no matter what their position, indirectly condemned the English Church. The Puritans and Presbyterians regarded the spread of Arminianism with great dislike, and on March 2, 1629, the Commons resolved that "whosoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or by favour seek to introduce Popery or Arminianism, shall be reputed a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth." But Arminianism continued to gain influence among the High Churchmen, and the term came to be applied generally to all those who objected both to the Roman and Calvinist doctrines and theory of Church government (though they considered the Roman Catholic Church as corrupt and unsound), and who wished that the English Church should occupy a middle position between Rome and Geneva. Charles I. and Laud were claimed by this party as its champions. They were supposed to be equally averse to Romanism and Puritanism, and they were regarded by the English Arminians as the great defenders of the Church from the dangers which threatened her on both sides. After the Restoration the name "Arminian" fell into disuse. [LAUD.]

Armstrong, SIR JOHN, of Gilnockie (d. 1531), was the head of a powerful family, which held practically independent power on the borders of England and Scotland and the "debatable land." The Scots government, however, regarded the Armstrongs as robbers, and James V. determined to suppress them. In 1531 the king entered the border country at the head of a powerful force. Sir John Armstrong came to meet the king in great state, and attended by a train of gentlemen. He was immediately seized and hanged, together with his brother Thomas. The Pitcottie Chronicle represents him as saying to James, when his entreaties for mercy proved fruitless, "I am but ane fool to seek grace at a graceless face; but had I known, sir, that ye would have taken my life this day, I should have lived upon the borders in despite of King Harry and you both; for I know King Harry would downweigh my best horse with gold to know that I was condemned to die this day."

Army. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Army Plot (1641) was an attempt to use the English army, which had not been disbanded after the Scotch War, to coerce the Parliament. There were two distinct plots for this purpose: (1) Percy Wilmot and other officers and members of Parliament proposed to induce the officers of the army to sign a declaration that they would stand by the king: (a) if parliamentary pressure were put upon him, either to compel him to assent to the exclusion of the bishops from the House of Lords, or to force him to disband the Irish army before the Scots were disbanded; (b) or if the full revenue he had enjoyed for so many years were not placed in his hands. At the same time, a plot somewhat similar, but contemplating the direct employment of force, was being contrived by Sir John Suckling and Henry Jermyn with the approval of the queen. They intended to commence operations by placing the command of the army in the hands of the Earl of Newcastle and George Young. Charles at first endeavoured to get the two parties to work together, and finding this impossible, decided against Suckling's plan. Young, seeing no prospect of becoming lieutenant-general, betrayed the plot to the Earl of Newport, through whom it reached Pym (April 1). Meanwhile, Suckling had by no means abandoned his scheme, and he was also arranging an attempt to rescue Strafford from the Tower. Pym made use of his knowledge of this double plot to secure the agreement of the two Houses, and the support of the people. On May 3, the Protestation was drawn up, on the next day it was taken by the Lords, on the 5th it was agreed that a Bill should be brought in to provide against the dissolution of the Parliament, on the 8th that Bill and the Attainder Bill both passed their first reading in the Lords. The king, left without any support, gave his assent to both Bills on the 10th. Percy, Jermyn, Suckling, and others fled to France, but were declared guilty of high treason. Thus the first attempt to use the army against the Parliament gave fresh strength to the popular party. (2) At the end of May or the beginning of June, Daniel O'Neill was sent by the king to sound the officers of the army as to the feasibility of bringing up the troops to London if the neutrality of the Scots could be secured. At the same time, one of the officers was entrusted by the king with a petition, to which he was to obtain signatures in the army. The petition protested against the unreasonable demands of the popular leaders, the diminution of the king's "just regalities," and the tumultuous assemblies round the Houses of Parliament. It concluded with a promise to defend King, Church, Parliament, and Laws. The leaders of the army repudiated the petition, and O'Neill was obliged to fly, but the king still persisted in his intrigues for this purpose both during his journey to Scotland and his stay in that country. The knowledge of this new plot made Pym, on the outbreak of the Irish Rebellion, demand that the king should employ only such ministers as Parliament should approve; otherwise the Commons would be obliged to provide for Ireland without the king. He followed this by bringing the evidence before the Commons, who passed a resolution affirming that there was "a second design to bring up the army against the Parliament, and an intention to make the Scottish army stand as neutral." This event did much to secure the passing of the "Grand Remonstrance."

Arnee, BATTLE OF (June 7, 1782), took place in the Mysore War between the British, under Sir Eyre Coote, and the troops of Hyder Ali, commanded by the Sultan in person. After an indecisive action, Hyder retreated.

Arnold, BENEDICT (b. 1740, d. 1801), was a druggist at Newhaven, in Connecticut, when the American War of Independence broke out. On the news of the battle of Lexington, he collected a body of volunteers, seized some arms, and obtained a commission to capture Ticonderoga on Lake Champlain. Subsequently he proceeded on his own account, after surprising St. John's, to equip a small flotilla on the lake. He displayed great bravery and skill, but he offended Congress by his independence, and he was in turn offended by their want of confidence, though he was appointed to the command of Philadelphia, on its evacuation by the British forces. At length, mortified by the insults put upon him, he entered into communications with Sir H. Clinton to betray West Point. The project failed through the capture of Major André (q.v.), but Arnold managed to escape to the British lines, and for some time he commanded a corps of American refugees. He subsequently settled in the West Indies, and after being captured by, and escaping from, the French, he came to London, where he died.

Arrah, DEFENCE OF (1857). On July 25, the 7th, 8th, and 40th Native Regiments, quartered in the district of Shahabad, Bengal, mutinied, plundered the town and station of Arrah, and, headed by Koer Singh, a Zemindar, who had rebelled, attacked a house where sixteen Englishmen and sixty Sikh police had taken refuge and fortified themselves. Mr. Boyle, an engineer, was the life of the defence, and it was to his services that the successful conduct of it was due. An attempt to relieve the besieged from Dinapoor failed; but Major Vincent Eyre, of the artillery, formed a small field force, with which he defeated the rebels with severe loss on August 2nd, and on the 3rd released the gallant little garrison.

Arran, PEERAGE OF. 1. SCOTCH.—In 1467, Sir R. Boyd was created Earl of Arran. His widow married James, Lord Hamilton, and the earldom passed into that family. [HAMILTON.] 2. IRISH.—In 1693, Charles Butler, Warden of the Cinque Ports, and Master of the Ordnance in Ireland, second son of Thomas, Earl of Ossory, the son of James, Duke of Ormonde, was created Earl of Arran. The peerage, however, became extinct with him. The present peerage was conferred on Sir Arthur Gore in 1758. He was the descendant of Sir Paul Gore, captain of a troop of horse in Elizabeth's reign, who arrived in Ireland and obtained large grants of land in County Mayo.

Arran, JAMES HAMILTON, 2ND EARL OF AND DUKE OF CHATELHERAULT (d. 1575), the head of the house of Hamilton, and a near relative of James V. of Scotland, acted as Regent for some time, until he was displaced by his rival the Earl of Angus, the head of the house of Douglas. On the death of James V. he again became Regent. The confirmation of a treaty with England, 1543, was quickly followed by a league on the part of the Regent and Cardinal Beaton against all English interference, and soon afterwards the English ambassador, Sir Ralph Sadler, was requested to withdraw. In 1547 Arran was defeated at Pinkie, and in 1554 the regency was transferred to Mary of Guise, Arran being rewarded for his acquiescence by the dukedom of Chatelherault, conferred on him by the French king. He joined the Lords of the Congregation and supported the Reformers; and by his opposition to the Darnley marriage, incurred the resentment of Queen Mary, so that he judged it prudent to retire to England. Returning some time afterwards, he was reconciled to the queen, and during the Civil War he and the rest of the Hamiltons supported her against the Reforming Lords. On the abdication of Mary, 1567, he was named one of the Council of Regency. In 1569 he was imprisoned by Murray in Edinburgh Castle. He was a man of fickle and vacillating character, of courteous manners, and pleasant address, but by no means fitted to fill the high position to which he was called.

Arran, JAMES HAMILTON, 3RD EARL OF (d. 1609), was the son of the Duke of Chatelherault and the heir of the Hamiltons.

Having left France, where his life was in danger from the Guises, he became one of the numerous suitors of Mary Queen of Scots, whom he planned to carry off in 1561. His failure in his suit seems to have affected his reason. He became mad, and continued a maniac till he died.

Arran, JAMES STUART, EARL OF (d. 1596), was a son of Lord Ochiltree, and a brother-in-law of Knox. In 1581 he received the estates and title which the house of Hamilton had forfeited, as the reward for his zeal in procuring the condemnation of the Regent Morton. He aided Lennox in compassing the ruin of his enemy Morton; a prisoner at the "Raid of Ruthven," Arran quickly revenged himself by collecting an army in the interest of James VI., and by taking the lead against the conspirators; and having extorted a confession from Gowrie by fair promises, used it against him to his ruin. He became Chancellor and Lieutenant-General of Scotland, and on the strength of the king's favour, set himself in opposition to the rest of the Scotch barons, rousing their hatred by his arrogance. The English government found means to accuse him of instigating a border raid, and he was ordered to withdraw from the Scottish court in 1584. Shortly afterwards, on a combination against him of the Hamiltons (whose estates he held), and the banished lords, Arran had to escape as best he could to the hills of Ayrshire. He was slain by James Douglas of Thorthorwald in revenge for the death of Morton.

Arras, THE CONGRESS OF (1435), was assembled for the purpose of making peace between England, France, and Burgundy. Ambassadors came from England, France, Burgundy, the Pope, the Council of Basle, Castile, Aragon, Naples, Portugal, Sicily, Cyprus, Navarre, Poland, Denmark, Milan, and Brittany. The French offered to cede Normandy and Guienne to the English, but this was indignantly refused, and the Treaty of Troyes was insisted upon, certain territories south of the Loire being offered to Charles of France. This being rejected, the English representatives withdrew, and a treaty of peace and alliance was signed between France and Burgundy, by which the latter power agreed not to treat with the English without the sanction of the King of France.

Array, COMMISSIONS OF, first issued under Edward I.—though their germs may be traced as early as the reign of William Rufus—were commissions given to certain individuals called Commissioners of Array to press a number of men in their district, or sometimes all men capable of bearing arms for the king's service, and to train them in military duties. Under Edward I. the forces thus raised were paid by the king, but under Edward II. and Edward III. the cost usually fell on the townships which furnished the men. There was no doubt that these commissions, when issued without the consent of Parliament, were unconstitutional, and Edward III. had to promise that all troops levied by this means should be paid for by the king—a promise which, however, was not kept. In 1352 and 1403 it was provided that "the common assent and grant of Parliament" should be obtained before these commissions were issued, and the latter of these statutes further provided that, "except in case of invasion, none shall be constrained to go out of their own counties, and that men chosen to go on the king's service out of England shall be at the king's wages from the day they leave their own counties." Commissions of Array, which were frequently issued under the Plantagenet kings, and were not uncommon under the Lancastrians and Tudors, ceased on the creation of the office of Lord Lieutenant in the sixteenth century. The latest bears date 1557. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Stubbs, Const. Hist.

Arrest, FREEDOM FROM, is the special privilege of members of both Houses of Parliament; and is enjoyed by them during the session, and for forty days before and after, except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace. The earliest mention of an analogous privilege is in a law of Ethelbert in the sixth century, which provides that "If the king call his people to him, and any one there do them injury, let him compensate with a twofold 'bot,' and fifty shillings to the king." In 1290 this privilege was confirmed by Edward I., who, in reply to a petition from the Master of the Temple that he might distrain for the rent of a house held of him by the Bishop of St. Davids, replied, that "It does not seem fit that the king should grant that they who are of his council should be distrained in time of Parliament." So too in the Prior of Malton's case, in 1315. The first recognition of the privilege by Act of Parliament was in 1433, when it was enacted that any assault on a member on his way to Parliament was to be punishable by a double fine; though in 1404 Henry IV. had replied to a petition that a threefold fine might be inflicted for such an offence, that though he admitted the privilege, the existing remedy was sufficient. The existence of the privilege was thus, by usage and by statute, clearly established; but frequent violations occurred under the Angevin and Lancastrian kings. In 1301 Henry Keighley was imprisoned by Edward I. after the Parliament of Lincoln. In 1376, Peter de la Mare, the Speaker of the Good Parliament, was imprisoned at the instance of John of Gaunt: whilst in 1453 occurred the famous case of Speaker Thorpe, who was imprisoned during the prorogation of Parliament at the suit of the Duke of York. The Commons tried to obtain his release "for the despatch of the business of Parliament;" but failed, though the judges held that "if a member were arrested for any less cause than treason, felony, breach of the peace, and sentence of Parliament, he should make his attorney and be released to attend in Parliament." Thorpe, however, was not released, owing to the influence of the Duke of York. In 1460, Walter Clerk, member for Chippenham, was arrested "for a fine to the king, and damages to two private suitors," whereupon the Commons demanded and obtained his release. In 1477 John Atwyll, member for Exeter, was imprisoned for debt, but was released on the petition of the House. Up to the reign of Henry VIII. arrested members had obtained their release either by special Act of Parliament if they were imprisoned in execution after judgment, or by a writ of privilege issued by the Chancellor if confined on meane process (i.e., after the commencement of a suit but before judgment); but, in 1543, in the case of George Ferrers, who had been arrested as surety for a debt, the House demanded his release by virtue of its own authority, and on the refusal of the sheriffs to liberate him committed them to prison for contempt, their proceedings being confirmed by the king. From this time members were usually released by the Serjeant by warrant of the mace, not by writ. In 1603 occurred the case of Sir Thomas Shirley, whom the warden of the Fleet refused to release for fear of becoming personally liable for his debt. This led to an Act discharging from all liability the officer from whose custody a person having the privilege of Parliament has been delivered, and enabling the creditor to sue out a new writ on the expiration of the period of privilege. The privilege of freedom from arrest for some time belonged not only to members of Parliament but also to their servants (as in Smalley's case, 1575, and Johnson's case, 1621), but in 1770 was confined to the persons of members, owing to the frequent abuse of the privilege, which was used as a means of escape from debt. As lately as 1880 it was decided on precedents that the duration of the privilege is forty days before and after the meeting of Parliament; on the ground that the time must be clearly defined. The House of Commons has always maintained its powers of imprisoning its own members for contempt, as in the case of John Stone in 1547, and Arthur Hall in 1581. The right of a member of Parliament to claim freedom from arrest has never been allowed to extend to criminal offences; and though in 1572 Lord Cromwell obtained his release after committal for contempt of court, in more recent times, members committed by courts of law for open contempt have failed in obtaining release by virtue of privilege, "though," observes Sir Erskine May, "each case is still open to consideration when it arises." [PARLIAMENT.]

Arthur, KING, the famous British and Christian hero of romance, had already become the centre of much Celtic legend, especially in Brittany, when Geoffrey of Monmouth published, in 1130, his Historia Britonum. This work, though it poisoned the very fountains of history, acquired, in spite of protest (e.g., by William of Malmesbury), wide popularity, and became the source of that elaborate legend of Arthur and his Round Table which has inspired so much that is best in literature. Geoffrey's fictions were largely regarded as history, until, by an inevitable reaction, Milton and most of the eighteenth century writers were led to disbelieve that any Arthur had really lived. Gildas, nearly a contemporary, makes no mention of him, though the frequent allusion to him in the obscure utterances of the Welsh bards, edited by Mr. Skene, may be set against this. But many deny the historical value of the Four Books, and the earliest really historical notices of Arthur are found in "Nennius" and the Welsh tenth century chronicle called Annales Cambriae (MS. A.). Nennius says (Mon. Hist. Britan., 73-4), "Arthur pugnabat contra illos [videlicet Saxones] cum regibus Britonum; sed ipse dux erat bellorum, et in omnibus bellis victor exstitit." He then gives a list of Arthur's twelve victories, ending with the battle "in monte Badonia." This the Annales Cambriae place in A.D. 516, and make Arthur a Christian hero. The same authority places his death at the battle of Camlan, in 537. Will this evidence compensate for the silence of Gildas? All really depends on our estimate of Nennius. Many, like Milton, repudiate Nennius as a "very trivial author;" but others, including Dr. Guest and Mr. Skene, fully accept his authority, though recognising the fragmentary and unequal character of the series of treatises that collectively go by his name. Mr. Skene (Four Ancient Books of Wales, i. 50-89; Celtic Scotland, i. 152; cf. Glennie's Arthurian Localities) claims that Arthur was the leader of the Northern Cymry of Strathclyde and Cumbria against the Saxons; and identifies places in those regions as the scenes of the twelve battles—Mons Badonis being Bouden Hill, near Linlithgow. Arthur, according to this view, is not a king, but a temporary general, the "Gwledig," who led the combined hosts of the princes of the Northern Britons to unwonted victories. He was the successor of the Roman generals of the legions encamped along the Pictish wall. His victories led to the restriction of the Saxons to the country east of the Pennine range, and so created the Cumbrian kingdom. He died defeated by a revolt of the heathen British, perhaps in alliance with the Saxons. The great authority of Dr. Guest (Archæological Journal, Salisbury volume, 1849) also accepts Arthur as a real person, but places the scene of his victories in the western border-land of the growing State of the West Saxons (e.g., Mons Badonis is Badbury, in Dorsetshire). Mr. Elton (Origins of British History, p. 362) doubtfully follows Mr. Skene; while Professor Rhys (Celtic Britain, p. 231) regards Arthur as the "ideal champion of the Brythonic race," whether in Wales, Cumbria, Cornwall, or Brittany. "Whether he was from the first a purely imaginary character, in whom the best qualities of his race met, or had some foundation in the facts of long forgotten history, it would be difficult to say." Perhaps nothing more decided than this can safely be said.

Besides the above-mentioned authorities, the Myerian Archaeology of Wales may be referred to as containing the texts of the Welsh legends of Arthur. Geoffrey of Monmouth's British History is translated in Bohn's series, and the Mabinogion has been translated by Lady Charlotte Guest. For the influence of the Arthurian legend on the literature of Germany, France, and Scandinavia, see an essay by Albert Schulz (Llandover, 1841). There are many editions of Les Romans de la Table Ronde (e.g., Paris, 1860), and Malory's Morte d'Arthur has been reprinted, in 1817 by Southey, and 1856 by Wright. The literature on the Arthurian legend is almost endless. [T. F. T.]

Arthur of Brittany (b. 1187, d. 1203) was the son of Geoffrey Plantagenet and Constance, Duchess of Brittany. His mother's championship of the independence of her duchy no doubt damaged her son's chances of succeeding to the crown of his uncle. She had, moreover, completely alienated Richard and Queen Eleanor, so that, on Richard's death, John was unanimously accepted as king. Arthur's only hope lay in gaining the assistance of Philip Augustus, who at first seemed willing to help him; and the Barons of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, declared for him. War broke out between Philip and John, but the former was more eager for his own interests than for Arthur, and very soon peace was concluded, by which Philip's eldest son Louis was to marry Blanche of Castile, John's niece, John giving her the county of Evreux as a marriage portion. Arthur, who was betrothed to one of Philip's daughters, was forced to do homage to John for Brittany. Quarrels very shortly broke out between John and Philip, who offered to receive the homage of Arthur for the county of Anjou, and allow his knights to join him in conquering it. Arthur commenced operations by attacking his grandmother Eleanor at Mirabel; but he was captured by John, who imprisoned him, first at Falaïse, and afterwards at Rouen, where he died. The manner of Arthur's death is unknown, nor is it ever likely to be determined with certainty. All that the historians of the next reign could say was that Arthur disappeared. "Elapso igitur aliquanto tempore Arthurus evanuit." (Matt. Paris, Chron.

Anglic., iii., p. 221.). The generally received account of his death, which has been consecrated by tradition and poetry, was, that he was murdered by his uncle's own hand, and his body thrown into the Seine. The peers of France found John guilty of the murder, but it is doubtful how far this can be held as confirmatory of the accusation.

Arthur, PRINCE (b. 1486, d. 1502), was the eldest son of Henry VII. His marriage with Catherine of Aragon was first agreed upon between the Kings of Spain and England in March, 1489, when he was not yet three years old, and he was little more than fifteen when the actual wedding ceremony was celebrated at St. Paul's, Nov. 14, 1501. Bacon describes the young prince as a studious youth, and learned beyond his years. His name of Arthur was a graceful acknowledgment on Henry's part of his own British descent through Sir Owen Tudor.

Bacon, Hist. of Henry VII.

Articles, LORDS OF THE, appointed first in 1369, in the reign of David II., became gradually a recognised part of the legislative machinery of Scotland. The "Lords" consisted of a committee chosen equally from each estate to prepare the various measures, which, when completed, were laid before the Estates for final adoption or rejection. William III. endeavoured to remodel the system in 1689, and ordered that the Lords should consist of twenty-four persons, eight being chosen from each estate, and took away their power of rejecting absolutely any motion laid before them. The Estates, however, voted that a permanent committee was objectionable, and in 1690 William gave his assent to a measure abolishing the Lords of the Articles, and providing for temporary committees, to be elected as occasion might arise. [ESTATES.]

Articles of Grievances, voted April, 1689, by the Scotch Estates, protested against sundry laws which were held to be burdensome and dangerous, and were intended to show William III. in what cases reforms were needed. The Estates complained chiefly of the laws passed in the Parliament of 1685; of the reference of legislative proceedings to permanent committees to the injury of free parliamentary discussion; and of the Act of 1669 which made the Sovereign head of the Church. The Articles of Grievances differed from the Claim of Right in that the former laid down fundamental rules of the constitution which had been violated by James II.; the latter merely petitioned for certain necessary reforms.

Articles of Religion. In England, as in other European countries, the Reformation period was marked by several attempts to codify or embody in an authoritative form the articles of religious belief. With a view to putting an end to discussion, Henry VIII., with the aid of his theological advisers, compiled a Book of Articles, which was laid before Convocation in 1536, and subscribed by all its members. These Articles established the Bible, the three Creeds, and the first four Councils as the basis of belief; limited the Sacraments to three, baptism, penance, and the Eucharist; declared that, though the use of images, the worship of saints, and the ritual of the church services had not in themselves power to remit sins, yet they were useful to lift up men's minds unto God; accepted purgatory, but denounced pardons, and masses for the dead. These Articles pleased neither the Reformers nor the Romanists, and were accepted merely at the king's command. In 1539 Henry VIII.'s policy led him to check the growth of the reforming doctrines, and Parliament passed the Bill of the Six Articles, which affirmed transubstantiation, the reception of the communion under one kind, the celibacy of the clergy, the binding power of vows of chastity, private masses, and auricular confession. Soon after the death of Henry VIII., in the Parliament of 1547 the Statute of the Six Articles was repealed. In 1551 an order of the Council was issued to Archbishop Cranmer bidding him frame Articles of Religion. This task the archbishop discharged with caution and deliberation. He consulted with others, circulated a rough draft, and laid it before the Council. After many revisions it was handed for final consideration and emendation to five of the royal chaplains, and to John Knox, the Scottish Reformer. Though it was thus discussed and revised, the draft was in the main the work of Cranmer and his friend Bishop Ridley, who is said to have supplied the greater share of learning. There is some doubt whether or not these Articles were submitted to Convocation; but the evidence seems to show that they were. Finally, they were issued in 1553, with the royal mandate to all the bishops ordering them to call on all clergy, schoolmasters, and churchwardens, to subscribe. These Articles of Edward VI., from their number, are sometimes known as the Forty-two Articles. They show that Cranmer in framing them used the Lutheran Confessions of Faith, especially the Confession of Augsburg, though he did not merely copy them. The accession of Queen Mary within two months of the publication of the Forty-two Articles did not give them much time to sink into the minds of the clergy. On the accession of Elizabeth, Archbishop Parker was called on to provide for the troubled condition of ecclesiastical matters. In 1559 Eleven Articles were issued by authority, to be held by all clergy. They were limited to the definition of fundamental truths, and the points in which the Church of England held the Roman practice to be superstitious. These were meant to be temporary only, while Parker reconsidered the Forty-two Articles of Edward VI. He revised them, and laid the results of his revision before Convocation in 1562. As Cranmer had used the Confession of Augsburg, Parker made further use of the Confession of Wurtemberg. In his revision he omitted four of the original Forty-two Articles—the tenth, “Of Grace;” the sixteenth, “Of Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost;” the nineteenth, “All men are bound to keep the Moral Commandments of the Law” (the first part of which was added to the seventh); and the forty-first, against “Heretics called Mille-narii.” He added four others—the fifth, twelfth, nineteenth, and thirtieth of the present edition. Besides these greater changes, the phraseology was altered in many points. The Convocation made further alterations, and several important omissions. It struck out the end of the third Article, concerning the preaching of Christ to the spirits in prison, and entirely discarded three articles—“The souls of them that depart this life do neither die with the bodies, nor sleep idly;” “The resurrection of the dead is not yet brought to pass;” “All men shall not be saved at the length.” The Articles, now reduced in number to thirty-nine, were submitted to the queen, who further struck out the present twenty-ninth Article, “Of the wicked which eat not the Body of Christ in the use of the Lord’s Supper.” She further added to the twentieth Article the clause, “The Church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith.” The Articles were originally in Latin; but an English translation was soon issued of the Thirty-eight Articles as they passed the revision of the queen and Council. In 1571 the Articles were committed by Convocation to Bishop Jewel for editorship. They were then put into their present form, and were issued both in Latin and English—both versions being authoritative and official. The twenty-ninth Article was restored, and the other alteration of the queen, on the authority of the Church to determine rites and ceremonies, was retained in the English Articles, but omitted in the Latin. The Thirty-nine Articles were then approved by Parliament, and a statute was passed requiring subscription from all candidates for holy orders. From this time forward they have been the standard of the opinions of the Church of England. Accordingly, the “Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical” passed by Convocation in 1603, and confirmed by royal authority, enacted excommunication as the penalty to any one who “declared the Thirty-nine Articles to be erroneous, superstitious, or such as he may not with a good conscience subscribe unto.” But these Canons, not having been passed by Parliament, are binding only as ecclesiastical law on the clergy, not on the laity. As regards the legal aspect of the Thirty-nine Articles, the Act of 1571 enacted that no one should be admitted to a benefice till he had subscribed the Articles in the presence of the Ordinary, and publicly read them in the parish church, with a declaration of his unfeigned assent. The Canons of 1603 further enacted that no one should teach, either in a school or in a private house, unless he subscribed the Thirty-nine Articles and obtained a licence from a bishop. The Act of Uniformity, passed in 1662, embodied this provision. The Toleration Act of 1689 exempted from the penalties of existing statutes against conventicles such dissenting ministers and teachers as should subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles, omitting the thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth, thirty-sixth, and the words of the twentieth which declare that the Church has power to decree rites and ceremonies. Those who had scruples about infant baptism were exempted from subscription to part of the twenty-seventh Article. This Act was the beginning of a period of indulgence and security from persecution to Dissenters, which went on till in 1779 was passed the Dissenting Ministers’ Act, enabling Dissenters to preach and act as schoolmasters without any subscription to the Articles. From this time forward subscription to the Articles ceased to be a test for the exclusion of Dissenters, except in the Universities. At Oxford, the Earl of Leicester as Chancellor had, in 1581, imposed subscription to the Articles before matriculation. At Cambridge, subscription, since 1616, was required of all who took a degree. Thus, Dissenters could not enter the University of Oxford; they might be educated at Cambridge, but were not admitted to any of the endowments. These disabilities were not removed till the passing of the University Tests Act in 1871, which exempted laymen from any religious test. Thus the Articles have ceased to be used as a standard of orthodoxy for any save the clergy of the Church of England. Even in their case it was felt that subscription to a body of doctrinal statements was an excessive obligation, if it was meant to imply literal agreement with every sentence contained in them. To avoid further ambiguities, and to relieve scrupulous consciences on this point, the Clerical Subscription Act of 1866 did away with subscription in the case of the clergy, and substituted a declaration of assent to the Thirty-nine Articles and the Prayer Book.

Articles of War are framed by the crown for the better government of the army and navy. Those which are in force for the army were first authorised in 1714, and are confirmed annually in the Mutiny

Act, the Articles of War for the Navy being based on a Bill passed in 1749. The Articles of War, "which are to be obeyed as being the commands of a superior officer," are divided into sections, some of which correspond to clauses in the Mutiny Act; others, however, though they relate to subjects in the latter, are occupied with definitions of the crime and the punishment appropriate to it. There are some Articles, moreover, which have no counterpart in the Act. It is to be observed that the legality of the Articles of War, as of other orders, may itself become the subject of examination and controversy in a court martial; but the Mutiny Act, being part of the statute law, must be obeyed without question. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Articuli Super Cartas were certain articles, twenty in number, which were added to Magna Charta when it was confirmed by Edward I. in the Parliament which met, 1300. The most important clauses are those which appoint commissioners to investigate all cases in which the charters had been infringed; those which reform and regulate the jury system; those which remedy the abuses of purveyance and jurisdiction of the royal officers; and those which order that no common pleas shall be held in the Exchequer contrary to the form of Magna Charta, and forbid the issue of common law writs under the Privy Seal. One article, which Dr. Stubbs calls "a curious relic of the ideas of 1258," allows the office of sheriff to be elective in counties where the office is not of fee or heritable. There were also articles regulating administration of the forests, and limiting the royal jurisdiction over them.

Arundel, PEERAGE OF. Roger de Montgomery, one of the most trusted followers of William the Conqueror, besides grants of land in Shropshire, received vast estates (seventy-seven lordships) in Sussex, including the castle of Arundel. In 1102, upon the forfeiture of Roger's son, Robert de Belesme, the castle of Arundel passed to the crown, and was settled by Henry I. on his second wife, Adeliza of Louvain, who, after the king's death, conveyed it to her second husband, William de Albini. It is doubtful whether William de Albini, the son of this marriage, received a grant of the third penny of the county of Sussex; but he is styled Earl of Sussex, as well as Earl of Arundel and Chichester. In 1243 Hugh de Albini, fifth Earl of Sussex, died without issue, and part of his estates, together with Arundel Castle, passed to John Fitz-Alan, a descendant of Isabel, daughter of the third Earl. He and his sons are frequently styled Lords of Arundel. Richard Fitz-Alan (d. 1283) is the first of this family actually summoned as Earl of Arundel (1291) by writ. His son Edmund was beheaded in 1326, and his honours forfeited. They were, however, restored to Richard, third Earl, in 1331. In 1580 Henry Fitz-Alan, twelfth Earl, died without male heirs, and the earldom and estates passed to Philip, son of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, who had married Mary, daughter of this earl. Philip was summoned to Parliament as Earl of Arundel. The earldom has since continued in the line of the Fitz-Alan Howards, Dukes of Norfolk. [HOWARD.] The peerage of ARUNDEL OF WARDOUR was conferred in 1605 on Sir Thomas Arundel, a distinguished soldier, who had fought in the wars against the Turks, and had been created a Count of the Holy Roman Empire by Rudolph II.

For interesting questions connected with the peerage of Arundel, see the Lords' First Report on the Dignity of a Peer, esp. Appendix; and Sir Harris Nicolas, Historical Peerage.

Arundel, EDMUND FITZ-ALAN, 2ND EARL OF (d. 1326), was one of the Ordainers appointed in 1310. He was one of the few nobles who remained faithful to Edward II. after the landing of Isabella and Mortimer. He was seized by the latter at Bristol, and hanged with Hugh Despenser.

Arundel, RICHARD FITZ-ALAN, 4TH EARL OF (d. 1397), was the son of Richard, Earl of Arundel, and Eleanor, daughter of Henry, Earl of Lancaster. He succeeded his father in 1375, and served in the French and Scotch wars; but he was chiefly remarkable for his valour and conduct at sea. He was for several years admiral and captain of the east, south, and west, gained several naval victories, and captured Brest. He joined Gloucester against De la Pole and De Vere, and was one of the first Lords Appellant. In 1397 he was involved in Gloucester's fall, and was seized, tried, and beheaded.

Arundel, THOMAS FITZ-ALAN, 10TH EARL OF (d. 1524), was one of the chief nobles attached to Henry VII.'s court. On the occasion of the shipwreck near Weymouth, in January, 1506, of the Archduke of Austria, Philip, and his wife, the Earl of Arundel was the royal messenger sent to congratulate Philip upon his recent escape, and to welcome him to England. The Earl of Arundel had also done the king good service as a soldier in Flanders, during the wars in aid of Maximilian.

Arundel, HENRY FITZ-ALAN, 12TH EARL OF (d. 1580), was in 1547 appointed one of the twelve councillors who, under the will of Henry VIII., were to assist the executors in carrying on the government during the minority of Edward VI. He was one of the chief promoters of the attack on Somerset, which ended in his downfall; and having given an unwilling assent to the alteration of the succession of Edward VI. in favour of Lady

Jane Grey, he was regarded with suspicion by Northumberland, who endeavoured to prevent his leaving London. However, he managed to escape to Baynard's Castle, and at once, with the rest of the Council, declared for Mary; shortly afterwards he arrested the Duke of Northumberland at Cambridge, and conveyed him to London. After the accession of Queen Elizabeth, Arundel became one of her councillors, "feared by all men, trusted by none," and was even named as a probable suitor for her hand, a fact which led to a bitter quarrel with Leicester in 1561. In 1568, as the leader of the old nobility and the Catholic party, he showed himself violently opposed to Cecil and the Reformers, and was present at the Westminster Inquiry as a partisan of Mary Queen of Scots; in the following year he was placed under arrest for complicity in the northern rebellion, and in 1571 was privy to the Ridolfi conspiracy.

Froude, Hist of Eng.; P. F. Tytler, England under Edward VI. and Mary.

Arundel, PHILIP HOWARD, 13TH EARL OF (d. 1595), son of Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, who was attainted and beheaded in 1572, inherited the earldom of Arundel in right of his mother. He was restored in blood and made privy councillor in 1580. On his first appearance at court he won the favour of Elizabeth, but quickly lost it through his immoral life. In 1583 he was charged with complicity in the plot of Francis Throgmorton, having incurred suspicion by becoming "reconciled" to the Catholic Church in 1581 on the solicitations of the Jesuits; but though there was no doubt of his guilt, he was speedily released. On attempting to escape from England, in 1585, he was captured and again sent to the Tower, where he remained until his death. In 1589 he was found guilty of high treason on a charge of having prayed for the success of the Spanish Armada. He was also charged with correspondence with Allen and other Catholic conspirators. He was condemned to death, but by the advice of Cecil and Hatton was not executed. "In her conduct towards this unfortunate nobleman," remarks Mr. Lingard, "the queen betrayed an unaccountable spirit of revenge. He seems to have given some deep but secret offence which, though never divulged, could never be forgotten."

Arundel, THOMAS (b. circa 1352, d. 1413), was the third son of Richard, Earl of Arundel, and was made Bishop of Ely in 1374. He joined Gloucester in his opposition to De la Pole and other ministers of Richard II., and in 1386 was appointed Chancellor. On the banishment of Neville he received the archbishopric of York, and retired from the Chancellorship in 1389. He was Chancellor again from 1391, till his appointment to the archbishopric of Canterbury in 1396. Shortly afterwards he was accused of treason, and at the king's request translated by the Pope to the see of St. Andrews. He was banished from the realm, and concerted with Bolingbroke plans for regaining power in England. He accompanied Henry on his expedition to England, and on the deposition of Richard received the archbishopric once more. He strenuously supported the rights of the Church during the remainder of his life, and was instrumental in getting the statute De Hæretico Comburendo passed. He held the Chancellorship again from 1407 to 1409, and from 1412 to 1413.

Arundel, SIR THOMAS (d. 1552), was one of the most trusted and sagacious of Henry VIII.'s councillors. He enjoyed much influence with the king, and was appointed one of the twenty-four executors appointed to carry out that sovereign's will. He was the brother-in-law and intimate friend of the Protector Somerset, in whose fall he was involved. He was executed on a charge of treason, Feb., 1552.

Asaf-ul-Dowlah (d. 1797) succeeded his father, Sujah Dowlah, as Vizier of Oude, in 1775, and was ultimately recognised by the Emperor. A treaty was concluded with the English, by which the Vizier agreed to surrender Benares and certain other districts of the annual value of twenty-two lacs. This Vizier misgoverned, as his father had done, and by 1781 was in a state of the greatest pecuniary embarrassment. Hastings therefore concluded an arrangement with him, one main object of which was to relieve him from burdens which he professed himself totally unable to bear. It was provided by the new treaty that a portion of the British forces should be withdrawn, that the Vizier might resume all jaghires on payment of compensation. The second article enabled the Vizier to dispossess the Begums (his mother and grandmother) of Oude of their jaghires, and was the prelude to the cruelties exercised to compel them to surrender their treasures, 1782. The impoverishment of the Vizier, however, continued steadily, owing to his misgovernment and debauchery, and in 1786 his repeated requests that the British force should be removed induced Lord Cornwallis to make a fresh treaty with him, by which the money paid for the support of the brigade at Futtygurrh was reduced from seventy-four to fifty lacs on the condition that it should be punctually paid. The misgovernment, however, continued, and the Vizier passed the rest of his life in oppressing his subjects, and indulging in boundless sensuality.

Ascalon, a town on the coast of Syria, about twelve miles from Gaza, was a place of great strength and importance in the earlier Crusades. It was to this town that Richard I. led the crusading army after the fall of Acre in the early part of 1192. On the way his troops were intercepted by a great Saracen army, under the command of Saladin, said to amount to over 300,000 men. The two wings of the Christian army were broken; but the centre, commanded by Richard himself, held firm, and at last drove back the enemy in great disorder. 40,000 of the Saracens are said to have perished. The victory threw the town of Ascalon into the hands of the Crusaders.

Ascension Island, situated in the South Atlantic, was discovered by the Portuguese on Ascension Day, 1501. It was never colonised until it was seized by the English in 1815, during the captivity of Napoleon in the neighbouring island of St. Helena.

Ascham, ANTONY (d. 1650), an author "of much reputation," was sent by the Commonwealth, in 1650, as ambassador to Madrid. A few days after his arrival there, he was assassinated by some refugee Royalists. The murderers, with the exception of one who was executed, were allowed to escape, public opinion in the Spanish capital being entirely in their favour. [DORISLAUS.]

Ascham, ROGER (b. 1515, d. 1568), one of the earliest of English Greek scholars, and at one time public orator at Cambridge, became successively Latin secretary to Edward VI., Queen Mary, and Elizabeth, and was also tutor to the last-named princess in 1548, being charged with her instruction in the learned languages. In 1550 he accompanied Sir William Morysine in the capacity of secretary to the court of Charles V. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, Ascham was, in 1559, made a canon of York. As a writer of English prose Ascham deserves high praise. His style, though somewhat rugged, is pithy and vigorous. His work on education, entitled The Schoolmaster, is interesting and valuable. He also wrote Toxophilus, a treatise on archery, and A Report of the Affairs and State of Germany, which is of some historical value.

Ascham's Works, ed. by Dr. Giles, 1856; A. Katterfeld, Roger Ascham: sein Leben und seine Werke, 1879. An edition of The Schoolmaster, with notes, has been published by Mr. J. E. B. Mayor.

Ascue (Askew, or Ayscough), ANNE (d. 1546), daughter of Sir Thomas Ascue, of Kelsey, in Lincolnshire, was arrested as a heretic for denying the doctrine of the Real Presence in the Sacrament. From her intimacy with Catherine Parr, Anne Ascue's prosecution for heresy is memorable, as it instanced, among other things, the hostility of Bishop Gardiner and Lord Chancellor Wriothesley to the queen; for before being handed over to the executioner for the punishment of burning, Anne, in spite of her sex, was made to undergo in the Tower the torture of the rack, with a view of extorting from her in her agony some avowal implicating other court ladies, and possibly the queen. Wriothesley's efforts are generally thought to have been entirely fruitless; though Parsons, in his "Examen" of Foxe's account of her, states that she actually did so: "By her confession, he (the king) learned so much of Queen Catherine Parr as he purposed to have her burned also, had he lived."

Asgill, JOHN (b. 1658, d. 1738), was the author of various pamphlets, including a treatise, published in 1698, on the possibility of avoiding death. He was elected to the Irish Parliament, and subsequently to the English Parliament, but was expelled on account of the blasphemy of his book. The character of the treatise was animadverted upon in the trial of Dr. Sacheverell. Asgill wrote also a tract, De Jure Divino, on the hereditary claims of the House of Hanover; The Succession of the House of Hanover Vindicated; and an Essay for the Press.

Asgill, SIR CHARLES (b. 1762, d. 1823), in 1780 was a lieutenant in the army of Lord Cornwallis in North America, when that general capitulated at York Town. In the following year the Americans, to revenge the death of a certain Republican officer, cast lots for a victim among their English prisoners. The lot fell on Asgill; but his mother went over to France, and persuaded Marie Antoinette to interest herself on his behalf with the American envoy. The intercession of the French queen was successful. Asgill was released, continued in the army, and in 1794 served under the Duke of York in the Low Countries. In 1798 he was placed in command of a large body of troops for the suppression of the Irish rebellion, and after the Union was for many years employed in various offices in Ireland.

Ash, SIMON (d. 1662), was one of those clergymen who were ejected from their livings by Laud for refusing to read the declaration concerning the Book of Sports. He became chaplain to the Earl of Manchester, and had considerable influence with Presbyterian leaders in the war. He was, however, a strong opponent of the Commonwealth, and was one of those who went to Breda to congratulate Charles II. on his restoration.

Ash was present at the battle of Marston Moor, and wrote an interesting and valuable account of the campaign, "A true relation of the moste chiefe occurrences at and since the late battell at Newberry . . . to vindicate the Earle of Manchester" (Lond., 1644).

Ashantee is a country of western Africa in the interior of the Gold Coast and to the north of the river Prah. It first came under the notice of Englishmen in 1807, when its king, Sy Tutu, attacked Annamaboe, a fort on the coast built by the English after the settlement in 1661. Soon afterwards peace was concluded on disgraceful terms, and it lasted until 1824, when, the Ashantees having attacked the Fantees, over whom the English had established a protectorate, Sir Charles MacCarthy, governor of Cape Coast Castle, advanced with a handful of men against the king, but was surprised and slain at Esmacow. In 1826, the death of MacCarthy was avenged at the battle of Dudowah. Though there were one or two skirmishes between the Ashantees and the English troops, peace was, on the whole, maintained from that date until 1863, when on the refusal of Governor Pine to give up some runaway slaves to the King of Ashantee, war was begun by the latter. The governor drove the savages back to the Prah, but his West Indian troops fell victims to the climate, and he was compelled to withdraw. Once more peace was proclaimed. In 1871 the question whether England or Ashantee should rule the territory between the Prah and the coast, was brought to a final issue by the cession to England by the Dutch of all their claims on the Gold Coast on condition that they should be allowed to annex lands in Sumatra. Thereupon King Coffie Calcali, who had ascended the throne in 1867, objected to the transfer of the town of Elmina on the ground that it always paid him a fixed annual tribute; he had also taken captive some missionaries, whom he did not wish to ransom. He therefore decided on renewing the war, and his general, Amangutia, accordingly crossed the Prah, and drove the cowardly Fantees before them to the coast, but was himself driven from before Elmina by Colonel Festing. Sir Garnet Wolseley was sent out in October to take civil and military command of the Gold Coast, while Captain Glover, R.N., who had been sent out by the Colonial Office in 1872, attempted to raise a native force at the mouth of the Volta. Native troops were, however, very untrustworthy, and pending the arrival of some English soldiers, all that Sir Garnet Wolseley could do was to occupy and stockade the advanced posts on the road to the river Prah. With the arrival of three English regiments and a body of marines, in December, Sir Garnet was able to invade Ashantee; the Prah was crossed on Jan. 20th, and on the 31st he encountered the Ashantees at Amoafu, and defeated them after a severe skirmish. On February 4th the English troops reached Commassie, the Ashantee capital, which they fired. The army was overtaken on its return march by some envoys from King Coffie, and a treaty was concluded, by which the king agreed to pay 50,000 ounces of gold, to renounce all rights over the tribes formerly under the protection of the Dutch, to allow free trade, to keep the road between the Prah and Commassie open, and to discontinue human sacrifices.

Ashburnham, SIR JOHN (d. 1671), a descendant of an old Sussex family, sat in the Long Parliament, and took a prominent part on the Royalist side, and at the outbreak of the Civil War joined the king, and was appointed treasurer and paymaster to the army. He attended Charles I. when he gave himself up to the Scots, and immediately afterwards fled to France. In 1647 he returned, and became one of the king's personal attendants, and was the chief contriver of Charles's escape from Hampton Court. The business was mismanaged, and Ashburnham was accused of treachery by the Royalists; for which, however, there seems to be little ground. He remained in England after the king's death, and compounded for his estate, but being detected in sending money to Charles II., he was in 1654 imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained till Cromwell's death. At the Restoration he received large grants of land, and was made Groom of the Bedchamber to the king.

Ashburnham's Narrative of his Attendance on King Charles the First was published by his descendant, Lord Ashburnham, in 1830.

Ashburton, JOHN DUNNING, 1st LORD (b. 1731, d. 1783), was the son of an attorney at Ashburton, in Devonshire. After being articled to his father, he came up to London and was called to the Bar. In 1760 he made a great reputation by the defence which he drew up on behalf of the East India Company against the Dutch claims. In 1763 he still further increased his fame by his eloquence in the cause of Wilkes against the legality of general warrants. In 1766 he became Recorder of Bristol; was appointed in the next year Solicitor-General; and obtained, in 1768, a seat in Parliament as member for Calne. In 1770 he went out of office, and throughout Lord North's long administration, vigorously opposed the government policy. He warmly maintained the legality of the Middlesex election, opposed the Test Act, seconded Sir George Savile's motion for an inquiry into government pensions, and was one of the most persistent opponents of the policy pursued towards the American Colonies. In 1782, when the Marquis of Rockingham came into power, Dunning was appointed Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and raised to the peerage. Sir William Jones has given a true estimate of his character when he says that "his sense of honour was lofty and heroic; his integrity stern and inflexible; and no love of dignity, of wealth, or of pleasure could have tempted him to deviate in a single instance from the straight line of truth and honesty."

Ashburton Treaty, THE (1846), was concluded between England and America for settling the frontiers of the two countries. It defined them to run along the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude from the great lakes to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence southerly through the middle of that channel to the Pacific. It neglected, however, to define the middle of the channel, and in consequence a dispute, which was finally settled by arbitration, arose as to the ownership of the little island of San Juan.

Ashby, SIR JOHN (b. 1642, d. 1693), a distinguished naval officer, was appointed captain of the Defiance, and took part in the engagement with the French fleet in Bantry Bay. In 1692 he fought in the battle of La Hogue, and, together with Delaval, was entrusted with the pursuit of the French ships. Nottingham afterwards accused him in Parliament, together with Admiral Russell, of negligence in the latter part of the engagement, and though triumphantly acquitted, Ashby seems never to have taken active service again. Ashdown (ÆSCDUN). The name of the town on the Berkshire downs, near Didcot, where was fought, in 871, a great battle between the West Saxons, led by Ethelred and Alfred, and the Danish host, which had spread over East Anglia and invaded Wessex this year. The Danes had seized Reading, and before this town the Saxons were badly beaten. A few days later they again attacked their foes at Ashdown. A desperate battle was fought, lasting all day, and ending in the flight of the Danes. One of their kings and five of their "jarls" fell in the battle. The victory was in great part due to the vigour and promptitude of Alfred, who led one of the two divisions of the Wessex army. [ALFRED.]

Ashtee, THE BATTLE OF (1818), was fought between the English troops under General Smith and Bajee Rao. The latter, after the battle of Korguom, retreated, pursued by the British, who on the 19th of February came up with him at the village of Ashtee, and prepared immediately for the attack. The Peishwa, heaping reproaches on his brave general, Gokla, for this surprise, fled at once, leaving his army to cover his retreat. Gokla, stung by the insult, placed himself at the head of 300 horse, rushed on the sabres of the British cavalry, and fell covered with wounds. After his death the Peishwa's army was easily discomfited, and fled in hopeless confusion.

Aske, ROBERT (d. 1537), was a gentleman of Yorkshire, and the chief organiser of the famous rebellion of Henry VIII.'s reign, known as the Pilgrimage of Grace. His sympathies with the prevalent discontent seem to have been excited originally by his accidental sojourn at Lincoln during the disturbances there in September, 1536. Hurrying thence to Yorkshire, where his character and capabilities were very favourably known, he soon succeeded in organising a much more formidable movement than the one which had inspired his efforts; and, in an astonishingly short space of time, almost the whole kingdom north of the Humber was arrayed against the government of Henry and his minister Cromwell. When the king's verbal concessions and promises had brought about the disbandment of the Yorkshire insurgents, Aske and the other prominent leaders of the movement were at once secured on some plausible pretext, and, in accordance with the summary method of dealing with suspected malcontents at that time, they were put to death after the barest formality of a trial. While D'Arcy was beheaded, Sir Thomas Percy hanged at Tyburn, and Lady Bulmer burnt at the stake, Robert Aske had the distinction of being hanged in chains on one of the towers of York. Aske's talents for organisation and command, his evident singleness of purpose, and his noble moderation and integrity make him a very remarkable and interesting character.

Assam. A province of British India, lying along the upper valleys of the Brahmaputra, and extending from the frontiers of Bengal to Northern Burmah. The country was conquered in the early Middle Ages by tribes from Burmah, who, however, gradually assimilated in language and religion with the Hindoos. The Mohammedans never succeeded in conquering the country, though they frequently attempted it. In the early part of the present century the Assamese became closely connected with Burmah, and their hostile attitude to the East India Company brought about the First Burmese War, the result of which was the annexation of Assam in 1826. It was placed under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, but was made a separate chief-commissionership in 1874. [BURMESE WARS.]

Assandun, THE BATTLE OF (1016), was the last of the battles between Edmund Ironside and Canute. Owing to the treachery of Edric, the English were defeated. Assandun is identified by Mr. Freeman with Aalington, near Rochford, in Essex.

Assassination Plot, THE, was an attempt on the life of William III., first designed in 1695, but postponed by William's departure for Flanders. It grew up side by side with Berwick's plot for the invasion of England by a French army. It was entrusted by the court of St. Germain to Sir George Barclay. Ranke thinks that "all direct evidence" is against the complicity of Louis XIV. and James II.; though "both of them would have been very ready to pluck the fruit." Certainly Barclay was given a commission by James himself authorising him to "do such acts of hostility against the Prince of Orange as should most conduce to the service of the king." Barclay landed in England in January, and in conjunction with Charnock and Parkyns hatched the conspiracy. He was joined by twenty men of James's body-guard, whom he called his Janissaries. It remained to gain twenty more adherents, and but little care was taken in their selection. It was determined to attempt the life of the king on Turnham Green, on his way back to Kensington after hunting in Richmond Park, on the 16th of February. But the hearts of some of the conspirators failed them, and information was conveyed to the Duke of Portland. William thereupon postponed his hunting. Still the conspirators imagined they were undetected; but they were speedily undeceived by the arrest of some of their number, and the issue of warrants against others. A joint address was voted by both Houses of Parliament, acknowledging the Divine goodness which had preserved the king to the people.

Asser (d. 910) was a monk attached to the famous monastery of St. Davids, of which his uncle was bishop. The fame of his learning led King Alfred in 855 to invite him to assist him in his studies. He was made by that monarch Bishop of Sherborne, but seems to have resided a great part of his time at the court, assisting the king in the revival of learning, which he brought about. His name occurs in some catalogues of Bishops of St. Davids; but their historical value is small, and his occupations in England make it highly improbable that he ever attained the bishopric of his native place. His Life of King Alfred (De Rebus Gestis Alfredi) was long considered a thoroughly trustworthy authority. There is, however, little doubt that the work, as we have it now, contains large additions from the hands of later copyists, the great Camden being among the number. Some scholars have even gone so far as to declare the Life entirely spurious. This seems an extreme conclusion; but there is little doubt that the work cannot be relied on as a thoroughly authentic contemporary biography. Accepted with these qualifications, the work is valuable and extremely interesting. [ALFRED.]

No MSS. of Asser are in existence, nor any printed copies earlier than Elizabeth's reign. The work is printed in Monumenta Histor. Britann.; and translated in Bohn's Antiquarian Library.

Assessment. The assessment of taxation begins to be important when direct taxation itself assumes so much more importance with the Norman reigns. For the century and more during which taxation was looked for only from the land, Domesday remained the great rate-book, and its assessment remained unaltered. A township was rated in Domesday at such and such a number of hides, and paid its Danegeld or hidage accordingly. The towns arranged with the sheriff or the itinerant justices what sums they should pay. Only as the knight's fee became the universal mode of reckoning the liability of military tenants, this liability had to be expressed in a new compilation—the Black Book of the Exchequer, or rate-book for tenants-in-chief; which again was revised more than a century later in the Testa de Nevill. But Domesday itself was a return sent in to royal commissioners by each hundred and township, a joint work of the royal and popular powers. When, after the Saladin tithe of 1188 upon movables as well as rents, taxation began to fall more and more on personal property, and to advance towards the subsidy of the fourteenth and succeeding centuries, then more than ever the assessment of a tax required the free co-operation of each locality. Only from a jury of neighbours could a due estimate be reached of a man's property. The assessment of taxation was committed to representatives in each district, and taxation itself was rapidly becoming a function for the united representatives of the whole nation. When this latter point is reached in the Parliamentary system of Edward I., the matter of assessment loses its main constitutional importance, having already done its work. The knights of the shire, who in 1220, for instance, assess the average on their neighbours, in 1296, assembled in one body, grant the tax, and in the Good Parliament of 1376 demand the right to settle its appropriation. And indeed, as early as 1334, assessment becomes little more than mechanical when the rating of the fifteenth, made in that year and recorded in the Exchequer, was thereafter taken as a standard. Henceforth the only question which remains to give trouble is concerned with the assessment of the clergy. When, from the date above given (1188), their "spiritualities," i.e., revenues from fees, &c., came under contribution, the assessment was carried out by the same method of juries of neighbours, until, in 1256, the Norwich taxation made by order of Pope Alexander IV., and in 1291 the valuation superseding it, which was made by order of Nicholas IV., and which covered both "temporalities" and "spiritualities," gave the clergy a permanent independent rate-book, which was acted on till the Reformation. But it left an opening for constant disputes in the next two centuries as to the mode and rate of assessment to be applied; first, to lands acquired by the Church since the valuation of 1291, and secondly as to the large class of chantry priests and private chaplains whom that valuation had left out of account. This clerical valuation and the lay assessment of Domesday, as well as the rating to subsidies of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, were probably far below the real value. Not only were exemptions wide and numerous, but the rating itself was evidently at a nominal valuation. The Domesday hide, for example, omitted unproductive ground; and the later subsidies did not fall on a knight's equipment or a peasant's implements. The lightness of the assessment must, in fact, be set against the burdensomeness of early taxation due to its uncertainty, its wasteful modes of collection, and its suicidally short-sighted principles. When the methods of assessment ceased in the fourteenth century to have a formative effect on the constitution, their chief importance is over. But here, too, the Tudor and Stuart kings, going back for precedents to an age before the national liberties were set on a firm constitutional basis, revived on several occasions more arbitrary methods, and disregarded the valuations which had been accepted for two centuries. Thus the commissioners under Wolsey's great scheme of taxation in 1522, and again in 1525, were to assess each man, clerk or lay, to the value of his chattels. In 1621 the assessors were to disregard old rates, and to rate every man according to their own knowledge, not even accepting his own declaration, and such was the precedent followed in the raising of ship-money. The whole practice, too, of benevolences and of forced loans levied according to official estimates of the individual's property, was an application of arbitrary assessment. Again, in the seventeenth century, with the establishment of the excise arose a question of some practical moment, how this was assessed. Similar points of social interest are connected with the injurious effects of certain taxes, assessed on a false principle, as the window-tax; or the introduction of the income tax, in which recourse has to be made to a rude method of joint assessment by the payer himself and by an official commissioner. But these methods are, as a matter of fact, guaranteed against unjustly operating, by the right of appeal to a higher body or a court of law.

Assiento, THE (1713), or the "contract" for supplying the Spanish colonies in the Western world with negro slaves, was at first an arrangement between France and Spain. After the merchandise had been carried on by Genoa and Portugal, it had been undertaken in 1702 by a French company. By one of the stipulations of the Treaty of Utrecht, this right was surrendered to England, and confirmed by a special treaty of forty-two clauses. After France had resigned the Assiento, Spain was to convey it to England for thirty years, at the end of which period, and a further term of three years, the traffic was to be wound up. England was to furnish 4,800 negroes annually. With the Assiento England was to have the right of sending two ships a year, each of five hundred tons burden, to America with negroes. A contest for this profitable monopoly soon arose between the African and the South Sea Company; the latter were successful, and obtained the fourth part reserved for the queen by the terms of the treaty. On the outbreak of war with Spain, England lost the Assiento, but it was once more renewed in 1725, and was again restored to her by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748), for the remaining four years which it had to run. "Not one person," says Mr. Wyon, "seems to have imagined that there was anything immoral or unjustifiable in the business itself."

Assize (assisa-assisia) is a word of doubtful etymology; probably at least two words have converged to create the ideas underlying the various senses of the term; viz. (a), assido or assideo, to sit down—i.e., a session or a settlement, the notions perhaps common to most meanings of assize; (b) accido, to tax (cf. excise and assisus redditus). Besides these (c) there must be some connection with the Anglo-Saxon asetniss, a law (cf. établissement de St. Louis); and (d) Ducange's editors can explain assisia only by reference to Arabic.

Meanings—(1) Session, and, specially, Judicial Session.—This meaning, which is found so early as in the Pipe Roll 2, Henry II., may possibly be the original one; cf. Watsius, De Jure Vet. Munic. Norm., i. 56: "assize est une assemblée de plusieurs sages hommes en laquelle ce qui y sera jugié doit avoir produirable fermé." From this come the "Grandes" and "Petites Assises" of France, and the Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, called "Cours d'Assises," in the Code Napoléon. The modern English use to denote the court of the justices on circuit is, perhaps by an accident, an example of this use of the word. A specialised case is the old use of assize for—

(2) The Select Body Engaged in Administering the Trial—e.g., Provisions of Oxford, in the "provisum est quod nullus miles non ponatur in iuratis vel assisis"—i.e., all knights are liable to be jurymen. The words are clearly synonymous, though the old law books make a distinction. The "sworn men" are also the "men settled" to try a case.

(3) A Law or Ordinance—i.e., the "lex assisa," the settled edict of the king. In reality a law, the "Assize" in this sense professed to be rather an occasional enactment, valid during pleasure, an executive, not a legislative, act. Thus, the mediæval reverence for the "written law," which sprang from the solemn sense assigned to "lex" in the Bible and Roman Law, was respected, and real legislative changes produced by a legal fiction—cf. the Prætor's Edict, the Capitularies of the Carolingians, the Provisions of Henry III., the "Establishments" of St. Louis, all of which had the same object. Instances of such assizes are the "Assises de Jérusalem," a code for the Frank kingdom of Palestine, drawn up by Godfrey of Bouillon and his barons (1099), Henry II.'s Assizes of Clarendon, Northampton, Woodstock, Arms, Essoines, &c. ("novas leges quas assisas vocavit"), for which see below; the Assizes of Antioch, Sicily, Roumania, and in Brittany the Assizes of Count Geoffrey in 1186, and the Assize of Count John (against the Jews) in 1239. Wherever Norman or Frank influence went, twelfth-century law assumed the form of assizes.

(4) State Regulations of the Price, Quality, &c., of various Commodities.—A sense kindred to previous paragraph. These were the "assise rerum venalium" of old English and French law. Richard I. aimed—not very successfully—at uniform weights and measures (Assize of Measures in Hoveden, iv. 33). John "fecit generaliter acclamari ut legalis assisa panis inviolabiliter observaretur" (Matthew Paris, A.D. 1201). This points to pre-existing custom. There were also assizes of wine, ale, salt, boards, timber, wood, coal, butter, and cheese. These restrictions on trade and on adulteration were kept up quite late—e.g., there were three editions of the assize printed in 1528, 1530, and 1580. In 6 and 7 Wm. IV., Acts regulating the assize of bread were formally repealed. They were carried into New England and long kept up there.

(5) A Mode of Trial prescribed by an Assize (in sense of law)—e.g., the Grand Assize of Henry II. and the other "real actions," the assizes of Mort d'Ancester, Novel Disseisin, and Daresin Presentment (see below). Spelman calls them "brevia regia et litigandi formulæ." Assize here means (a) the law; (b) the rule instituted by it.

(6) The Trial itself—e.g., in the assize of Northampton the royal direction to the justices to try robbers (ut faciant assisam de latronibus); cf. "cum brevis assisarum et placitorum" in royal writ of 1231.

(7) Assessment—i.e., the settlement of the incidence of a tax—e.g., Dialogus De Scaccario, i. 8. "Fiunt per comitatus communes assise a iusticiis errantibus—quæ ideo dicuntur communes quia cognita summa quæ de comitatu requiruntur," &c.

(8) A Tax—e.g., Liber Niger Scaccarii, cap. De Danegeldo, "ex constitutis duobus solidis summa una quæ communis assisa nuncupatur excrecit;" cf. "levare assisam," to levy a tax.

(9) Fines.—Fixed by courts of justice—e.g., in Brittany, "le seigneur peut demander pour son betail l'assise ou le dedommage a son choix."

(10) Assisus Redditus.—The fixed rent which customary tenants paid to the lord of the manor, beyond which they were free. This is analogous to the preceding.

The various law glossaries, such as Spelman and the modern works based on him, collect the chief uses of assize; cf. Ducange's Glossarium Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis, and the old law books, Britton, Bracton, &c. [T. F. T.]

Assize, Justices of, were originally the judges commissioned to try the special assizes or real actions mentioned in Assize (5). By 27 Ed. I., s. 1, c. 3, it was ordered that Justices of Assize should, if laymen, also make deliverance of the gaol; and before long, the common law judges always were laymen. Gradually various other commissions were given to them, as it was a main object of Edward I.'s judicial reforms to simplify and consolidate the too numerous Acts which had oppressed the nation under his father. So the commissions of nisi prius, of oyer and terminer, and of the peace, were added to those above mentioned; until the judge, with his five commissions under the Great Seal, was on his provincial circuit generally called the Justice of Assize, though, properly speaking, that was only one of his commissions. By 3 and 4 Wm. IV., the actions of "assizes" were abolished, so that the present commission is only fourfold, but the name has survived the fact, and their courts are still generally called the "assizes," and the town of their meeting the assize town.

Assize of Arms, The, was an ordinance issued by Henry II. in 1181. It revived and organised the old national militia, based on the obligation of all freemen to serve in the fyrd. Henry hoped it would be a safer support to his throne than the feudal levies or the unpopular mercenaries. By this assize all freemen were required to provide arms suited to their rank and means. A knight, or possessor of over sixteen marks yearly, provided a coat of mail, helmet, shield, and lance: the freeholder of ten marks, a hauberk, iron cap, and lance; and all burgesses and "tota communia liberorum hominum" a gambeson, iron cap, and lance. Doubtful cases were decided by a jury. Elaborate provisions were annexed for the enforcement of the law. Paralleled in most other European countries, this assize was renewed by Henry III.'s system of watch and ward, and by Edward I.'s Statute of Winchester.

Assize of Clarendon (1166), Henry II.'s first great measure of judicial reform, was remarkable as formally instituting, and giving legislative recognition to, the jury system in criminal trials, as connecting the local with the central jurisdiction, and as the first effort to constitute a great administrative system. Henry I. had probably borrowed the institution of justices itinerant from the Carolingian missi. His plan was now enlarged and made permanent. A commission was sent round to each shire, to whom, in conjunction with the sheriffs, grand juries of the county were to present accused or suspected persons. The ordeal by water furnished a further means of discrimination. This new system of presentment and ordeal abolished compurgation. Other provisions required all qualified persons to serve on juries, opened every franchise to the sheriff, regulated the treatment of waifs and strangers on purely Anglo-Saxon principles, directed sheriffs to help each other, to make lists of fugitives, forbade religious houses to receive "aliquem de minuto populo," unless sick to death or of good repute, and forbade hospitality to the heretics condemned at Oxford.

Assize of Darrein Presentment.

An action to determine the lawful patron of a benefice. "If a tenant in fee or in tail had himself presented, or if his ancestors had presented, to a benefice, or if a tenant for life or years had himself presented and the nominee had been duly instituted, but afterwards the old possessor of the advowson had been debarred from exercising his right, he could institute a recognition of darrein presentment." This inquest was originated by Henry II., and is alluded to in Glanvil. By Magna Charta (art. 18) it was to be held, along with the assizes of mort d'ancestor and novel disseisin four times a year, by two justices in the county court, in conjunction with a jury of four knights of that county; but the Charter of 1217 reserves cases of darrein presentment to the Justices in banco (art. 15). By the Statute of Westminster the first (3 Ed. I., c. 51), the assize was again assimilated to the other two, and directed to be held every Advent, Septuagesima, and Lent. It became early obsolete, as the writ quare impedit gave an easier means of prosecuting claims to advowson, and was abolished, with all "real actions," by 3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 27.

Assize of Mort d'Ancestor.

When the heir to an estate was deprived by a stranger of part of what had been in the possession of his predecessor (antecessor) at the time of the latter's decease, he could apply for a possessory writ de morte antecessoris. Glanvil, to whom we owe our earliest knowledge of what was probably then one of Henry II.'s novelties, describes the process of the inquest. The sheriff empanels a jury of twelve lawful freeholders of the neighbourhood, and the suit is determined by their testimony. It was held by the justices in the shire, mostly with a jury of four knights four times a year, according to Magna Charta, § 18. But the Charter of 1217 directs the assize to be used only once a year. By the Statute of Westminster the first, it was held thrice in the year. It became obsolete, and was abolished by 3 and 4 Wm. IV.

Assize of Northampton (1176). A re-issue and expansion of the Assize of Clarendon, marked by the increased severity of the punishments, the lessened trust reposed in the sheriffs, and the gradual limitation of the ordeal. Those presented by the jury who escaped on the ordeal, had to find bail for good behaviour if accused of a small offence; but if felony or "murdrum" had to abjure the realm. Confessions before the jury must not be revoked before the judge. Some new legal articles are of great importance in relation to land tenure, reliefs, dower, and other feudal obligations. The concluding political articles require, in reference to the 1173 rebellion, oaths of fealty even from villains, the destruction of castles held against the king, the safe custody of all others, the registration of fugitives and outlaws. The justices are to make exhaustive inquiries of all kinds, hold all pleas, and look after the royal revenue. The country is divided into six circuits, to be visited by six commissions.

Stubbs, Select Charters, 143—145.

Assize of Novel Disseisin. An action that lay with a tenant unjustly dispossessed of his lands, tried by the itinerant justices before a jury of the neighbourhood. The importance attached to this assize illustrates the widespread lawlessness of the times. Its limitation to recent disseisins is equally significant. The Assize of Northampton (chap. 5) directs "Ut Justitiae Regis faciant recognitionem de disseisinis factis a tempore quo dominus rex venit in Angliam post pacem," and this seems to be the original text of the assize. The assize is called by Bracton "Summaria cognitio absque magna juris solennitate," and by the Statute of Westminster the second "festinum remedium." Its history is the same as the history of the assizes of mort d'ancestor and darrein presentment. Analogous to it was the assize of fresh force, so called, because the plaint was to be within sixty days of the injury. It was a writ that lay by custom of a town when a man was disseised within the borough. Similar also was the assize of nuisance.

Assize of Utrum lay with the possessor of an ecclesiastical benefice to recover lands of the Church alienated by his predecessor. The term "utrum" was the emphatic word which directed the jury to inquire whether the tenements or lands were in frank almoign of the descendant's church, or the lay fee of the tenant. It was instituted by statute 14 Ed. III., c. 17, and practically ended by the restraining statute 13 Eliz., c. 10.

Assize of Woodstock, or the Assize of the Forest, drawn up by Henry II. in 1184, was the first code of any elaborateness for the government of the forests, which, from the time of the Conquest at least, were regarded as specially subject to the uncontrolled jurisdiction of the monarch. The forest jurisdiction is arranged on just the same lines as the county jurisdiction, just as the manor organisation was based on that of the free township. The punishments are said to be milder than those in vogue under Henry I., but the whole assize is full of vexatious clauses, which must have been very irksome to dwellers in the forest. No one can possess a dog or a bow and arrows without a royal licence. Elaborate regulations have reference to the woods and clearings within the forest that belonged to private individuals. All men, from archbishop and earl down to the simple freeholder, are required to attend the forest courts on the summons of the master forester (this was repealed by Magna Charta). All persons over twelve years old dwelling within the forest are to swear to keep the peace of the forest. Hounds are to have their foreclaws cut off, and no tanners or bleachers of hides are to dwell therein, beyond the limits of a borough. [FORESTS.]

Select Charters, 150-152; Reeves' History of English Law and Blackstone's Commentaries give a full account of this and most of the above assizes. Most of them are printed in Dr. Stubbs's Select Charters (with invaluable comments). See also his Const. Hist., vol. I.

[T. F. T.]

Assize, THE GRAND. A form of inquest by sworn recognitors in cases of suits to determine the possession of a freehold, instituted by Henry II. as an alternative to wager of battle, which, since the Conquest, had been the ordinary way of trying such suits. The procedure, according to the assize, was as follows. On the motion of the possessor, the Curia Regis stopped proceedings in the local courts until after the inquest. On the claimant's command, four lawful knights were selected and summoned, through the sheriff, to Westminster, where they elected twelve lawful knights of their neighbourhood, before whom, and the king or his justices, the trial comes off. If the jury know the facts, they have only to declare their verdict. If not, those ignorant are replaced by better informed witnesses. Their decision is final. Long obsolete, the Grand Assize was only abolished by 3 and 4 Wm. IV., cap. 27. The text of Henry II.'s ordinance is lost, but a copious account of it is given in Glanvil, with much about its equity and superiority to the "duellum."

Assizes, THE BLACK. A name often given to the assizes at Oxford in 1577, when "a pestilent savour" rose either from the noisome smell of the prisoners, or the damp of the ground, owing to which all present were seized, within forty hours, of fever, and many died (some accounts say, with probable exaggeration, 300), including the chief baron, the sheriff, and a large number of the Oxfordshire gentry.

Assizes, THE BLOODY. A term often applied to the summer assizes of 1686, held in the Western Circuit after Monmouth's rebellion; when Chief Justice Jeffreys sentenced more than 300 rebels to death for treason after the barest mockery of a trial.

Macaulay, History, II., chap. 5. A tract called The Bloody Assizes contains contemporaneous accounts of the executions.

Associated Counties was the name given to the counties of Essex, Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Hertford, to which were subsequently added Huntingdon and Lincoln. These counties formed an association in 1642 to keep the war out of their own districts and raise an army for the Parliament. The Association was first commanded by Lord Grey of Wark, and subsequently by the Earl of Manchester and Cromwell. Other counties formed similar associations, "but," says Carlyle, "the 'Eastern Association' is alone worth naming. All the other associations, no men of emphasis being in the midst of them, fell in a few months to pieces; only this of Cromwell's subsisted, enlarged itself, grew famous; and, indeed, kept its own borders clear of invasion during the whole course of the war."

Association in favour of William III., (1) (1688), was devised by Sir Edward Seymour after the prince had landed in England, in order to bind his supporters by some mutual obligation. It was signed first at Exeter and then in all the western counties. (2) The more famous association, that of 1696, was formed on the discovery of the Assassination Plot. The idea was proposed by Sir Rowland Gwyn, and eagerly adopted by Montague. The members of the House of Commons, each for himself, solemnly recognised William as rightful and lawful king, and bound themselves to stand by him; and they vowed that, if his life should be shortened by violence, they would avenge his murder, and support the order of succession settled by the Bill of Rights. The measure was opposed by the Tories in the Lower House, headed by Musgrave, on the ground that the formula implied an abjuration, and that William could not be properly described as "rightful and lawful king." Leeds, in order to conciliate opposition in the Upper House, proposed the verbal alteration that it should be declared that William had a right by law to the English crown, and that no other person had any right whatever to that crown. This quibble satisfied nearly all the Tory peers. The country in general was seized with great enthusiasm. The municipal corporations all over the country appended their signatures to similar documents. Everywhere orange ribands were worn, on which were written in letters of gold the words "National Association for King William."

Burnet, Hist. of his Own Time, iv. 299; Macaulay, History, iv. 670.

Association Project (1582) was the name given to the proposal, emanating from France, for associating James VI. and his mother, the Queen of Scots, together in the government of Scotland.

Association to Protect Queen Elizabeth, BOND OF, 1584, was an attempt to organise all English Protestants into "a universal vigilance committee" (Froude), to defend the queen against the plots of the Papists. In Nov., 1584, Burleigh and Walsingham framed an instrument declaring that the signers of it bound themselves together on oath to withstand any attempt against the queen's person, and if any such attempt should be made and should be successful, to pursue to the death the person or persons who had been concerned in it. The association was primarily directed against Mary Queen of Scots, and was meant to show her partisans that her own death would follow closely on the assassination of Elizabeth. The oath of association was taken with enthusiasm by the nobility, privy councillors, judges, the clergy, and all who held office under the crown, and a large number of private persons throughout the country. Many of the Roman Catholic nobility and gentry were among those who signed the Bond.

Associations (Ireland) Bill (1826), 6 George IV., c. 4, was directed chiefly against the Catholic Associations. It forbade periodical sittings of political associations, the appointment of committees for more than fourteen days, the levying of money to redress grievances, the administering of oaths, the exclusion of men on account of their religion, and the affiliation of societies. It lasted for three years, but failed to crush O'Connell's agitation.

Assured Lords, THE, consisted chiefly of Scottish nobles taken prisoners at the battle of Solway Moss, Nov. 25, 1542, who, from a long sojourn at the English court, had become to a certain extent identified with English interests. On their return to Scotland after the death of James V., they undertook to serve Henry VIII. at the Scotch court, giving hostages to the English king for their fidelity. Henry, however, soon found that their good faith was doubtful, and in 1544 they openly joined the national party. The assured Lords consisted of the Earls of Cassilis and Glencairn, Lords Fleming, Somerville, Maxwell, and Oliphant, taken at Solway Moss; together with the Earl of Angus and his brother, Sir George Douglas, who had long been refugees at the English court.

Assye, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 23, 1803), during the Mahratta War, was fought between an army of 4,500, commanded by General Wellesley, and the great army of Dowlut Rao Scindiah and the Rajah of Berar; which, after the capture of Jalnapoor on the 2nd, was retreating towards the Adjuttee Pass, while the English, in two divisions, under Wellesley and Colonel Stephenson, were attempting to intercept them. The Mahrattas were strongly entrenched, with their left resting on Assye, when Wellesley came up with them, and without waiting for Colonel Stephenson, resolved to attack them. Wellesley had given the most positive injunctions to the officer commanding the pickets to avoid the cannon planted in the village, but in spite of this he led his troops directly up to the muzzles of the guns, which poured an incessant shower upon the assailants. The 74th Regiment, which supported them, was thus exposed to a hotter fire than any troops had ever before encountered in India. To save it, more troops had to be moved up amid this terrific fire. The indomitable courage and energy of the British troops, however, bore down all resistance, and Scindiah's infantry gave way. The English cavalry then charged, and forced them off the field. The victory was complete; but it was dearly gained by the loss of one-third of the army.

Astley, JACOB, LORD (d. 1651), had served in many foreign countries, and had distinguished himself in Germany under Gustavus Adolphus. He joined the army of Charles I., and, having taken part in the battles of Edgehill, Brentford, and Newbury, was raised to the peerage. At the battle of Naseby, Astley commanded the infantry, and in 1646 he made a last stand at Stow-on-the-Wold against the Parliament. Here he was defeated by Brereton and taken prisoner. He compounded for his estate, gave his parole not to serve any more against Parliament, and spent the rest of his life in retirement.

Aston, SIR ARTHUR (d. Sept. 12, 1649), was a distinguished soldier, who had acquired military experience abroad. He was governor of Oxford at the beginning of the Civil War, but was soon after disabled by a wound. At a later period he was governor of Reading. In 1649, Ormonde made him governor of Drogheda, hoping that he would be able to hold out till the rains. This he was unable to do, and on the taking of the place he was literally hacked to pieces by the Puritan soldiers.

Atheling (ÆTHELING) was a title of honour among the Anglo-Saxons, meaning one who is of noble (æthel) blood. In the earlier period, the Eorlas and Æthel are used to designate the class spoken of by Bede as nobles, in all probability "the descendants of the primitive nobles of the first settlement, who, on the institution of royalty, sank one step in dignity from the ancient state of rude independence" (Stubbs). As the nobility of blood became superseded by the nobility of service, the title of Ætheling was gradually confined to the princes of the blood royal, and in the ninth and tenth centuries is used exclusively for the sons or brothers of the reigning king. Though he seems to have held no official position in right of his birth, the atheling was superior in dignity to all men but the king and the great functionaries of the Church, as shown by his "wer-gild." In the "north people's law" of the tenth century, the gild of the atheling and the archbishop (and in this case of the "eorl" who corresponds no doubt to the Danish "jarl"), is 15,000 thrymsas, while that of the bishop or ealdorman is 8,000. So too in the laws of Athelstan of Wessex. The atheling attended the Witenagemot as one of the magnates of the kingdom, and was one of those who were least seldom absent from it. The name was kept up after the Norman Conquest, and is applied not only to the young princes, the sons of Edmund Ironside, but also to William "Clito," the son of Henry I. and Matilda, and possibly to Henry himself.

Athelney (Aethelunga eigge), the Isle of Princes, is situated about seven miles from Taunton. Hither, in 878, Alfred the Great repaired after his defeat by the Danes, and here he remained concealed for nearly a year, when, sallying forth, he defeated the invaders and compelled them to make peace. At that time Athelney was a veritable island in the midst of fens and marshes, but it has since been drained and cultivated.

Athelstan (ÆTHELSTAN) (b. 895, s. 925, d. 941) was the son of King Edward, and grandson of Alfred. According to William of Malmesbury, his mother, Ecgwyn, was of humble origin, and it has been thought that he was illegitimate. On the death of Edward, the Mercians and West-Saxons chose Athelstan as their king, and he was crowned at Kingston-on-Thames. There appears to have been some opposition to his accession, and it is probable that a conspiracy was formed against him by some of the leading nobles and princes of the royal house. The plot, however, was suppressed, and Athelstan speedily attained to a position of greater power and dignity than that of any of the preceding West-Saxon sovereigns. One of his sisters married Sihtric, the Danish King of Northumbria, and on his death Athelstan invaded the territories of his successor, Guthfrith, and compelled him to hold his kingdom as a tributary state. Subsequently he made several expeditions against the Welsh of Wales and Cornwall, and reduced their rulers also to the position of subject princes. Thus under him the state of Wessex became one of the great powers of Western Europe, and was held in high estimation by foreign governments. Of Athelstan's sisters, one, Elgiva (Ælgifu), married Otto the Great, Duke of the Saxons (afterwards Emperor), and another Ethilda (Eadhlid), Hugh, Duke of the French, and father of Hugh Capet. Athelstan took a considerable share in the politics of northern France, and it was chiefly by his efforts that Louis d'Outremer, the son of Charles the Simple, was restored to his throne. In 937 a formidable league was formed against the power of Wessex, between the Danes, Scots, and Britons. Constantine, the King of Scotia, Anlaf (Olaf), the son of Guthfrith of Northumbria, and Anlaf (Olaf) Cuaran, the Danish King of Dublin, together with Owen of Cumberland and other British chieftains, united their forces. A great battle was fought at Brunanburh, in Northumberland, in which the invaders were completely defeated, with terrible loss. [BRUNANBURH.] Athelstan's subsequent years were peaceful and uneventful. Athelstan is greatly praised by the chroniclers, and he appears to have been a wise and vigorous ruler. Such of his laws as remain show that his wars and foreign policy were far from absorbing the whole of his attention. His ordinances are more particularly directed to the enforcement of the system of mutual assurance and association, which held so great a place in Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence. One of the most important of his acts was that in which it is law that every landless man shall have a lord; and the "Judicia Civitatis Londoniæ," attributed to Athelstan, are highly valuable in connection with the history of guilds and civic associations. The chief imputation on Athelstan's character is the alleged murder, by drowning, of his half-brother, Edwin, on the pretext that he was engaged in a conspiracy against the king; but the story is doubtful. It is told in the Chronicle, but is not accepted by William of Malmesbury.

Athenry, THE BATTLE OF (1316), was fought between Feidlim O'Connor and the English, under William de Burgh and Richard de Bermingham. Eleven thousand O'Connors fell beside their chief, and the sept disappears from history. The O'Connors were ostensibly fighting in the interest of Edward Bruce.

Atherton Moor, or Adwalton, THE BATTLE OF (June 30, 1643), was a skirmish fought between the Royalists, under the Earl of Newcastle, and the Parliamentarians, under Fairfax. The latter were completely routed, and the capture of Bradford (from which Atherton Moor is some four miles distant) by the Royalists was the immediate result.

Athlone, GODART DE GINKELL, EARL OF (b. 1640, d. 1720), was one of the Dutch officers who accompanied William of Orange to England. In 1689 he reduced some Scotch regiments who had mutinied at Harwich when under orders to be in readiness to cross to the Continent. He accompanied William to Ireland, and commanded a body of horse at the battle of the Boyne. When William left Ireland, Ginkell was appointed commander-in-chief. He reduced Ballymore without difficulty and proceeded to lay siege to Athlone, which he carried by assault, and subsequently won the victory of Aghrim over St. Ruth. This victory completed the conquest of Ireland (July 12). Ginkell then besieged Limerick, which he captured (Oct. 2), and granted fairly favourable terms to the defenders. A violent dispute arose between Ginkell and Sarsfield, the Jacobite leader, as to the destination of the Irish troops; till at length it was decided that they might make their choice between England and France. For these services Ginkell was created Earl of Athlone. The small estate that was given him in Ireland for his services was one of the objects of the Commons' attack in 1700. [RESUMPTION BILL.] After the declaration of war with France he competed unsuccessfully against the Duke of Marlborough for the position of commander of the Dutch forces. Before the arrival of the great duke in Flanders, his clever occupation of Nimeguen prevented its seizure by Marshal Boufflers. Ginkell had little knowledge or understanding of English feelings and institutions; but his abilities as a general were certainly above the average.

Athlone, THE CAPTURE OF (June 19—30, 1691), was Ginkell's first important success over the Irish followers of James II. under the French general, St. Ruth. After the fall of Ballymore the whole army moved westward to Athlone. "It was, perhaps," says Macaulay, "in a military point of view, the most important place in the island." The town was surrounded by ramparts of earth, and lay partly in Leinster and partly in Connaught, the English quarter being in the former and the Celtic quarter in the latter. The Shannon, which is the boundary of the two provinces, rushed through Athlone in a deep and rapid stream, and turned two large mills which rose on the arches of a stone bridge. Above the bridge, on the Connaught side, a castle towered to the height of seventy feet. Fifty or sixty yards below the bridge was a narrow ford. On the 20th, Ginkell assaulted the English quarter and mastered it with trifling loss. On the 22nd he opened fire on the castle. A struggle now began for the possession of the bridge, resolutely defended by the Irish under Maxwell. St. Ruth, thinking the position perfectly secure, had not yet come up, but lay about two miles off, sending his subordinate, D'Usson, to conduct the defence. On June 30th, Ginkell resolved to try the ford. With Mackay, Talmash, Prince George of Darmstadt, and the Duke of Wurtemberg at their head, the soldiers dashed into the water. The Irish, greatly to the disgust of the French commander, offered but feeble resistance, and the town was taken.

Athole, JOHN STUART, 4TH EARL OF (d. 1679), was a staunch Romanist and supporter of Mary Queen of Scots. He was named one of the Commission of Regency established on the abdication of Mary, 1667. On Murray's return from France he accompanied him to Lochleven and had an interview with the queen. In 1669 he was suspected of planning a rebellion against Murray. In 1677 he combined with Argyle against the Regent Morton, whose deposition was in great part owing to his exertions, and about the same time was appointed Chancellor of Scotland; he died soon afterwards at Stirling, poisoned, it was said, by Morton.

Athole, THE PEERAGE OF, appears to date back to the time of Alexander I. of Scotland, when Madach, a son of Donald Bane, is styled Earl of Athole. From his descendants it passed by marriage to the Strathbogie family, one of whom, David, eleventh Earl of Athole, in the reign of Edward II., married the heiress of the great families of Comyn and Valence, and became possessed of vast estates in England. His Scotch peerage was, however, forfeited in 1311 for his connection with the Baliol party. These Scotch estates were granted to Sir Neil Campbell, brother-in-law to King Robert Bruce, whose son, Sir John Campbell, was created Earl of Athole. He died (at Halidon Hill, in 1333) without issue, and the earldom was conferred on Sir W. Douglas, from whom it passed to Robert Stuart, Great Steward of Scotland, and thus became vested in the royal family. In 1457 Sir John Stuart, of Balveny, was created Earl of Athole. The peerage became extinct in 1625, and in 1628 was revived and granted to John Murray, Earl of Tullibardine, who was descended by his mother from the Stuart earls. John, the third earl of this family, was created Duke of Athole and Marquis of Tullibardine in 1703, in the peerage of Scotland, and his third son and successor claimed and established his right to the barony of Strange in the peerage of England.

Attacotti, THX, were an ancient Celtic tribe who inhabited a portion of Argyleshire and the greater part of Dumbartonshire.

Attainder. "Attainder imports that extinction of civil rights and capacities which took place whenever a person who had committed treason or felony received judgment of death or outlawry," whether such judgment were pronounced by a royal justice after trial and conviction, or were decreed by a legislative Act of Parliament, called a Bill of Attainder. In ancient law this involved (1) Corruption of Blood, and (2) Forfeiture, complete or partial.

(1) The blood of the attainted criminal was held to be corrupted and stained, and the virtue by which he could inherit, and transmit and even hold, property destroyed. Attainders operated, in fact, exactly like a sudden discovery of illegitimacy in the possessor of property; the stream of inheritance was at once cut off, and could be re-established only by a special grant of the Legislature. From this it followed that the lands of the criminal reverted back or escheated to the lord of the fee, in subordination, however, to forfeiture to the crown; and that any title of his descendants which had to be traced through him to a remoter ancestor was obstructed and barred. This was felt to be such a hardship that, in the creation of new felonies since the reign of Henry VIII., Parliament has always provided that they shall not involve "corruption of blood." The statute 54 Geo. III., c. 145, still further limits its operation to treason and murder. The Inheritance Act, 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 106, gave further relief by enacting that the attainder of an intermediate ancestor should not obstruct the tracing of the descent through him if his death took place before the property devolved.

(2) Forfeiture for treason transferred to the crown the entire property of the traitor. Unlike escheat, it was no feudal innovation, but dates back to Saxon times, and, indeed, has been the rule in the early legislation of most nations. So foreign to early society is any compunction against punishing the son for the father's crime that some ancient codes, not content with reducing a traitor's children to beggary, involve them in the same capital sentence; and the Golden Bull declares that the sons of a subject who kills an elector have their lives spared only by the imperial bounty. The two kinds of property recognised by English law, lands and chattels, were both forfeited absolutely to the crown for treason, but the forfeiture of the former followed on judgment, and its operation went back to the moment at which the treason was committed, making void all alienations which had been effected in the interval; the forfeiture of the latter followed on conviction, and, from obvious motives of convenience, had no such retrospective force. The wife's dower was untouched by the husband's attainder till expressly included in the forfeiture by the merciless statute 5 and 6 Ed. VI., c. 11. In the case of counterfeiting the coin, the statutes which made the offence treason limited the forfeiture to the life of the offender, and expressly guarded the wife's dower (5 Eliz., c. 11; 8 and 9 Will. III., c. 26; 15 Geo. II., c. 28). The celebrated statute of Queen Anne (7 Anne, c. 21) extended the same principle to all treasons by enacting that after the decease of the Pretender "no attainder for treason should extend to the disinheriting of any heirs, nor to the prejudice of the right or title of any person" other than the offender himself; but this humane provision was first delayed by 17 Geo. II., c. 39, and finally repealed by 39 and 40 Geo. III., c. 93. Forfeiture for felony was only partial, and seems to have arisen from an old right of the crown to commit unlimited waste on the lands of a felon. So detrimental did this prove to the interests of the lord of the fief, and of the country at large, that in the reign of Henry I. it was commuted for the right to the profits for a year and a day, a rule confirmed by Magna Charta. The statute 17 Ed. II. confused the two, enacting that the king should have his year and a day and waste, and this remained the law till the Act 54 Geo. III., c. 145, which limited forfeiture to cases of treason and murder. But attainder, along with its effects of corruption of blood and forfeiture, was finally swept away by the Felony Act, 33 and 34 Vict., c. 23.

Attainder, BILL OF, was a legislative Act of the two Houses, introduced and passed exactly like any other Bill, and requiring the royal assent, which declared a person or persons attainted. Originally aimed against offenders who fled from justice, and analogous to the Bill of Pains and Penalties, it was soon perverted to secure a more certain and speedy destruction of political opponents than could be hoped from the impartiality or the routine of the law courts. No restriction was possible in such a mode of procedure. Evidence was usually heard, but not invariably; and even the presence of the accused was decided by the lawyers whom Thomas Cromwell consulted on the subject to be unnecessary, on the ground that there can be no authority superior to statute. The first recorded instance of its employment is in the violent banishment of the Despensers in 1321 by the Parliament of Westminster; an act which was held by Trussell, the justice who delivered judgment on the younger Hugh, to have involved attainder. With the deposition of Edward II. the appearance of the more regular method of impeachment attests a less savage spirit in political parties, till the outbreak of the Rose wars in 1459. In that year hostilities broke out on an attempt of the queen to have the Earl of Salisbury, the head of the Yorkist Nevilles, arrested. He completely defeated the force sent against him, and both sides rushed to arms. But the Lancastrians were better prepared; the Yorkist leaders had to fly the kingdom, and a Parliament met at Coventry which attainted them in a body. Two years later, after the decisive victory of Towton, the Yorkists retaliated by a similar proscription of all the prominent Lancastrians, Parliament, by the restriction of the franchise to 40s. freeholders (1430), and by the terrorism exercised through the system of Livery and Maintenance, having become a mere tool in the hands of the dominant faction. Yet a petition, so late as 1432, praying that trials touching freehold or inheritance should not be held in Parliament or council, shows that the Commons had still independence enough to display their sense of the danger. The new monarchy, which rose on the ruins of self-destroyed nobility, was strong enough to content itself as a rule with the ordinary methods of indictment and impeachment. But in 1539 the kinsmen of Reginald Pole, including his aged mother, the Countess of Salisbury, daughter of Edward IV., were cut off by Bill of Attainder, and the same fate overtook, in the following year, the disgraced minister Cromwell, condemned by a singular retribution without being heard in his own defence. Revenge in the one case, the preservation of the royal popularity in the other, demanded the employment of a procedure which could dispense with legal proof of guilt. The attainder of Strafford, however, in 1641 marks the triumph, not of a political faction, but of a constitutional theory. By the letter of the Statute of Treasons (1352), which condemned attempts on the king's life and honour only, the earl was innocent; but the Parliament maintained that the spirit of the statute saw in the king the majesty of the state, and so, by implication, condemned all attempts to overthrow the existing constitution. The last instance in English history is that of Sir John Fenwick attainted and executed in 1697 for participation in the Assassination Plot.

Attainder, THE GREAT ACT OF (IRELAND), was introduced into the Irish Parliament on Jan. 25, 1689, and the debate on it lasted some time. James II. gave his consent to it with great reluctance. It naturally had a very bad effect on the English Jacobites. Between 2,000 and 3,000 names, including half the Irish peerage, and even many prominent Jacobites, were included in the Bill. All those who were in rebellion against the king (James II.) were to surrender and take their trial before August 10, otherwise they were to be deemed guilty of high treason. All those who had left Ireland before Nov. 5, 1688, were to appear for the same purpose before Sept. 1, 1689. Those who had left Ireland before Nov. 5, 1688, and were then in England, Scotland, or the Isle of Man, were allowed till Oct. 1. In case of a valid excuse for not presenting themselves, the estates were to be placed temporarily in the hands of the king, but to be restored on the accused person's return. The king's pardon granted before Nov. 1 was to be valid, otherwise to be of no avail. Macaulay asserts that care was taken to keep the list of attainted persons secret, but the evidence adduced seems inconclusive. The same author calls it an "Act without parallel in the history of any civilised country." In excuse for the Irish we must look to the history of Ireland since 1641, and to the conduct of the English Parliament at the same time.

Atterbury, FRANCIS (b. 1662, d. 1732), Bishop of Rochester, was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, and distinguished himself with his pen as a defender of the reformed religion against the attacks of James II. After the Revolution he took the oath of allegiance to the new government. He took orders, and, after being preacher at the Rolls Chapel, became one of the royal chaplains (1702), but resided at Oxford. There he helped Boyle in his edition of the spurious Letters of Phalaris, and revised his Answer to Bentley. He now wrote several pamphlets in support of the powers of the Lower House of Convocation. In 1704, he became Doctor of Divinity and Dean of Carlisle. In 1710, however, he seized the opportunity of the Sacheverell prosecution, and framed the speech which that divine pronounced at the bar of the House of Lords. [SACHEVERELL.] He became Dean of Christ Church, and subsequently (1713) Bishop of Rochester, "because he was so bad a dean." He espoused the Jacobite cause, and on the death of Anne implored the ministry to proclaim James IV. Disliked by George I. because of his refusal to sign the bishops' declaration of fidelity, he began, in 1717, to correspond directly with the Pretender. On the failure of Atterbury's plot to restore the Stuarts (see below) he was imprisoned, and a Bill of Pains and Penalties being introduced, he was forced to leave England, professing his innocence.

For a time he resided at Paris, and was chief adviser of the Pretender. He became "the phantom minister of a phantom court," and engaged in the schemes for a Highland rebellion (1723). Atterbury was the type of the High Church clergy, most of whom were Jacobite at heart, and he "would have made an admirable bishop," says Lord Stanhope, "had he been a less good partisan." He was a clever, versatile, if somewhat fussy politician, always full of daring schemes and speculative adventures.

F. Williams, Memoirs and Correspondence of Atterbury, 2 vols., 1899; Lord Macaulay, Bio-graphy in Encycl. Britanica.

Atterbury's Plot (1721), a Jacobite conspiracy, was occasioned by the confusion in England owing to the failure of the South-Sea Scheme and the revival of Jacobite hopes on the birth of the Young Pretender. It was concocted by a council of five—Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester, the Earls of Arran and Orrery, Lords North and Gower—who constantly communicated with James the Old Pretender. They quarrelled a good deal amongst themselves, and offered their leadership to Lord Oxford, but he declined it. They intended to procure a force of 5,000 men from abroad, and, failing that, as much arms, money, and men as they could. They then proposed to seize the Bank, Exchequer, and other places where money was lodged, and to proclaim the Pretender during the absence of the king from England, when James was to embark for this country. Unfortunately for the success of their scheme, they applied for 5,000 men to the Regent of France, who promptly betrayed their design to the English envoy, Sir Luke Schaub. They were allowed to continue for some time longer, their communications being opened by the government; ultimately, the leaders were arrested and the conspiracy was frustrated.

Attorney-General, THE, is the chief law officer of England, who is appointed to represent the crown in all matters affecting its interests. The meaning of the term is thus explained in the early text-book, Les Termes de la Ley: "An attorney is one appointed by another man to do something in his stead, and is either general or special. Attorney-General is he that is appointed to all our affairs or suits, as the attorney-general of the king, attorney-general of the duke." In modern times the Prince of Wales is the only person besides the crown who appoints an "Attorney-General," who, however, is usually spoken of as "the Attorney-General for the Duchy of Lancaster or Cornwall" (as the case may be). The Attorney-General must be a party to all actions affecting the crown; and, as representative of the crown, he prosecutes for crimes, brings actions for revenue causes, and allows applications for patents. Until recently, the income of the office was mainly derived from patent fees. It is now fixed at £7,000 per annum, exclusive of fees for legal advice and services. The first record of the designation "Attornatus Regis" occurs in the 6th year of Edward I. The second named is William de Giselham (A.D. 1278), who two years afterwards is called "king's serjeant." In A.D. 1315–16, three Attornatus Regis are mentioned in the same year as king's serjeants. It was probably during the reign of Mary that the person who had been originally chosen to represent the king generally became a royal officer with that particular function. In 1614, a question was raised as to whether the Attorney-General (Sir Francis Bacon) could legally sit in the House of Commons, "because by his office he is an assistant of the House of Lords." Bacon was allowed to retain his seat, but in 1620, 1625, and 1640, on the bestowal of the office on members of the House, they vacated their seats. On the appointment of North in 1673, he retained his seat, and his successors have continued to sit without hindrance. [SOLICITOR-GENERAL.]

Attwood, THOMAS (b. 1784, d. 1856), was a banker, of Birmingham, and Gracechurch Street, London, and first attracted public attention by his vigorous opposition to the Orders in Council of 1812. He condemned the return to cash payments after the war, and wrote some pamphlets advocating paper money in 1815 and 1816. He was a vigorous advocate of parliamentary reform, and the chief founder in 1829 of the Birmingham Political Union. He was one of the first members for Birmingham after the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832.

Auchmuty, SIR SAMUEL (b. 1762, d. 1822), entered the army at the age of fourteen, and was despatched on active service to America under Sir W. Howe. He was present at most of the principal engagements in the earlier years of the war. In 1778 he returned to England, but almost immediately left for India, where he remained for nineteen years. He served in the campaigns on the Malabar coast, and in Mysore and against the Rohillas, and he also took part in the siege of Seringapatam under Lord Cornwallis. Returning in 1797, he was gazetted to a brevet-colonelcy, and in 1801 joined Baird's Indian force in Egypt, and became adjutant-general. After the surrender of Alexandria in 1802 he returned to England, and four years later was sent to command a division of the troops in the Rio de la Plata, which he found in a dangerous position. By his skill and energy he restored confidence to the army, and on the 3rd February, 1807, carried Monte Video by storm. Auchmuty, on his return, was appointed to the command in chief at Madras, and in 1811 gave valuable assistance in the reduction of Java. Two years later he returned to England, and was appointed to command the forces in Ireland, which post he held till his death at Dublin in August, 1822.

Auchy (EOCHA, ACHAICUS), King of Dalriada, was the son of Aodhfin, whom he succeeded, 796. He was on friendly terms with Charlemagne, to whom he rendered great assistance in the establishing of universities in France. He is said to have married Erfusia, a Pictish princess, and thus to have bequeathed to his grandson Kenneth a claim to the Pictish crown.

Auckland, WILLIAM EDEN, 1ST LORD (b. 1743, d. 1814), the third son of a Durham baronet, Sir Robert Eden, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, and was called to the bar in 1769. In 1771 he published "Principles of Penal Law," which brought him into notice, and he was appointed auditor and one of the directors of Greenwich Hospital, and in the following year an Under-Secretary of State. In 1774 the Duke of Marlborough gave him the family seat of Woodstock. Two years later he was appointed to the Board of Trade, and, again, after two years, one of the commissioners for making terms with the American colonies. His mission was unsuccessful, but it made him acquainted with Lord Carlisle, who, in 1780, appointed him his secretary in Ireland, where Eden remained until the Rockingham ministry came into power in 1782. He conducted an active opposition to that government, and on their fall was made a privy-councillor and Vice-Treasurer of Ireland—an office, however, which he soon resigned. In 1785 he went over to Versailles with plenary powers to negotiate a treaty of commerce with France, and was most successful. In 1788 he was appointed ambassador to Spain. On his return a year later, he was raised to an Irish peerage, and was almost immediately afterwards sent out to Holland as ambassador. He held this position until, in May, 1793, he was raised to the British peerage. In 1798 he was appointed by Pitt to be joint Postmaster-General, and only gave up the place when Pitt went out of office in 1801. He was a warm supporter of most of Pitt's measures, and especially of the union with Ireland, the scheme for which he had himself helped to prepare. Lord Auckland was the author of measures for bettering the condition of criminals, for erecting penitentiaries, and for substituting hard labour for transportation.

Auckland, GEORGE EDEN, 1ST EARL OF (b. 1784, d. 1849), the second son of the first Lord Auckland, entered Parliament as member for Woodstock, and in 1814 he succeeded to the peerage. In 1830 he was appointed President of the Board of Trade, and in 1834 was for a few months First Lord of the Admiralty. On the return of his friends to office, Lord Auckland was appointed Governor-General of India, and quitted England (1835) for the administration of affairs in that country. At a dinner given to him by the Court of Directors before his departure, he assured them that "he looked with exultation to the new prospects before him as affording him an opportunity of doing good to his fellow-man, of promoting education and knowledge, and of extending the blessings of good government and happiness to millions in India." But before he had been six months in Calcutta, he perceived a storm gathering in the North-West. The complications which arose brought on a great political crisis with which he was not competent to deal. He had little reliance on his own judgment, and acted for the most part under the influence of those who surrounded him. His administration is almost exclusively comprised in the fatal expedition to Afghanistan. [AFGHAN WARS.] In February, 1842, the arrival of Lord Ellenborough at Calcutta brought Lord Auckland's administration to a close. It comprised a single series of events—the conquest, the occupation, and the loss of Afghanistan. For administrative or material progress he had no leisure. Lord Auckland on his return was created an earl. On the accession of the Russell Cabinet, 1846, he was once more placed at the head of the Admiralty Board.

Audley, JAMES TOUCHET, 12TH LORD (d. 1459), served under Henry V. in the French wars. In the reign of Henry VI. he took part with the Lancastrians, and was in command of the army which intercepted Salisbury at Blore Heath, in which battle Audley was defeated and slain.

Audley, JAMES TOUCHET, 14TH LORD (d. 1497), a man of broken fortune, was famous in the reign of Henry VII. for his ill-advised leadership of the Cornish rebels, and for his adherence, generally, to the cause of Perkin Warbeck. In the conflict that took place at Blackheath between the rebels and the king's forces under the command of Lord Daubeny and the Earl of Oxford, Lord Audley was taken prisoner, and was soon afterwards beheaded.

Audley, THOMAS AUDLEY, LORD (b. 1488, d. 1544), was a lawyer, appointed in 1529, at the king's request, Speaker of the House of Commons. In 1530 he became Attorney for the Duchy of Lancaster, and, in November, 1531, he was made King's Serjeant. To enable him to second Henry's designs with a due amount of personal influence, he was, on May 20th, 1532, put in possession of the Great Seal, which he continued to hold till shortly before his death. Audley profited largely by ecclesiastical confiscations, "carving for himself in the feast of abbey lands," as Fuller remarks, "the first cut, and that a dainty morsel." The magnificent priory of the Holy Trinity in Aldgate, London, which was granted to Audley soon after his advancement to the chancellorship, was converted by him into a private mansion. But his chief spoil was the rich monastery of Walden, which he persuaded the king to grant him on his elevation to the peerage in November, 1538, as Baron Audley of Walden. He was named in the commission for the trial of Anne Boleyn and for the examination of Catherine Howard.

Augmentations, COURT OF. This court was instituted on the dissolution of the monasteries in Henry VIII.'s reign, and was established to secure to the crown the rich revenues belonging to suppressed religious houses. Its business was strictly limited to the consideration of questions connected with the confiscated Church property, and as this property was granted away with lavish liberality, the court speedily became a nullity and ceased to exist.

Augustine, St. (d. 604), first Archbishop of Canterbury, was prior of the monastery of St. Martin, in Rome, and was selected by Gregory the Great as the head of the band of monks who were to preach Christianity in England. After a difficult journey they landed in the Isle of Thanet, in 596, and obtained the protection of Ethelbert of Kent. Ethelbert's marriage with Bertha had familiarised him with the idea of Christianity, and he immediately gave permission to the missionaries to preach and convert his people. In the next year Ethelbert himself became a Christian, and in 600 Canterbury was made an archiepiscopal see, with Augustine as its archbishop, with authority to consecrate twelve bishops under his primacy. Kent seems to have become converted rapidly, and on Christmas Day, 597, no less than 10,000 persons are said to have been baptised. Before his death Augustine was able to see almost the whole of Kent and Essex Christian. Augustine's ministry was largely occupied by a contest with the British bishops. Their differences were nominally on questions of ritual, but the real question at issue was whether or not the Celtic bishops should acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope and the Italian Archbishop of Canterbury. Conferences with the Welsh bishops were held at Augustine's Oak (probably Aust, on the Severn), in 603, but to no purpose, and the breach between the two Churches was only widened. Augustine was a man of somewhat narrow, pedantic, and unconciliatory character—tendencies which the monastic training of his early and middle life probably did much to confirm; but his firmness, his integrity of life, and his singleness of purpose, are undoubted. The work he did might have been greater, if he had possessed a wider culture, a greater insight, and a more powerful influence over men's minds and hearts. Still, as far as it went, it was in the highest degree important. "He had," says Canon Bright, "rooted in Canterbury a definite centre for any future amount of Church extension."

Auldearn, THE BATTLE OF (May 9, 1645), was fought between the Covenanters and the Royalists under Montrose, during the latter's irregular campaign in the north-eastern Highlands. In May, 1645, he found himself near Auldearn in Nairn, in presence of the Covenanters, led by John Urry or Hurry. A mistake made by one of the latter's officers led Montrose to make an attack. The Highlanders' rush carried all before it, and Urry's force was broken and scattered.

Aulus Plautius was the commander of the Roman forces which Claudius despatched against Britain in the year 43. Among the distinguished officers who served under him were two future emperors, Vespasian and his son Titus. With their aid he defeated Caractacus, and reduced the north-eastern part of the island. In the year 60 he was recalled. Rumour makes him the founder of London.

Aumale, WILLIAM OF (d. 1179), was the son of Stephen, Count of Champagne, and therefore a kinsman of King Stephen. For his valour in the battle of the Standard, the earldom of York was given to him. He held out in Scarborough Castle against Henry II., but in 1156 was compelled to surrender.

Auray, THE BATTLE OF (1364), was fought between the English, who were espousing the claims of Montfort to the dukedom of Brittany, and the French, who supported his rival, Charles of Blois. The English, who were commanded by Sir John Chandos, were completely victorious. Du Guesclin, the French commander, was taken prisoner, and Charles of Blois was slain.

Austin, JOHN (b. 1790, d. 1859), was the first systematic English writer upon the formal science of positive law. At an early age he entered the army, in which, however, he remained only five years. In 1818 he was called to the bar by the Society of the Inner Temple; but, in spite of great industry and a consummate clearness and subtlety of intellect, he was debarred from professional success by physical weakness, and an over-fastidious and exacting temperament. In 1826 he was appointed Professor of Jurisprudence in the newly founded University of London (now University College), where his lectures were attended by numerous men of future eminence, including Lord Romilly, Grote, Sir G. Cornewall Lewis, and J. S. Mill. The text of many of the lectures has been recovered from notes taken by the last named. But in spite of this appreciation by the few, the majority of students could not afford to pay attention to a study which was not professionally lucrative, and in 1832 Austin resigned his chair. In 1833 Lord Brougham appointed him a member of the Criminal Law Commission. In 1834 the Inner Temple engaged him to deliver another course of lectures upon the principles and history of law. But, as before, it was soon apparent that there was no demand for a scientific legal education. In 1837 Mr. Austin was sent to Malta as a royal commissioner to inquire into native grievances, in which capacity he was highly successful. After a prolonged sojourn on the Continent, he returned to Weybridge, where he died in 1859. As a jurist, Austin owes his rank to the fact that he was the first to define the sphere of legal science, by distinguishing law from history and ethics—thus destroying a confusion which has produced many practical legislative evils. His writings are unfinished, and their form is often uncouth and tedious; but the doctrines which he first enunciated are now the common property of every thinker.

Austin's Works are The Province of Jurisprudence Determined, Lond., 1832, and Lectures on Jurisprudence, 5th edition, Lond., 1875. The latter work embodied the former, and was published by Mrs. Austin from the author's notes. The preface contains an interesting life of Austin. Harrison in Fortnightly Review, Oct. and Nov., 1878, and Jan., 1879; Prof. Pollock in Fortnightly Review, Jan., 1883; Prof. Holland, Jurisprudence, Oxford, 1882. [B. R. W.]

Australia. At what date Australia was first discovered, and whether by the Portuguese or Dutch, are questions which may possibly never be answered. Certain it is that, whatever may be the probability of a concealment, from supposed commercial interests, of an earlier knowledge of a southern continent, the discovery was not disclosed earlier than 1511, nor later than 1542. Between those years the Portuguese published the existence of a southern land, corresponding to Australia, which they termed Great Java; and subsequent Spanish explorers, among whom was Torres, the discoverer of Torres' Straits (1606), confirmed the correctness of the Portuguese maps. Upon the decline of Spanish maritime supremacy, the Dutch became the chief explorers of the southern seas, using their colony of Java as a starting-point. Through their efforts the Gulf of Carpentaria was surveyed and named, with many other places on the northern coasts, which retain their Dutch names up to the present day. Indeed, such was the extent of Dutch influence that the whole continent was called "New Holland"—a name which is even yet not quite supplanted by Matthew Flinders's more happy appellation of "Australia." The southern coast remained undiscovered until 1627, when a Dutch vessel, bound for Japan, being driven from her course, sailed along the shore of the Great Bight for upwards of one thousand miles. Tasman (1642) was the first systematic explorer of these shores; and to him is due the discovery of New Zealand, and of Tasmania, the latter of which was called by him Van Diemen's Land, after his betrothed. The first Englishman who touched Australian shores was Dampier, the buccaner (1688), whose account was so favourable that the English government placed him in command of a national expedition. After this expedition, by means of which the north-west coasts were first surveyed, there are few records of discoveries until the first voyage of Captain Cook (1770). This voyage marks the beginning of Anglo-Australian history. For, although no permanent settlement was made until 1788, Cook saw enough of the country to convince him that settlement was desirable; and moreover, by sailing along the eastern coast, he completed the outline of the continent. In his second (1773) and third voyages (1777), he visited New Zealand and Tasmania. The news of his discoveries, and of the further discoveries of Barr and Flinders, induced the English government to take possession of the country; and on Jan. 20, 1788, the first English fleet, under the command of Captain Arthur Phillip, anchored in Botany Bay, a locality which was soon abandoned for the more sheltered Cove of Sydney. Inland exploration was first checked by the chain of mountains which runs, under various names, along the greater part of the eastern coast at a distance from the sea of from fifty to a hundred miles. These were crossed in 1813, under the necessity for finding new pasture during a long drought. The great rivers were next explored, and attention was directed to the possibility of traversing the continent. After various attempts, this feat was successfully accomplished by Stuart in 1860, journeying from south to north, and in the following year by the ill-fated expedition of Burke and Wills. These expeditions proved that the interior of Australia was not a desert, and showed the feasibility of constructing the present telegraph line between Adelaide and Port

Darwin. All the Australian capitals are now connected by telegraph, and the railway system, which is under governmental control, has also been largely developed.

Included under the general designation of Australia, or Australasia, are the colonies of (1) New South Wales, (2) Victoria, (3) South Australia, (4) Western Australia, (5) Queensland, (6) Tasmania, (7) New Zealand. These colonies are not connected except geographically, though a conference was held (1883) in which it was resolved to form a federal council for certain purposes.

(1) NEW SOUTH WALES (cap. Sydney), during the earlier period of its history, was used as a penal settlement by the British Empire. Governor Phillip, however, speedily perceived the necessity for encouraging another kind of immigration, and through his efforts a settlement of freemen was established on the Hawkesbury River (1802). In 1808 Governor Bligh was deposed by a successful mutiny of the New South Wales Corps; but the vigorous measures of his successor, Governor Macquarie, restored order, and rapidly advanced prosperity. After the introduction of merino sheep by Mr. John Macarthur, and the discovery of the pasture-lands beyond the Blue Mountains, the progress of the colony was very rapid; and the arrival of a Chief Justice in 1824, with all the apparatus of a Court of Record, marks a more settled order and vigorous society. Free immigration, which his immediate predecessors had discouraged, was revived under Governor Brisbane (1821). In 1840 an Order in Council suspended transportation to New South Wales, although an attempt was made to revive the practice by Earl Grey in 1846. This, however, was met by the colonists with the threat of secession; and, after a violent dispute, the English government gave way (1852), and agreed to send no convicts to any Australian colony which should object to receive them. Western Australia was for a long time the only colony which gave consent, but since 1864 transportation has been discontinued. In 1842 municipalities were first established, and in 1843 the Legislative Council was made partially elective; but government by responsible ministers was not introduced until 1856. The most important political questions in New South Wales, as in all the Australian colonies, have been the questions of labour and land. In the earliest days of the colony, the demand for labour was met by hiring out convicts to the free settlers; but from 1821 onwards, the system of free immigration was largely extended. Not only was every immigrant entitled to a free passage and a grant of land, but the shipper also received a bounty for every person whom he landed in the colony. In consequence of this practice, the country was crowded with paupers and incapables, who had often disposed of their land-grants to speculators before they had landed. After the establishment of responsible government, the bounty system was abolished, and state-aided immigration has been jealously watched. The questions connected with the settlement of the land are still causing grave political difficulties in New South Wales, as in other Australian colonies. The community is divided into two classes—the “squatters” (or leasees of large pasture-runs), and the small farmers. The former class desires that every facility should be given to the acquisition of large landed estates, while the other side maintains that the alienation of the national land is a policy of suicide. The disposition of land was vested originally with the Governor; but in 1831 it was ordered that every alienation of crown-land should be by sale at a public auction, and that a minimum price should be fixed of five shillings an acre. In 1846 the influence of the squatters culminated, and a measure was passed, known as the Squatters Act, to secure fixity of tenure to government leasees, with an option of purchase. Since the introduction of representative government, the tendency of legislation has been in the opposite direction. At present any bonâ-fide settler can “select” not more than 640 acres out of any unoccupied land or leasehold pasture “run,” and can become the absolute owner of his selection by residence and small yearly payments. Great attention is paid in New South Wales and throughout Australia to education. Elementary schools and universities are supported by the state, and a movement is on foot for establishing government technical and secondary schools. The legislative power in New South Wales is vested in the Governor, as representing the crown, and a Parliament of two Houses, under Stat. 18 and 19 Vict., c. 54. The Upper House, or Legislative Council, consists of not less than twenty-one members, who are nominated by the crown; while the Legislative Assembly or Lower House consists of 102 elected members. There is no property qualification for voters, and the votes are taken by ballot. The population of New South Wales on April 3, 1881, was 503,981, of whom 220,427 resided in or about Sydney. The colony originally embraced all the territory from Cape York to the South Cape. But its area has been greatly reduced by the creation of the separate colonies of South Australia (1836), Victoria (1851), Queensland (1859).

(2) VICTORIA (cap. Melbourne, pop. 858,562) is the most populous of the Australian colonies. It rose into importance after the discovery of gold in 1848, and in 1854 received a constitution (18 and 19 Vict., c. 55). This measure was drawn up on similar lines to the Act conferring a constitution upon New South Wales, the main difference being that the Upper House was elected by voters with a high property qualification. In this respect the constitution was altered in 1881. The colony is now divided into fourteen provinces, each of which returns three members to the Legislative Council. The members are returned for a period of six years, and one-third of their number retire triennially. The voting qualification has been reduced to a freehold of the value of £10, or a leasehold of £25 per annum. All the land of the colony has been disposed of, greatly to the benefit of those who are descended from the earliest settlers. The accumulation of land in the hands of single proprietors has been such that an attempt has been made to break up the large estates by the imposition of a progressive land-tax. The commercial policy of Victoria has been strongly Protectionist.

(3) SOUTH AUSTRALIA (founded, 1836, cap. Adelaide, pop. 279,866), originally part of New South Wales, obtained responsible government in 1856. The Parliament consists of two elected Houses. The Legislative Council is composed of eighteen members, six of whom retire every four years, their successors being then elected for twelve years. The Council is elected by the whole colony voting as one district. A property qualification is required for membership. The House of Assembly consists of forty-six members, elected for three years by manhood suffrage. The executive is vested in the Governor and an Executive Council, consisting of the cabinet and specially-appointed ministers. The South Australian territory now extends over the whole of Central Australia, and a great part of the north-western coast.

(4) WESTERN AUSTRALIA, first called the Swan River Settlement, was founded in 1829, mainly under government auspices. To induce settlement, enormous grants of land were made to men of influence and capital, who in return were to import labourers. The result was disastrous. Labourers, who are the settlers most needed in a new country, regarded the colony as closed to them, while those who were brought out preferred to work upon their own account. In 1850 the colony received a fillip of prosperity, by accepting the convicts which the rest of Australia had excluded. The colony has not yet received representative government. There are two governing bodies—the Legislative Council, partly elected and partly appointed by the crown, by whom the local Acts are passed, and the Executive Council of five official members, by whom they are administered.

(5) QUEENSLAND (cap. Brisbane, pop. 213,525) was separated from New South Wales in 1859. Its constitution does not essentially differ from that of the mother-colony. The climate is tropical, and sugar is a staple product. The demand for labour has been met by the importation of South-Sea Islanders (Kanakas); the traffic in whom has caused grave scandals, which have been the subject of investigation. Queensland has of late years developed an extensive trade in wool. In 1883 this colony took the initiative in pressing upon the imperial government the creation of an English protectorate over the southern part of New Guinea.

(6) TASMANIA, or VAN DIEMEN'S LAND (cap. Hobart Town, pop. 115,705), has a constitution similar to that of South Australia (Act 18 Vict., c. 17, and Act 34 Vict., cap. 42). The aborigines of Tasmania have recently become extinct.

(7) NEW ZEALAND (cap. Auckland, pop. 534,008), a group of islands 600 miles to the eastward of Australia, was established as a self-governing colony in 1852 (15 and 16 Vict., c. 72). The country was divided into six provinces (afterwards increased to nine), each of which was governed by an elective Superintendent and Provincial Council. The provincial system was abolished in 1875, and the legislative power vested in the Governor, appointed by the crown, and a General Assembly of two Chambers, one nominated by the crown (Legislative Council), the other elective (House of Representatives). Members of both Houses receive £210 each session to cover expenses. The colony has been disturbed by native wars [MAORI WARS], the most serious of which occurred in 1864—5.

Australian Colonies Act, THE, was passed by Lord John Russell's government in 1850, for the better administration of the Australian colonies. It created Victoria a distinct province from New South Wales, and conferred on the four colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, Van Diemen's Land, and South Australia the power of choosing their own constitution, "by means of popular assemblies, composed of all the inhabitants who were £10 householders or £100 freeholders."

Austria, RELATIONS WITH. Before the sixteenth century, Austria was merely an imperial duchy, too remote and insignificant to have important dealings with England. Under the Bamberg line, the captivity of Richard I. in consequence of his quarrel with Leopold V. is the only important exception. Rudolf of Hapsburg, who in 1278 granted Austria to his son Albert, was a good friend of Edward I., but friendship for actual Bavarian and Luxemburg emperors made England necessarily cool to Austrian aspirants to that dignity. With Frederick III. (1439—1493) and Maximilian I. (1493—1519), the empire became practically hereditary in the Austrian house. The traditional friendship between England and the empire [EMPIRE, RELATIONS WITH] now necessarily involved closer relations with Austria. Maximilian I. acquired, with the Burgundian Netherlands, the advantages of the old commercial and political connection between England and Flanders. Charles V. united Spain, England's third mediæval ally, with the imperial crown. But it was rather with the Austrian house than Austria, with Spain rather than the distant "Erblander," that England now becomes closely involved. On Charles's abdication, the Austro-Spanish House split up into two lines, but the solidarity between them was such that the intimate relations of alternate friendship and hostility between England and Spain practically determined her relations with Austria until the death of the last Austrian King of Spain in 1700. [SPAIN, RELATIONS WITH.] Up to that date it is only necessary to note any peculiarity of relation between England and Austria. For instance, when the Catholic Reaction ended for a time the Anglo-Spanish alliance, the superior moderation of the imperial branch produced friendly relations between Elizabeth and the liberal and tolerant Maximilian II. (1564—1578). Again, in the Thirty Years' War, close relations with Ferdinand II. (1619—1637) resulted from James I.'s persistent efforts to obtain the restoration of the Pfalzgraf Frederick, his son-in-law, to his hereditary dominions. For some years he hoped to get this by Spanish mediation. But when he and his son Charles found they were being played with, they turned to that alliance with France which lasted with partial breaks till 1688, and much longer than the political balance demanded. Fear of Louis XIV. led even Charles II. to the TRIPLE ALLIANCE, which saved Austria Franche Comté; and again, in 1677, he approximated to the imperial side. With William III. the whole influence of England was thrown against France, and in the wars of the League of Augsburg (1688—1697) and of the SPANISH SUCCESSION (1702—1713) England fought in close alliance with Austria. The substitution of a Bourbon for a Hapsburg monarch in Spain led to a closer union of interests between England and Austria than before. Yet there was a constant strain in their relations in the early half of the eighteenth century that led to absolute hostility in the second half. In the TREATY OF UTRECHT (1713), the Tories abandoned their Austrian ally. The accession of George I., the head of the house whose long attachment to the empire had been rewarded with a ninth electorate, made relations easier. But the commercial restrictions imposed on Flanders in the interests of the maritime powers, and the BARRIER TREATY, negotiated through English mediation, that handed over that country to Austria, with its fortresses garrisoned by Dutch Protestants, were warmly resented by Charles VI., who had not forgotten the failure of his Spanish hopes. Very unwillingly he made a defensive alliance in 1716, and when Alberoni's intrigues against the Utrecht settlement produced the Triple Alliance of 1717, it was only immediate fear of losing Italy that prevailed on him to make it a Quadruple Alliance, by joining with France and the maritime powers to uphold the treaty. In 1722 his Ostend India Company was established in direct contravention of the treaty, and in 1726 Ripperda negotiated the first Treaty of Vienna, that re-united Austria with Spain against England, even more than France. Charles secured a further triumph when Prussia deserted England [TREATY OF HANOVER, 1726] for his alliance, and open war between England and Spain ensued. But in 1727 peace was patched up [PARIS, PEACE OF], and in 1731 the second Treaty of Vienna restored peace with England, and Charles renounced his commercial schemes for a guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction. His subsequent misfortunes in the Polish and Turkish wars did not prevent England from loyally supporting Maria Theresa in the War of the AUSTRIAN SUCCESSION (1741—1748). But English help was given in an overbearing and insolent spirit that destroyed all feelings of gratitude. Robinson, the English ambassador at Vienna, made himself most obnoxious, and England compelled the empress, much against her will, to surrender part of the Milanese to Sardinia (Treaty of Worms, 1743), and Silesia to Frederick II. of Prussia, and the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) confirmed these cessions, and created a patrimony for Don Philip at the expense of Austria. This treaty, coming after thirty years of friction, produced a definite rupture. Count Wenzel Kaunitz became Maria's adviser, and negotiated that alliance between France and Austria that continued with partial breaks till the Revolution. Hence, in the SEVEN YEARS' WAR (1756—1763), Austria did its best to ruin Prussia, England's constant ally. But George III., intent on the restoration of personal government, paid but slight attention to foreign politics. Meanwhile Austria approximated to the Eastern powers, and in 1772 shared in the partition of Poland. Joseph II. became completely fascinated by Catherine II.'s schemes of Eastern empire, and his sister's marriage keeping up his friendship with France, he availed himself of England's difficulties with America to repudiate the Barrier Treaty (1781), and an attempt to reopen the Scheldt. At last the younger Pitt's vigour restored to England its true position in Europe by forming an alliance against the Eastern powers, which in 1790 compelled Leopold II. (Joseph was just dead) to accept the Convention of Reichenbach, and withdraw from the Turkish War. The French Revolution completed the rapprochement of England and Austria. A close alliance was cemented by heavy subsidies, and in 1793 England joined the war against France. The alliance continued till 1815, only broken when Napoleon forced a peace on Austria, and was renewed again at the earliest opportunity. The TREATY OF VIENNA was successfully negotiated (1815); if England did not accede to the HOLY ALLIANCE, it did not purge itself of association with its authors until the great ministry of Canning. Since 1827 the two countries have pursued very different directions. While Austria, under the guidance of Metternich, was the representative of reaction and absolutism in Europe, the two powers could hardly be on other terms than those of distant courtesy. In 1848—9, when Italy and Hungary tried to realise their independence, English sympathy was largely enlisted on the side of the wronged nationalities; but the sympathy took no active shape, and Austria was allowed to subdue the Hungarians by the aid of Russian armies. The close alliance with Russia was, however, severed by the Crimean War, in which Austria took no part. The overthrow of Austria by Prussia in 1866—her consequent exclusion from German affairs, and the liberal institutions which she found herself compelled to inaugurate—seemed to have removed nearly all possible grounds of difference. Since 1867 the political intercourse between English statesmen and those of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, has been almost confined to such questions as have arisen out of the condition of the Balkan peninsula.

Coxe's House of Austria, largely drawn from despatches, is the best general authority. Banks, English History in the Seventeenth Century, is excellent on all foreign relations; Arneth's Prins Eugen and Maria Theresa are indispensable for the eighteenth century. [T. F. T.]

Austrian Succession, THE WAR OF THE (1741—1748), was caused by the death of Charles VI., Emperor of Germany, without male issue. There was thus thrown open the question of the succession to the empire, and to the Austrian dominions. The latter had previously been secured to Maria Theresa by the Pragmatic Sanction. The chief claimant to both was the Elector of Bavaria; the next important candidate was Philip V. of Spain. As both these princes were allies of France, it was necessary for England to oppose their designs. Walpole, therefore, had tried to found a grand alliance between Hanover, Prussia, and the maritime powers with Austria; Frederick, however, would recognise the Pragmatic Sanction only if his claims to Silesia were acknowledged. This was refused by Austria, and immediately the French and Prussian armies crossed to the frontier (1741) Hanover was obliged to declare neutrality for a year. In 1742 England and Holland joined Austria, and an army of 30,000 was sent into the Low Countries. In the Mediterranean Commodore Matthews, with the fleet, forced the King of Naples to neutrality, and allowed Sardinia to side with Austria. Frederick acquired Silesia by the treaties of Breslau and Berlin, and withdrew from the contest. The chief event of 1743 was the battle of DERTINGEN, which, though nearly resulting in a disastrous defeat for the English, forced the French to retire into Alsace. Negotiations for peace were begun, George II. being willing to recognise Charles of Bavaria as emperor if he would renounce his claims on Austria. They were, however, broken off, and the Treaty of Worms, including England, Holland, Austria, Saxony, and Sardinia (Sept., 1743), was met in October by the League of Frankfort, the important members of which were France and Prussia. Thus both England and France were now the respective heads of two great leagues, and the question at issue was really that of the naval supremacy of one or the other power, rather than the Austrian succession, the ostensible cause of the war. In 1744, after an attempted invasion of England in favour of the Pretender had been thwarted by the elements, a formal declaration of war was made. The general war, in which the English troops were not concerned, need not be discussed here. Frederick of Prussia was not well supported by the French; and in 1745, on the death of Charles of Bavaria, Francis, the son of Maria Theresa, was elected emperor. It was then possible to have made some general negotiation. The opportunity passed. Large subsidies were voted to German troops, and 18,000 Hanoverians were taken into English pay. In Dec., 1745, Frederick made a separate peace with Austria, known as that of Dresden. Meanwhile the allies, under the Duke of Cumberland and the Prince of Waldeck, were disastrously beaten by the French at FONTENAY (May, 1745), and had to retire to Brussels and Antwerp. They had been much weakened by the necessity of withdrawing troops to defend England against the invasion of the Young Pretender. [STUART, CHARLES EDWARD.] In 1746 Marshal Saxe became master of the Austrian Netherlands. Deserted, however, by the Prussians and Bavarians, the French began to make offers for peace. In 1747 the Duke of Cumberland and the Prince of Orange were defeated with great loss at LAWFELDT. Bergen-op-Zoom fell, and Maestricht was besieged. These disasters were counterbalanced by the Austrian successes in Italy, and by the capture of Cape Breton Island in America. At length the struggle was brought to a close by the PEACE OF AIX-LA-CHAPELLE (Oct., 1748). The results of the war, as a whole, were not unfavourable to England. She had done much to secure her maritime supremacy, while her rival, France, had displayed a growing weakness and incapacity.

Authorities on English History.

In the present article the leading authorities are briefly considered under the following nine periods:—(1) Before the English conquest; (2) from the English to the Norman conquest; (3) from the Norman conquest to the close of the 12th century; (4) the 13th century; (5) the 14th and 15th centuries; (6) the 16th century; (7) the 17th century; (8) the 18th century till 1789; (9) from 1789 to the present time.

1. Period before the English Conquest.—CONTEMPORARY WRITERS: Cæsar, de Bello Gallico (bks. iv. and v.); the Agricola of Tacitus and passages in the Germania of the same writer are the principal sources. To these must be added numerous scattered passages in various classical writers, enumerated in Sir T. Hardy's Descriptive Catalogue of Materials relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland (vol. i.), and printed in the Monumenta Historica Britannica (fol. 1848). The Itinerarium of Antoninus supplies an enumeration of the chief towns and roads in Roman Britain; the Notitia Dignitatum an outline of the organisation of the country.

LATER WRITERS: A few notices of the condition of the native population before the middle of the 6th century, may be gathered from Gildas, de Excidio Britanniae. The Ecclesiastical History of Bede, commencing at the same time, but coming down to A.D. 731, is then the chief authority. The Historia Britonum of Nennius preserves some important fragments of earlier writers, and affords illustrations of the early Welsh traditions, but is otherwise of little value. The work bearing the same title, by Geoffrey of Monmouth, although worthless from an historical point of view, is valuable as a source of numerous legends.

MODERN WRITERS: Britannia Romana, of J. Horaley (1732); Dr. Guest, Origines Celticae, 1833; H. C. Coote, The Romans of Britain (1878); J. C. Bruce, The Roman Wall (1851); T. Wright, The Celt, the Roman, and the Saxon; C. Elton, Origins of English History (1832); Rhys, Celtic Britain; W. F. Skene, Celtic Scotland (1880).

2. From the English to the Norman Conquest.—CONTEMPORARY WRITERS: Bede and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicles (R. S.*); the Peterborough version of the latter carries us to the end of the reign of Stephen; Asser, Life of King Alfred (probably in part a genuine contemporary narrative); the Chronicle of Ethelward (little more than a compilation from Bede and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicles); the Encomium Emmae (Life of Queen Emma), and Life of Edward the Confessor (R. S.), have both a certain though secondary value. Other Lives are those of St. Cuthbert, by Bede; St. Columba, by Adamnan; and that of Wilfrid, Bishop of York, by Eddius; and the later ones of Aldhelm, by Fabricius, a foreigner, used by William of Malmesbury in his account of Aldhelm in the Gesta Pontificum; an anonymous Life of Alcuin, the foremost English scholar of his age, whose Letters are also of considerable value; and the Life of St. Dunstan, by Adelard. The Chronicles and Histories up to 1066 are printed in the Monumenta Historica Britannica.

LATER WRITERS: Among these are the Chronicle of Marianus Scotus; the Historia Regum and Historia Ecclesiae Dunelmensis (R. S.) of Simeon of Durham; the Historia Anglorum (R. S.) of Henry of Huntingdon; and the Chronicles of Ralph of Diceto (R. S.) and Peter Langtoft (R. S.). These all, however, yield in value to William of Malmesbury, whose Gesta Regum Anglorum, Historia Novella, and De Gestis Pontificum (R. S.)—a history of English bishops and monasteries from the time of Augustine—are the best sources for the period. The Chronicon of Florence of Worcester is also of considerable importance. The principal biographies are the Lives of Edward the Confessor, by Ethelred of Rievaulx, and of St. Dunstan, by Osbern and Eadmer.

MODERN WRITERS: J. M. Kemble, Saxons in England, 1849; E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, which to a great extent, but not altogether, supersedes The History of England and Normandy by Sir Francis Palgrave; also Palgrave, English Commonwealth; J. M. Lappenberg, History of England under the Anglo-Saxon Kings; Dr. W. Stubbs, Select Charters and Constitutional History; Schmidt, Gesetze der Angelsachsen; B. Thorpe, Ancient Laws and Institutes of England; Wm. Bright, Early English Church History; the Lives relating to English history contained in the Dictionary of Christian Biography; J. R. Green, The Making of England, and The Conquest of England.

3. Norman Conquest to the Close of the Twelfth Century.—FOR NORMAN HISTORY: the Historia Normannorum of William of Jumièges; the Gesta Willelmi of William of Poitiers; the Bayeux Tapestry, engraved by the Antiquarian Society, and with elucidations by Rev. G. C. Bruce. See also Freeman, Norman Conquest, vol. iii., Append. A.

CONTEMPORARY WRITERS: Peterborough edition of Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (ends 1154); Eadmer, Historia Novorum, and Vita Anselmi; Gaimar, Histoire des Angles; Ordeicus

* The letters R. S. appended to a title in this article denote that the work is included in the series Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain and Ireland, published by the authority of the Master of the Rolls. The letters O. S. denote that it is one of the publications of the Camden Society.

Vitalis, Historia Ecclesiastica; Malmesbury's Historia Novella (above-mentioned) should be compared with the Gesta Stephani; Chronicles by Richard and John, both priors of the monastery at Hexham (in Twysden, Decem Scriptores). For reign of Henry II.: William of Newburgh, Historia Rerum Anglicarum; the Gesta Regis Henrici (R. S.), wrongly ascribed to Benedict of Peterborough; the Chronica of Roger Hoveden (R. S.), a work of high importance; the Imagines Historiarum (R. S.) of Ralph of Diceto. For the reign of Richard I.: The Chronicle of Richard of Devizes (R. S.); the Chronicle of Gervase, a monk of Canterbury (R. S.); and Gesta Regum (R. S.), by the same author, with continuation by unknown writers (of considerable value); Chronicles and Memorials of Reign of Richard I., with prefaces by Dr. Stubbs (R. S.). For reigns of John and Henry II.: The Topographia Hibernie and Expugnatio Hibernie of Giraldus Cambrensis (R. S.); and for court and ecclesiastical life of the period, the Gemma Ecclesie and Speculum Ecclesie of the same writer (R. S.), the poem of Walter Map, de Nugis Curialium, and the de Nugis Curialium of John of Salisbury. In biography, the Lives of Lanfranc, by Milo Crispin; of Anselm, by Eadmer; together with those of Becket, in volumes edited by Canon Robertson for Rolls Series; and the Magna Vita of Hugh of Lincoln (R. S.). Domesday Book, fac-simile edition by Sir Henry James, by photozincographic process, together with account of the whole in Freeman, Norman Conquest, vol. v., Append. A.

MODERN WRITERS: Works by Freeman and Stubbs, named in preceding section; also Freeman, History of William Rufus and Historical Essays (1st series); Guizot, Essais et Histoires de Civilisation en France; W. F. Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury; R. W. Church, Life of Anselm; M. Rule, St. Anselm; Perry, Life of St. Hugh of Lincoln; Lord Lyttelton, History of Henry II.; Dugdale, Monasticon Anglicanum (1655-73).

4. Thirteenth Century and Reign of Edward II.—CONTEMPORARY WRITERS: The Historia Major of Matthew Paris (R. S.), abridged in his Historia Minor (ib.), specially important, and exhibiting a great advance in historical composition; Chronicon of William Rishanger (R. S.), and Annales of Nicholas Trivet; Memoriale of Walter of Coventry (R. S.), useful for the reign of John; the Annals of the monasteries of Burton-upon-Trent, Winchester, Waverley, Dunstable, Osney, and Worcester, all contained in the Annales Monastici (R. S.), edited by Luard. For reign of Edward II.: The Annales of John of Trokelowe, a monk of Tynemouth (R. S.), and Life of Edward, by an unknown writer (probably a monk of Malmesbury), in Hearne; also another Life, by Thomas de la Moor;

Chronicon of Adam of Murimuth; Chronicon of Walter of Hemingford (superior in conception and accuracy to the average historical literature of the period), comprising the reigns of the first three Edwards; Chronicon Petrobургense (C. S.), as a specimen of local history. For civic history of London: The Munimenta Gildhallæ Londoniensis (R. S.), edited by Riley, specially valuable for the light they throw on the political and commercial condition of the country during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; the Domesday of St. Paul's (C. S.); also Chroniques de London (C. S.); Chronicle of London from 1089 to 1483, edited by Nicolas; Collections of a London Citizen, edited by J. Gairdner (C. S.); the Annales Londonienses and Annales Paulini, edited by Dr. Stubbs (R. S.); Royal and Historical Letters illustrative of Reign of Henry III., edited by W. W. Shirley (R. S.); Letters of Bishop Grosseteste, edited by Luard (R. S.); Political Songs of England, from Reign of John to that of Edward II., edited by Thomas Wright (C. S.).

LATER WRITERS: Among these Walsingham is the chief, and his Historia Anglicana (R. S.) is for this period little more than a compilation from the earlier writers above-named.

MODERN WRITERS: Freeman, Guizot, Hook's Lives, as specified in preceding section; Dr. Pauli, Geschichte von England (in Gesch. d. Europäischen Staaten, by Heeren and Ukert); W. Longman, Lectures on the History of England; the Prefaces by the different editors of Walter of Coventry, Matthew Paris, the Monumenta Franciscana, Roger Bacon, in Rolls Series, as above specified. Hallam, Middle Ages; W. H. Blaauw, Barons' War; Lives of Simon de Montfort by Pauli and G. W. Prothero; J. E. T. Rogers, History of Agriculture and Prices in England (commences A.D. 1259); Mullinger, History of the University of Cambridge, vol. i. For relations of England to the Papacy: Milman, Latin Christianity; and the fifth volume of Greenwood's Cathedra Petri.

5. Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries.—CONTEMPORARY WRITERS: Adam of Murimuth, with continuation by unknown writer, coming down to 1380. For reign of Edward III.: Robert of Avesbury, de Mirabilibus Gestis Edwardi III., edited by Hearne; Higden's Polychronicon, with version by John of Trevisa (R. S.); Knighton, History of England (from Edgar to death of Richard II.); Chronicle of England, by a monk of St. Albans (R. S.); Walsingham (see preceding section), now of primary importance; French Chronicle, relating to death of Richard II. (Eng. Hist. Soc.); and History of the same monarch, also in French (Archæol. Britann., vol. xx.); Adam of Usk, with translation by E. M. Thompson; Capgrave, Chronicle of England and Book of the noble Henries (both R. S.); Otterbourne, Chronicon Regum Angliæ, edited by Hearne; Lives of Henry V. as follows: (1) by Thomas Elmham, in Hearne; (2) by Titus Livius (ib.); (3) "The Chaplain's Account" (Eng. Hist. Soc.); Puisieux, Le Siège de Rouen; Annals of the monastery of St. Albans, by John Amundesham and John Whethamstede (both R. S.); Chronicles of the reign of Henry VI., edited by Gairdner (C. S.); Bekynton's Correspondence, belonging to same reign (R. S.); Harding's Chronicle, continued by Grafton; Jehan de Wavrin's Collection of Chronicles (R. S.); William of Worcester, Annals and Collections, edited by Stevenson (R. S.); Chronicle of Jehan le Bel, edited by Polain; the Chronicles of Froissart and Monstrelet, important, but not altogether trustworthy; Blondel, de Reductione Normanniae (R. S.); Historie of Arrivale of Edward IV. in England (C. S.); the Paston Letters, edited by J. Gairdner, are important as illustrating the manners and habits of thought in the fifteenth century; Continuation of the Croyland Chronicle (in Gale's Scriptores); Warkworth's Chronicle (C. S.) comprises first thirteen years of King Edward's reign; the London Chronicle (C. S.); Sir Thomas More's account of Edward V. and Richard III., virtually a contemporary narrative; Letters and Papers illustrative of the Reigns of Richard III. and Henry VII., edited by Gairdner (R. S.); Bernard (André), Life of Henry VII., edited by Gairdner (R. S.); Materials for a History of the Reign of Henry VII., edited by Campbell (R. S.); Life of Henry VII., by Lord Bacon, in fifth volume of his Works, edited by Ellis and Spedding; the Venetian Relation (C. S.), a view of England as it appeared to an intelligent foreigner, temp. Henry VII.; Fabyan's Chronicle; Wyclif's Works, to be studied in edition by Thomas Arnold, and volume (with preface), edited by F. D. Matthew for the Early English Text Society; Political Poems and Songs, from accession of Edward III. to reign of Henry VIII., edited by Thomas Wright (R. S.).

LATER WRITERS: Polydore Vergil's Historia Anglica, a record that often assumes the value of strictly contemporary evidence; Hall's Union of the Families of Lancaster and York, the main source of Shakespeare's historical dramas.

MODERN WRITERS: Among those already named are Hallam, Middle Ages (two concluding chapters); Freeman, Essays (first series); Hook, Lives of the Archbishops; Rogers, History of Prices; Life and Times of Edward III., by Longman; M. Wallon, Richard II.; Lord Brougham, History of England under the House of Lancaster; Life and Reign of Richard III., by Gardiner. For academic life and history of learning: Huber, English Universities (transl. by Newman); Mackenzie Walcott, William of Wykeham and his Colleges; Anstey, Preface to Munimenta Academica (R. S.). Sir J. H. Ramsay, articles on Richard II. and Henry IV. in Antiquary for 1882. For Wyclif and his opponents: Shirley, Preface to "Fasciculi Zizaniorum (R. S.)"; article on The Lollards, in Gairdner and Spedding's Studies in English History.

6. Sixteenth Century.—CONTEMPORARY WRITERS: Among those named in preceding section are Polydore Vergil (now especially important); Hall; the London Chronicle. For the question of the royal divorce, the materials collected in Records of the Reformation (A.D. 1527—1533), edited by Rev. N. Pocock; Harpsfield, Treatise of the Pretended Divorce (C. S.); the Catholic representation of the facts is to be found in Nicholas Sanders's Historia Schismatis Anglicani (1585), of which an enlarged edition, with continuation, was published by Rishton (transl., with notes, by Lewis, 1877): only a small proportion of the work is entitled to rank as contemporary. Wriothesley's Chronicle; More, Utopia, and Starkey, England in the Reign of Henry VIII.; the collection known as Holinshed's Chronicles, of which Harrison's Description of England has been reprinted in series published by the New Shakspere Society. John Stowe, Summary of the Chronicles of England, Annales, and Survey of London and Westminster; Foxe, History of the Acts and Monuments of the Church (ed. Cattley); Chronicle of the Grey Friars of London (C. S.); Letters on the Suppression of the Monasteries, edited by Wright (C. S.); Narratives of the Reformation (C. S.); Literary Remains of Edward VI. (Roxburgh Club); Machyn's Diary (C. S.); Chronicle of Queen Jane, etc., edited by Nichols (C. S.); Lives of More, by his son-in-law, Roper, and of Wolsey, by his gentleman-usher, Cavendish; Life of Sir Peter Carew, by Hooker; Life of Queen Elizabeth, by Camden; Sir John Harington's Briefe View contains a series of sketches of the principal bishops of Elizabeth's reign. For original documents, the Calendars of Letters and Papers, Foreign and Domestic, of the Reign of Henry VIII., edited, with important prefaces, by J. S. Brewer; also the "Domestic" series for reigns of Edward VI., Mary and Elizabeth, edited by Robert Lemon and Mrs. Everett Green; the "Foreign" series for same reigns, by Turnbull, Joseph Stevenson, and Crosby (all in the series published by the Record Commissioners). The Zürich Letters (edited by Hastings Robinson) contain the correspondence between the English and the Continental Reformers; see also Brief Discourse of the Troubles begun at Frankfurt (in "The Phoenix," vol. ii.); and the Journals of the Houses of Parliament. The Hardwicke Papers are an important miscellaneous collection known under this designation, although the name of the editor, the Earl of Hardwicke, does not appear on the title-page; Sir Dudley Digges, The Compleat Ambassador; the Cabala—a collection of letters by eminent diplomatists, &c.; the Somers Tracts. For ecclesiastical affairs in Scotland, the Works of Peterkin, Calderwood, and Archbishop Spottiswoode; also the Works of John Knox, edited by Laing. For proceedings of Parliament, the collections by Sir Simonds d'Ewes and Heywood Townsend; the Burleigh Papers. For Continental relations, the Correspondence of Granville; the Relations politiques des Pays-Bas et de l'Angleterre, edited by Baron Kervyn de Lettenhove; the Calendars (R.S.) relating to Venice, edited by Rawdon Brown; and those by Bergenroth and Gayangos relating to Spain; for relations of Scotland and France, the French Despatches, edited by M. Toulet. For questions connected with the career and character of Mary Queen of Scots, her Letters, edited by Prince Lobanof-Rostovsky; the materials (some of them of doubtful genuineness) in Anderson's Collections; the Letter-Books of Sir Amias Paulet; the Sydney Papers. Stubbes' Anatomie of Abuses, and Stafford's Examination of Complaints (1580), published by the New Shakspeare Society.

LATEX WRITERS: Fuller, Church History; Burnet, History of the Reformation of the Church of England (ed. by Pocock), with Harmer's Specimen; Collier, Ecclesiastical History (edited by Lathbury); Legrand, Histoire du Divorce; Strype, Ecclesiastical Memorials, Annals of the Reformation, and Lives of Cranmer, Parker, Sir John Cheke, Sir Thomas Smith, Aylmer, Grindal, and Whitgift; Neal, History of the Puritans; C. Dodd, Church History of England (1742), the work of a moderate Catholic; Life of Henry VIII., by Lord Herbert of Cherbury; Sir John Hayward's Life of Edward VI., and Annals of the first Four Years of Reign of Elizabeth; Fiddes, Life of Wolsey; Fuller, The Worthies of England; Lloyd, State Worthies; A. Wood, Athena Oxonienses (1691); J. Nichols, Progresses of Queen Elizabeth (1788).

MODERN WRITERS: J. A. Froude, History of England; L. von Ranke, History of the Popes, and History of England, chiefly in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries; J. Lingard, History of England; J. H. Blunt, Reformation of the Church of England; R. W. Dixon, History of the Church of England; J. O. W. Haweis, Sketches of the Reformation; S. R. Maitland, Essays on the Reformation; J. B. Marsden, Early Puritans; J. L. Motley, Rise of the Dutch Republic and History of the United Netherlands; W. Maskell, History of the Martin Marprelate Controversy; H. M. Dexter, Congregationalism of the last Three Hundred Years; C. Wordsworth, Ecclesiastical Biography; F. Seebohm, Oxford Reformers; R. Churton, Life of Alexander Nevell; Sir H. Nicolas, Lives of William Davison and Sir Christopher Hatton; Fox Bourne, Life of Sir Philip Sidney; J. S. Brewer, English Studies; Mignet, Histoire de Marie Stuart; J. Hosack, Mary Queen of Scots; W. B. Devereux, Lives and Letters of the Devereux; E. Edwards, Life of Sir Walter Raleigh; M'Crie, Life of John Knox and Life of Andrew Melville (the latter important for the history of learning and education); Athena Cantabrigienses, by C. H. and T. Cooper.

7. Seventeenth Century.—CONTEMPORARY SOURCES: The Calendars of State Papers, "Foreign" and "Domestic," edited by Mr. Lemon, Mr. Bruce, Mr. Hamilton, and Mrs. Everett Green, furnish the key to the most authentic and original information until nearly the close of the seventh decade; while other sources already indicated, such as the Somers Tracts, the Sydney Papers, the Winwood Memorials, the works of Fuller, Collier, Neal, Dodd, Nichols, &c., afford material for either the whole or part of the century.

First Half of Seventeenth Century.

—CONTEMPORARY WRITERS: For the reign of King James, Camden's Annals—a compilation of comparatively little value; other accounts are, Wilson's History of King James I. (in Kennet); Goodman, Court of James I.; King James's own Works. For parliamentary transactions, the Debates of 1610 (C.S.), together with those of the years 1620 and 1621, contained in the Parliamentary History; Rushworth's Collections, commencing with the year 1618; the Protests of the House of Lords (commencing with the year 1625), edited by J. E. T. Rogers; the Melrose State Papers and Correspondence; Sir David Dalrymple, Memorials and Letters (1762); the Carew Letters. Narrative of the Spanish Marriage Treaty (C.S.); Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Expedition to the Isle of Rhé. For Continental relations, the Ambassades de M. de la Boderie, the "Venetian Reports," Winwood, Memorials; Birch, Historical View; and the Mémoires of Rusdorf. For the reign of Charles I., Wallington's Diary; the Thomason collection of pamphlets and "The King's Pamphlets," both in the British Museum; Dalrymple, Memorials and Letters; Lord Clarendon, History of the Rebellion and State Papers; Letters and Papers of the Verney Family (C.S.). Whitelocke, Memorials; the Thurloe Papers; May, History of the Long Parliament; Sir Ralph Verney's Notes (C.S.); Scobell's Collection. For parliamentary proceedings: Strafford's Letters and Despatches; Nalson's Collection. The Ormonde Papers (edited by Thomas Carte); A Contemporary History of Affairs in Ireland from 1641 to 1652 (edited by G. T. Gilbert); Guthry's Mémoires; Ludlow's Mémoires—contain important materials for Scottish and Irish history. Milton's Prose Works and the writings of Bishop Hall give the chief points in dispute between the Episcopalian and Presbyterian parties. Sprigg's Anglia Rediviva; John Webb's Memorials; the Hamilton Papers (C.S.); the Letters of Charles I. to Henrietta Maria (C.S.)—belong to the time of the Civil War. The Puritan Transactions, edited by Heywood and Wright, the Querela Cantabrigiensis, and The Puritan Visitation of the University of Oxford, edited by Professor

Montagu Burrows (C. S.), illustrate the condition of the universities. The Fairfax Correspondence, successively edited by Johnson and Bell, covers the period 1625—70. The important series, Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, edited by Father Foley; the Life of Father John Gerard, by Father Morris; together with the works of Juvencius, Bartoli, and Tanner, should be consulted for the history of the Jesuit movement. The principal biographies are those of the Lord Keeper Williams, by Hackett; of Colonel Birch (C. S.); of Bishop Bedell, edited by Mayor and Jones; of The Dukes of Hamilton, by Bishop Burnet. Among the autobiographies are those of Sir Simonds d'Ewes, Sir Robert Carey, Lord Herbert of Chesham, Lady Halket (C. S.), and Mrs. Alice Thornton.

LATER WRITERS: The writers of the last century—Rapin (the author of a History of England to the Death of Charles I.), Dr. Birch (Court and Times of James I., Court and Times of Charles I.), and Thomas Carte (Life of Ormonde)—together with Brodie (Constitutional History), Godwin (History of the Commonwealth), and Disraeli (Commentaries on the Reign of Charles I.), in the earlier part of the present century, although rendering useful service in their time, must be regarded as almost superseded by later and more systematic research, such as that represented by Carlyle, Letters and Speeches of Cromwell, Guizot, Histoire de la Révolution d'Angleterre and Études sur l'histoire de la Révolution d'Angleterre, and especially Professor S. R. Gardiner, History of England from 1603 to 1642, 10 vols., 1883—84. Ranke's History should also be systematically consulted. Other works are J. B. Mozley, Essays; Stanford, Studies and Illustrations of the Great Rebellion. The colonisation of America may be followed in Bancroft, History of the United States; Palfrey, History of New England; Tyler, History of American Literature, vol. i. The chief biographies are those of Bacon, by J. Spedding; Milton, by Professor Masson; Montrose, by Mark Napier; Prince Rupert, by Eliot Warburton; Fairfax, by Clements Markham; and Clarendon, by T. H. Lister.

Second Half of Seventeenth Century.—CONTEMPORARY WRITERS: Among those named in preceding section are Fuller, Collier, Thurlow, Winwood, Whitelocke, Neal; the Lords and Commons Journals, the Ormonde Papers, the Sydney, Hatton, and Fairfax Correspondence. For the Cromwellian Parliaments, Burton's Diary is of special value. Burnet's History of his own Times belongs to the period from the Restoration to A.D. 1713. Other sources are Kennet, Register and Chronicle; Lives of Charles II. and James II.; Diary of Lord Clarendon; Letters and Memoirs of Sir William Temple; Sir John Reresby's Memoirs;

Letters to Sir Joseph Williamson (C. S.); Diary of John Evelyn; Diary of Samuel Pepys; Memoirs of the Comte de Gramont; Diary of Narcissus Luttrell; Locke, Letters on Toleration; Turner, Vindication of Samcroft and the Deprived Bishops; Sir John Dalrymple, Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland. The Negotiations of the Comte d'Avaux, the materials collected by Mignet relating to the Spanish Succession, and the Correspondence of the Marquis d'Harcourt illustrate the aggressive policy of Louis XIV. The Correspondence of the Duke of Shrewsbury, Macpherson's Original Papers, the State Papers and Letters of Carstairs, the Letters of William III. (edited by Groen van Prinsterer), the Letters of William III. and Louis XIV. (edited by Grimblot), other Letters of William, together with the Reports of F. Bonnet (see Ranke, History of England, vi. 144—404) and a Collection of State Tracts (3 vols. fol.), are all various and valuable material for the reign of William III. In biography we have Baxter, Autobiography, and Calamy, Account of the Ejected Ministers; Boyer, Life of Sir William Temple; Roger North's Lives (of his three brothers); Sir James Turner, Memoirs. The political poems of Dryden should be carefully studied.

LATER WRITERS: A fragment by Charles James Fox on the early part of the reign of James II., and a Life of that monarch by the Rev. J. S. Clarke, together with Sir James Mackintosh's Review of the Causes of the Revolution of 1688, scarcely call for notice in comparison with Macaulay's great History of England, which deals in detail with the reigns of James II. and William III. In connection with special features of the period, Marsden's Later Puritans, Tulloch's Rational Theology in England, and Weld's History of the Royal Society may be mentioned. In biography we have Courtenay, Life of Sir William Temple; Napier, Life of Grahams of Claverhouse; Dixon, Lives of Blake and Penn; Story, Life of Carstairs; Memoirs of William Bowyer (in Nichols, Literary Anecdotes, vol. i.); Macaulay, Essays on Sir William Temple, War of the Succession in Spain, and Sir James Mackintosh; Christie, Life of Shaftesbury.

8. Eighteenth Century to 1789.—CONTEMPORARY WRITERS: For reign of Queen Anne—Swift, Journal to Stella and History of the Four Last Years of Queen Anne's Reign, together with his pamphlets On the Conduct of the Allies and Behaviour of the Queen's last Ministry; Bolingbroke, Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, and Letter on the State of Parties at the Accession of George I.; also his Letters and Correspondence (edited by Parke); Marlborough's Correspondence; Boyer, History of the Reign of Queen Anne; Tindal, Continuation of Rapin's History; the Wentworth Papers (edited by J. J. Cartwright). For reign of the Hanoverian sovereigns—Calendars of the State Papers have appeared for the first nine years only (R. S.), but the published correspondence of the chief statesmen of the period affords material of scarcely less value. Among these are, The Grenville Papers; the Bedford Correspondence; the Chatham Correspondence; Memoirs of Lord Rockingham; Correspondences of George III. with Lord North; the Malmesbury Correspondence; Burke's Correspondence and Speeches, together with his pamphlets, Observations on a Late State of the Nation, Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents, and Letters on the Trade of Ireland; Duke of Buckingham, Memoirs of the Court of George III.; the Cornwallis Correspondence; Romilly's Letters; the Rose Correspondence; the Auckland Correspondence; Horace Walpole, Memoirs of the Reign of George III.; the Letters of Junius; Bubb Dodington's Diary. For American affairs the Reader's Handbook of the American Revolution (1761—83), by Justin Winsor, will be found to afford ample guidance to all the authorities. For debates in the House of Commons—the Gentleman's Magazine and the Annual Register; Cavendish's Debates (A.D. 1768 to 1744).

LATER HISTORICAL WRITERS: Earl Stanhope (Lord Mahon), History of England from the Peace of Utrecht to the Peace of Versailles and History of the Reign of Queen Anne; T. H. Burton, History of the Reign of Queen Anne; Wyon, History of the Reign of Queen Anne; Massey, History of England during the Reign of George III.; Adolphus, History of England from the Accession to the Decease of King George III.; Craik and Macfarlane, Pictorial History of England during the Reign of George III.; W. E. H. Lecky, History of England in the Eighteenth Century; Abbey and Overton, The English Church in the Eighteenth Century; Leslie Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century; Sir Erskine May, Constitutional History of England; Lord Holland, Memoirs of the Whig Party; T. Wright, Caricature History of the Georges.

IN BIOGRAPHY.—W. Coxe, Lives of Marlborough, Walpole, and Henry Pelham; Sir Archibald Alison, Life of Marlborough; Annals and Correspondence of the Earls of Stair, by J. M. Graham; Jesse, Memoirs of the Pretenders; Bishop Monk, Life of Bentley; Sir David Brewster, Life of Sir Isaac Newton; Montagu Burrows, Life of Admiral Hawke; H. Craik, Life of Jonathan Swift; Mac-knight, Life of Bolingbroke; W. Wilson, Life of Defoe, and W. Lee, Life of Defoe; John Forster, Biographical Essays, Life of Pitt; Bunbury, Life of Sir Thomas Hanmer; Lives of Chatham, by F. Thackeray, and of Pitt, by Bishop Tomline and Earl Stanhope; Life of Lord Shelburne, by Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice; Macknight, Life of Burke; Trevelyan, Early History of Charles James Fox; Lord Shelburne's Autobiography; Lord Chesterfield's Letters; Romilly's Letters; Memorials and Correspondence of Fox, by Earl Russell; Sir John Malcolm, Life of Clive; Southey, Life of Wesley; Life and Times of Wesley, by Tyerman; Moore, Life of Sheridan; Brougham, Statesmen of the Reign of George III. For state of Education and Learning—J. G. Nichols, Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century; Rev. C. Wordsworth, University Life and University Studies in the Eighteenth Century; Baker, History of St. John's College (edited by Prof. John E. B. Mayor).

9. From 1789 to the Present Time.—

Besides works named in preceding section, Duke of Buckingham, Memoirs of the Court of the Regency; George Rose, Diary (1801—16); Lord Cornwallis, Correspondence; Wellington, Despatches; Wellesley, Despatches; Sir S. Romilly, Journal (1806—18); Lord Colchester, Diary and Correspondence; Lord Sidmouth, Life and Correspondence; Twiss, Life of Lord Eldon; C. D. Yonge, Life of Lord Liverpool; Erskine, Speeches; Francis Horner, Memoirs and Correspondence; Brialmont, Life of Wellington; Southey, Life of Nelson; Nelson, Despatches (edited by Sir H. Nicolas); Collingwood, Correspondence; Life of Earl of Dundonald (by Earl of Dundonald and Fox Bourne); Lord Dudley, Letters (1814—23); Alison, Lives of Lord Londonderry and Sir Charles Stewart; Londonderry, Correspondence; The Grenville Memoirs; George Canning and his Times, by A. G. Stapleton; Canning's Speeches (with Life), 6 vols.; Life of Earl Grey, by Hon. C. Grey; Sir Robt. Peel's Memoirs, by Stanhope and Cardwell; also Life by Guizot, and Speeches (4 vols.); Memoirs of John Charles Viscount Althorp, by Sir Denis Le Marchant; Life and Speeches of O'Connell, by his son; Ashley, Life of Lord Palmerston; Torrens, Life of Lord Melbourne; J. Morley, Life of Cobden; Alison, History of Europe and Continuation; H. Martineau, History of the Peace; Pauli, Englische Geschichte seit 1815; Molesworth, History of the Reform Bill; Spencer Walpole, History of England from 1815; Kinglake, History of the Invasion of the Crimea; Irving, Annals of our Time (from accession of Victoria); Justin McCarthy, History of our Own Times; Bosworth Smith, Life of Lord Lawrence; G. Brandes, Life of Lord Beaconsfield.

GENERAL HISTORIES OF ENGLAND: Among the best known are those by Rapin, translated by N. Tindal (1726); T. Carte (1747—56); Hume (1754), continued by Smollett (1758); R. Henry (1771—93); Sharon Turner (1814—29); J. Lingard (1819—25); C. Knight (1862); J. R. Green (1881).

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORIES: Prof. Stubbs, Constitutional History of England, invaluable for the earlier and mediæval period, and the fifteenth century to the reign of Henry VII.; Gneist, Englische Verwaltungsverfassung, and Self-Government; and his Englische Verfassungsgeschichte, the best short constitutional history of England. Hallam's Constitutional History, which begins with the reign of Henry VII., is specially useful for the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; and those by Sir Erskine May and Professor C. D. Yonge, for the eighteenth and present centuries. Taswell Langmead's Constitutional History is a useful handbook for students.

WORKS FOR GENERAL REFERENCE: T. H. Burton, History of Scotland; J. Mill, History of British India, with Continuation by H. H. Wilson; Wheeler, History of India; Miss Strickland, Lives of the Queens of England; Lord Campbell, Lives of the Lord Chancellors and Lives of the Lord Chief Justices; Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury; Foss, Lives of the Judges of England; Cobbett and Howell's State Trials; Willis Bund, Selected State Trials; Halliwell, Letters of the Kings of England; Ellis's Original Letters; Rymer, Fœdera; Wilkins, Concilia, partly superseded by Haddan and Stubbs, Councils; Madox, History and Antiquities of the Exchequer; Dumont, Corps Universel Diplomatique du Droit des Gens; Eden, History of the Poor; Rogers, History of Prices; Porter, Progress of the Nation; Macpherson, History of Commerce; Leone Levi, History of British Commerce; James, Naval History; Bruce, History of the East India Company.

Of most of the above works, and many others, some account will be found, together with brief criticisms, in the second part of An Introduction to the Study of English History, by S. E. Gardiner and J. B. Mullinger. [For authorities on Scottish, Irish, and Welsh history see SCOTLAND, IRELAND, WALES.] [J. B. M.]

Avesbury, ROBERT OF (d. 1357), registrar of the archiepiscopal court at Canterbury, wrote a History of the Wonderful Deeds of Edward III., extending from the birth of Edward to the year 1356. It gives us a short detail of public events, with transcripts of original documents and extracts from letters. It was printed by Hearne in 1720.

Avranches, a small town in the extreme west of Normandy, was the scene of Henry II.'s reconciliation with the Pope after the murder of Becket. Here, on Ascension Day, 1172, the king swore on the Gospels that he had neither commanded nor desired the death of Becket; and that he had not so deeply grieved for the death of his own father and mother. He also agreed to abrogate the Constitutions of Clarendon and all bad customs introduced during his reign; to reinvest the Church of Canterbury in all its rights and possessions; to pardon and restore to their estates all who had incurred his wrath in Becket's cause; to maintain 200 knights at his own cost in the Holy Land; and, if the Pope should require it, to make a crusade himself against the Saracens in Spain.

Aylesbury Election Case, THE (1704) (or the case of Ashby v. White), produced a violent collision between the House of Commons and the Lords. The vote of a burgess, Matthew Ashby, had been rejected by the returning officer, William White. Ashby brought an action in the Court of Queen's Bench. There a majority of the judges, contrary to the opinion of Chief Justice Holt, decided against him on the ground that no harm had been done to him, and that decisions on the right to vote belonged to the Commons alone. Ashby's supporters thereupon brought the case by writ of error before the House of Lords. Here the judgment given at the Queen's Bench was reversed, and, by this important decision, franchises were placed under the common law. In spite of the wise advice of the Whig lawyers, William Cowper and Sir Joseph Jekyll, the Commons proceeded to pass resolutions to the effect that (1) neither the qualification of any elector nor the right of any person elected was cognisable elsewhere than before the House of Commons; (2) that Ashby, having in contempt of the jurisdiction of the House prosecuted an action at common law against William White, was guilty of breach of privilege. The Lords passed contrary resolutions, and the quarrel became so serious that early in April Queen Anne put an end to the session. Ashby, however, sued out execution for the damages awarded him at the County Assizes against the returning officers who had refused to receive his vote. In addition, four other burgesses were put forward to sue the officers. The Commons promptly committed the plaintiffs and their attorney to Newgate. The prisoners, after two months, moved the Court of King's Bench for a habeas corpus; but these judges, contrary to the opinion of Holt, who was for the discharge of the prisoners, decided that the court had no jurisdiction in the matter. It was determined to bring this by writ of error before the Lords. The Commons foolishly voted an address to the Queen praying her not to grant a writ of error. Her reply, that the matter required careful consideration, was looked on as equivalent to a refusal. The Lords thereupon passed some important resolutions: (1) That neither House of Parliament could arrogate to itself any new privilege; (2) that the Commons had assumed an unwarranted legislative power by attributing the force of law to their declaration; (3) that they had thereby subjected the rights of Englishmen to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons; (4) that every Englishman who is imprisoned by any authority whatever, has an undoubted right to his writ of habeas corpus; (5) that for the Commons to punish any person for assisting a prisoner to procure such a writ is a breach of the statutes provided for the liberty of the subject; (6) that a writ of error was not one of grace, but of right, and ought not to be denied to the subject when duly applied for. A fairly amicable conference between the two Houses produced no result, as neither side would give way. The Queen, therefore, prorogued Parliament (March 14th), thus leaving a great constitutional question wholly undecided. Hallam thinks that "the House of Commons had an undoubted right of determining all disputed returns to the writ of election, and consequently of judging upon the right of every vote. But as the House could not pretend that it had given this right, or that it was not, like any other franchise, vested in the possessor by a legal title, no protest or analogy could be set up for denying that it might not come, in an indirect manner at least, before a court of justice, and be judged by common principles of law." Aylesford, in Kent, is generally supposed to be the place where, in 455, Horsa fell in a battle against the Britons. Near this is Kit's Coty House, a cromlech said to have been erected to Catigern, one of the British commanders, who was slain in this battle.

Aylmer, JOHN (b. 1521, d. 1594), the tutor of Lady Jane Grey, was one of the most zealous reformers of Edward VI.'s reign. In 1576 he was made Bishop of London by Queen Elizabeth, and distinguished himself by his zeal against the Puritans. He published an Answer to Knox's celebrated Blast of the Trumpet against Monstrous Regiment of Women; but having offended the queen by preaching against dress, she requited him by vowing that, "If he held more discourse on such matters, she would fit him for heaven; but he should walk thither without a staff, and leave his mantle behind him."

Ayscough, or Ayscue, SIR GEORGE (d. 1673?), was the son of a Lincolnshire gentleman. He entered the naval service at an early age, and was knighted by Charles I. In 1648, when the fleet revolted to Prince Rupert, Ayscough secured the Lion for the Parliament. He was appointed to the command of the fleet which had to watch the coasts of Ireland, and in 1651 to reduce the Scilly Islands. In 1652 he took Barbadoes for the Parliament. He was engaged, in company with Blake, in the desperate naval battles against the Dutch in 1652; but he was so much annoyed at Blake's retreat before Tromp, after the action of Nov. 29 in that year, that he laid down his command, and remained in retirement during the remainder of the Commonwealth. In 1665, on the renewal of war with the Dutch, he was made Rear-Admiral of the Blue, and bore a principal share in the great victory obtained over Tromp and Ruyter on June 3. In the great four-days' battle of the following year, Ayscough behaved with distinguished bravery; but his ship ran upon a sand-bank, and he was forced to surrender. The Dutch were so elated at the possession of this formidable antagonist, that they exhibited him in triumph in several of their towns. He was afterwards confined for some time in the Castle of Loevestein. He was subsequently released, and allowed to return to England; but he took no further part in public affairs.

Azores, EXPEDITIONS TO THE, took place (1) in 1572, when Sir John Hawkins, with twenty ships, sailed to lie in wait for the Mexican gold fleet. (2) In July, 1587, when Sir Francis Drake took the Spanish treasure-ship San Felipe, doing so much to damage the Spanish prestige, and to inspire the disheartened ministers of Elizabeth, that the expedition is said to have been "worth at the moment to Protestant England more than a general engagement fought and won." (3) In 1597, when a fleet was sent out under the Earl of Essex, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Lord Thomas Howard to capture the Spanish vessels returning from the Indies. Raleigh, having arrived first, took the Island of Fayal without waiting for Essex, and a serious quarrel arose between the two admirals. Essex subsequently took Flores and Graciosa, but from his bad management allowed the Spanish treasure-ships to escape, taking three only. On the return of the expedition to England, Essex was severely blamed for its failure.

Babington's Conspiracy (1586) originated with Ballard, a Jesuit, and "a young man of family and fortune" named Anthony Babington, of Dethick. Three elements may be traced in this conspiracy: the devoted adherents of the Papacy; English Catholics whom zeal and harsh treatment had driven to desperation; and lastly, the paid agents of Walsingham. Babington—who, whilst a page at Sheffield, had been fascinated by the charms of the Queen of Scots—was easily persuaded by Ballard, after the latter's tour through England in 1585, to enter into a scheme by which Elizabeth was to be assassinated, and the country then raised for Mary. The conspirators, who numbered several gentlemen of position, chose six of their number to commit the crime—namely, Savage, Salisbury, Abington, Tilney, Barnwell, and Tichbourne—and felt confident of success, ignorant of the fact that, through the elaborate system of espionage established by Burleigh and Walsingham, agents of the government had actually been admitted to a share in the secret. Unfortunately for the Queen of Scots, Babington revealed the whole plot to her in a letter, which, like all his others, passed through Walsingham's hands; and her reply, encouraging the conspirators, and urging them to immediate action, ultimately sealed her fate. Proof sufficient having been obtained, Ballard was arrested Aug. 4, 1586, and Babington, with four others, was captured ten days after in a barn at Harrow, whilst the papers of Mary Stuart were seized during her temporary absence from her room on a hunting party. On Sept. 13th the conspirators were tried by a Special Commission at Westminster, and fourteen were executed at Tyburn on the 20th and 21st of the same month. Lingard regards the plot as in very great measure set on foot by Walsingham's spies:—"There was much in the fate of these young men to claim sympathy. Probably had it not been for the perfidious emissaries of Morgan and Walsingham—of Morgan, who sought to revenge himself on Elizabeth, and of Walsingham, who cared not whose blood he shed provided he could shed that of Mary Stuart—none of them would have even thought of the offence for which they suffered." On the other hand, Mr. Froude says:—"It is false, absolutely and utterly, that the plot was set on foot by agents of Walsingham to tempt her to join it in her desperation and then to destroy her."

Bachelor, or Knight Bachelor (bachelarius, baccalarius), was a simple knight, one who had received knighthood, but had obtained no further honour, such as that of being made baronet or Knight of the Bath. The word was also used to denote a squire, or armour-bearer not of the degree of knight, "bachelarii armorum nuncupati," says Spelman, "ut sic innotescerent, a litterarum bachelariis." A knight was required to have ten of these before he could be made a baronet. "Bacheloris" is also occasionally used to designate apparently the whole gentry, or the whole body of military tenants below the degree of baron. Thus the "communitas bachelariis totius Angliæ" (Annal. Burton., p. 471), in 1259, complains to Prince Edward of the conduct of the barons.

Matthew Paris, p. 749; Stubbs, Const. Hist., ii. 87; Spelman, Glossarium. The derivation of the word has been variously connected with Welsh, bach, young (cf. O. Fr. bacelle, bachellette), and more plausibly with bacca, i.e., vacco, a cow, and with baculus, a staff. See Enc. Brit. (ninth ed.).

Bachelors, Taxes on. By the Act 6 and 7 Will. III., a tax was imposed on unmarried male persons above the age of twenty-five, varying in amount from £12 10s. to 1s., according to the taxpayer's status. It was repealed in 1706. In 1785 bachelors' servants were subjected to a higher tax than those of other persons. In Mr. Pitt's graduated Income Tax, in 1799, the rate was higher for bachelors than for married men.

Back Lane Parliament was the name given to an assembly of Catholic delegates from all Ireland, which met in Dublin in Dec., 1792. They drew up a petition professing loyalty and demanding the franchise. The bishops signed it for the clergy, and the delegates for the laity. Five gentlemen, among whom were Byrne and Keogh, went over to present it. Dundas presented them, and they were assured that their wishes would be considered.

Bacon, FRANCIS (LORD BACON). [St. ALBANS, VISCOUNT.]

Bacon, SIR NICHOLAS (b. 1510, d. 1579), was born at Chislehurst and educated for the law, obtaining in 1537 the office of Solicitor to the Court of Augmentations. During the reign of Mary, Sir Nicholas, like many others, conformed to the Catholic religion, although he had been, under Edward VI., an active supporter of the Reformation. Having married a daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, he became Cecil's brother-in-law, and by the latter's recommendation obtained the post of Lord Keeper of the Great Seal on the accession of Elizabeth. He speedily won the confidence of the queen, and became famous for his decisions in equity. In 1561 he did his best to bring about an alliance with the Huguenot leaders in France, and subsequently strongly supported the marriage of the queen, whose favour he lost for a time in 1564, owing to his having participated in the publication of John Hales's book on the succession. The Lord Keeper was for this offence struck off the roll of Privy Councillors, at the instance of his enemy, the Earl of Leicester, and "strictly enjoined to meddle with no business whatever except that of the Court of Chancery." Shortly afterwards, however, he recovered his position at court. In 1568 he was one of the commissioners to inquire into the guilt of the Queen of Scots in the matter of the Darnley murder, and he superintended the trial of the Duke of Norfolk in 1572, although he took no active part in it. Lord Keeper Bacon had a great influence over his brother-in-law Cecil, and is said to have framed the Acts aimed at the Queen of Scots and her supporters. He died Feb. 20, 1579, having held his office for twenty years. His son says of him:—"He was a plain man, direct and constant, without all fineness and doubleness," whilst a contemporary describes him as "a man of greater diligence and ability in his place, whose goodness preserved his greatness from suspicion, envy, and hate."

Bacon, ROGER (b. 1214, d. 1294 P), studied at Oxford and Paris, and took orders as a Franciscan friar. His proficiency in natural science exposed him to very severe treatment on the part of his superiors. Accused of dealing in magic, he was prevented from lecturing at Oxford, and ordered to go to Paris, where he remained several years. Clement IV., in 1266, interested himself in Bacon, induced him to publish his works, and procured his release and return to Oxford. In 1271, in the Compendium Studii Philosophici, he made a violent attack on the monks and clergy. In 1278 he was again imprisoned, and remained in confinement for fourteen years. As a philosopher and man of science, Roger Bacon is a personage of the first importance in the history of mediæval thought.

Bacon's chief work is the Opus Majus, an encyclopædic survey of existing knowledge, which has been compared with the great work of his later namesake. It is printed by Jebb, Lond., 1733. Some of Bacon's minor philosophical treatises are published in the Rolls Series, 1859. A very large number of his writings are still in manuscript. For accounts of Bacon's life, and estimates of his position in philosophy, see E. Charles, Roger Bacon, 1861; Schneider, Roger Bacon, 1873; Mr. Brewer's Prefaces to Bacon's Opera Inedita (Rolls Series).

Badajos was the scene of the fiercest struggles in the Peninsular War. Originally in the hands of the Spaniards, it was surrendered, by the treachery of its commander, in February, 1811, to the French; and on the 5th of May following the first English siege was begun. Owing to false information as to the movements of the French army, the siege was raised, after the operations had been carried on for a week; but, when the battles of Fuentes d'Onoro and Albuera had checked the armies of Massena and Soult, Wellington began his preparations for the second siege. Circumstances, however, prevented him from taking as much time as he really required for the siege; and after two desperate assaults on San Christoval, an outlying fort, in June, the siege was again raised. But in the next year the two previous failures were avenged. The place was very strongly fortified. On the north it was washed by the Guadiana, with two outlying forts thrown across the river, one of which defended the only bridge. At the north-east corner of the town, the Guadiana is joined by the Rivillas. On the south-east beyond the Rivillas an isolated hill was occupied by a strong fort, called the Picurina. Within the walls, the town was defended by four chief fortresses, the castle at the north-east corner, the Trinidad bastion at the east extremity, with that of St. Maria close to it on the west side, and at the extreme north-west corner, by the castle of St. Vincente. Wellington's works were begun on the 17th of March, and on the night of the 25th the Picurina was assaulted and taken after a desperate conflict. On the 6th April the assault was made. Picton crossed the Rivillas and attacked the castle on the right, while Major Wilson stormed the smaller fortress of San Roque; Colville and Barnard assaulted the breaches; Leith was to make a feint against Pardaleras, while Walker made the real attack at St. Vincente. The troops at the breaches displayed the most undaunted courage and resolution, but the terrible defences devised by Philippon, and the stern resistance of the defenders, baffled all their efforts. In two hours 2,000 men had fallen without result; and Wellington sent orders to the party to retire and re-form. Meanwhile Walker's party had succeeded in effecting an entrance through an empty embrasure into St. Vincente. By sheer hard fighting they carried bastion after bastion, till the rumour of a mine caused a panic, and they were temporarily driven back. They soon recovered, however, and sweeping everything before them took those who were defending the breaches in the rear, and in a very short time made themselves masters of the whole town. This was the most bloody of all the struggles of the Peninsular War, and the English lost 5,000 men in killed and wounded.

Badby, THOMAS (d. 1410), was a tailor or blacksmith of Worcestershire, and the first person executed under the statute De Hæretico Comburendo, for denying the Real Presence. The Prince of Wales, who was present at his execution, made a vain attempt to save him by inducing him to recant. But Badby remained firm to his convictions, notwithstanding the entreaties and promises of the prince.

Badges, ROYAL, are distinguished alike from crests and coats of arms. They were intended to be worn on helmets, banners, or caparisons, as well as on the breasts of soldiers, retainers, and attendants. William II.'s badge is said to have been an eagle gazing at the sun; that of Stephen was an ostrich plume. Henry II. used the badge of his house, the planta genista, or broom plant, besides the carbuncle and a sword with an olive branch. Richard I. had a variety of badges: a star issuing from between the horns of a crescent; a mailed arm holding a broken lance; and a sun on two anchors. John seems to have adopted the first of these as his special badge, and Henry III. used the same device. The badge ascribed to Edward I. is "a rose or, stalked proper," while Edward II., in token of his descent from the kings of Castile, used a castle. Edward III.'s badges were very numerous; amongst them were rays descending from a cloud, the stump of a tree, a falcon, an ostrich feather, and a sword erect. Richard II. likewise had a variety of badges, such as the sun in its splendour, the sun behind a cloud, and a white hart. By Henry IV. numerous badges and devices were employed, such as an eagle displayed, a fox's tail, a panther crowned, and a crescent. Henry V. bore an antelope, a swan, and a beacon. Henry VI. also used the antelope, as well as the feather. The Lancastrian party, however, adopted the red rose as their emblem, in opposition to the white rose of the Yorkists. Edward IV. had numerous badges, such as a black bull, a white wolf, and a fetterlock; but the most famous badge of the House of York was the sun in its splendour, to which Shakespeare alludes at the beginning of "Richard III." This king's peculiar badge was a falcon with a woman's face, holding a white rose. In memory of the finding of the crown in a hawthorn bush at Bosworth Field, Henry VII. adopted a crowned hawthorn bush as his badge, besides which he used the red dragon of Wales and a white greyhound, which last was also used by Henry VIII. Edward VI. bore the sun in splendour. The general badge of the House of Tudor was a rose, which Queen Mary frequently used, besides the pomegranate and a sheaf of arrows. Elizabeth also used the rose, as well as the falcon, and James I. the rose and the thistle. Since this time royal badges have not been used, but the rose has come to be considered the emblem of England, the thistle of Scotland, the shamrock of Ireland, and the harp of Wales.

Badon, MOUNT (Mons Badonicus), is the name of the place where King Arthur is said to have defeated the Saxons in 520. Its position is unknown; one school of historians identify it with some place in the south of England, as Badbury, in Dorsetshire; another with towns in the district between the Forth and Clyde, as Borden Hill, near Linlithgow. [AMTHUR.]

Bagemond's Roll was the valuation by Bocamund de Vicci, the Papal Commissioner, in 1275, of all benefices in Scotland, a tenth of the revenues of which were to be devoted to the recovery of the Holy Land. This roll was the basis on which ecclesiastical taxation in Scotland rested down to the time of the Reformation.

Bahamas, THE (or LUCAYOS), consist of a number of small islands in the North Atlantic Ocean, lying to the north-east of Cuba. The principal islands are New Providence (in which is situated Nassau, the capital), St. Salvador (the first land sighted by Columbus on his voyage in 1492), Great Bahama, Long Island, and Eleuthera. Although the Bahamas were discovered by Columbus in 1492, no attempt was made to colonise them until 1629, when an English settlement was planted in New Providence. In 1641 the English were driven out by the Spaniards, but returned again in 1666, and held the islands until they were compelled to retire by a combined French and Spanish attack in 1703. For some years after this the Bahamas were chiefly resorted to by buccaneers, who were, however, extirpated in 1718 by Captain Rogers. In 1781 the islands were taken by a Spanish force, but were recaptured by Colonel Devereux, and finally given up to England by the Treaty of Versailles, 1783. The government, which is representative, is vested in a Governor, an Executive Council of nine members, a Legislative Council of nine, and a Representative Assembly of twenty-eight members, which meets at Nassau, and which is elected by the people of eleven different islands.

Bail (Fr. bailler, to hand over, deliver; or Lat. baulare, to take up a burden) is used in English common law to denote the freeing of accused persons from imprisonment, on security being accepted that they will appear to stand their trial. Mainprize has much the same meaning as bail, and the two terms are used almost promiscuously in the old law books. By the common law all offences were bailable except murder. By the Statute of Westminster, 1275, the power of granting bail in cases of felony and treason was taken away. Common Bail or Bail below was often required for the release of persons charged with trifling offences; but the bail was entered in the names of John Doe and Richard Roe, and was therefore merely formal. This was abolished by 2 Will. IV., c. 39. By 7 Geo. IV., c. 64, justices of the peace might release persons charged with felony if the evidence were not such as to raise a strong presumption of their guilt. The modern practice is regulated by the Act 15 and 16 Vict., c. 76.

Bailiff, a word cognate with Fr. bailli, from Old Fr. bailler, to carry or govern, and Low Lat. ballivus, or bajulus, a governor, is a person who is entrusted with power of superintendence by a superior. The term was in common use among the Normans both in France and in Sicily, and accordingly, after the Conquest, we find it applied loosely to many officials: thus the sheriff was called the king's bailiff, and the district over which his jurisdiction extended was called his bailiwick; so too is the jurisdiction of the chief forester in Henry I.'s charter; the keeper of Dover Castle was also called bailiff, and later on the word is used of elective functionaries. The burgesses of Colchester could elect bailiffs in the reign of Richard I., and under Henry III., when the right of choosing their mayor was taken away from the Londoners, they were allowed to elect bailiffs instead. Gradually the word became attached to definite offices: (1) The presiding magistrate of a town, who assumed the functions of the English reeve, called in mercantile towns port-reeve, whose Latin title prepositus was applied to him—with this essential difference, that the reeve before the Conquest might be, and in the old free towns frequently was, chosen by the citizens, while the Norman bailiff was almost invariably appointed by the lord—e.g., the bailiff of Beverley by the Archbishop of York. His duties were to preserve the king's peace, and to preside over the chief court of the town. Thus in Leicester the bailiff was the constituting officer of the portmannote until the middle of the thirteenth century, and in Beverley the archbishop's bailiffs held the court in his name until the reign of Henry VIII. By the end of the thirteenth century, however, the mayor had supplanted the bailiff nearly everywhere; the summonses of borough members to a national council are addressed to the mayors of the towns more frequently than to the bailiffs, and in cases where both are mentioned the mayor is placed first. Later on, the citizens of Poole, in 1371, were allowed to call their chief magistrate mayor instead of prepositus. Nevertheless, the idea of the bailiff being a great town official still lingered on, and the inquiries of the Corporation Commissioners in 1835 showed that there were 120 officers of this nature in the corporate towns. [REEVE.]

(2) The bailiffs of the liberty and the manor, and closely connected with them the bailiffs of the royal demesne, were officials of higher position than those of the towns. It may be conjectured that the latter are the ballivi mei mentioned in Magna Charta on terms of equality with the sheriffs, and they are mentioned as officers of importance in Henry II.'s Inquest of Sheriffs. Before the Conquest the presiding officer of the Courts of the Liberties, which were jurisdictions exempt from that of the hundred, and of lands held in sac and soc, which corresponded to a certain extent to the Norman manor-system, was the reeve, whose subordinate was the bydel, or beadle. The bailiffs of the liberty or honour and of the manor, represented their lords in the court-baron, or ancient assembly, of the township where by-laws were made, in the court customary, where the business of villanage was transacted, and in the court leet, which had criminal jurisdiction; in the great baronial honours, whose system corresponded to that of the shire, the bailiff attended the sheriff's tourn or court for the view of frankpledge. On a liberty the lord and the bailiff, as his lord's representative, were the only persons who could execute the king's writ to the exclusion of the sheriff until the Statute of Westminster the second (1295), when it was provided that if the bailiff neglected to execute a writ within the liberty, a writ, with a clause of non omittas, should be issued authorising the sheriff himself to enter the liberty and execute the writ. During the reigns of the Edwards, and subsequently, the power of these bailiffs was narrowly watched; they were to be sworn to make distress, and punished for malicious distress by fine and treble damage; to truly impanel jurors, and to make returns by indenture between them and the sheriffs. They could not arrest without order of the sheriff. The exclusive jurisdictions of the liberties still exist in many parts of England, and in 1844 the power of the bailiffs was regulated by placing their appointment in the hands of the judge of the courts, i.e., the county-clerk or under-sheriff before whom they are held, and subjecting them to severe penalties for misdemeanour. With the decay of feudalism the bailiff of the manor became an unimportant functionary who looked after his lord's interests in the matter of collecting rents, surveying improvements, &c. (3) The bailiff of the hundred presided, after the Conquest, in the smaller court of the hundred, the chief business of which was to settle disputes about small debts. He represented the king's interest, and was probably the same as the gerefa, or reeve of the hundred, of the laws of Edward the Elder and Ethelred. He was supposed to execute all process directed to the sheriff, to collect the king's fines and fee-farm rents, and to attend the judges of assize and gaol-delivery. From Bracton we learn that another of his duties was to select four knights of the hundred, who were in turn to choose the jury of inquisition. These jurisdictions of the hundreds fell, under the Norman kings, into the hands of great landowners, in which case the bailiff was appointed by the lord, and presided in the manorial courts as well as the hundred-court. The functions of the bailiff of the hundred were, therefore, gradually absorbed by the bailiff of the manor on the one side, and on the other by the improved machinery of the county courts, which, in the days of Henry III., began to obtain in England. These functions were also, to a certain extent, represented in later times by (4) the sheriff's bailiff, who is, however, mentioned as early as 1170 in Henry II.'s Inquest of Sheriffs. The office can hardly be said to be of constitutional importance; bailiffs executed writs and made arrests within the sheriff's bailiwick, and they were usually bound, in an obligation to the sheriff, for the due execution of their offices, whence they were called bound bailiffs (vulgarly corrupted into bum bailiffs). Special bailiffs may also be nominated at the request of the suitor in a case, and approved by the sheriff, for a particular occasion. Their persons were protected, and severe penalties laid on them for misdemeanour by the Inferior Courts Act (1844).

Bailiwick signifies either a county in which the sheriff as bailiff of the king exercise jurisdiction, or the liberty or franchise of some lord, "who has an exclusive authority within its limits to act as the sheriff does in the county." [BAILIFF.]

Baillie, ROBERT (b. 1599, d. 1662), minister of Kilwinning, was one of the leaders of the Covenanters, and a voluminous writer. He was one of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and in March, 1649, was one of the commissioners sent to Charles II. at the Hague.

Baird, SIR DAVID (b. 1758, d. 1829), entered the army in 1772, and in 1776 obtained a company in a new regiment, raised by Lord Macleod, and destined for India. He arrived at Madras in Jan., 1780, and shortly afterwards had active employment made for him by the irruption of Hyder Ali into the Carnatic. While proceeding with his regiment, under Colonel Baillie, to join Sir Hector Munroe, he fell into an ambuscade which had been set for the detachment. Baird, wounded in four places, remained a prisoner till he was released in July, 1784. In 1789 he went on leave to England, but returned two years later as lieutenant-colonel of his regiment. After this he was continually employed in some active service in India, being present at the siege of Pondicherry in 1793, and leading the storming party at Seringapatam in 1799. In 1800 he was appointed to command the expedition to Egypt, where he acted in conjunction with the army which Abercromby had commanded. Taking umbrage at Wellesley's promotion, Baird came to England in 1803, and two years later was despatched to the Cape of Good Hope, which he reduced and formed into a colony. On his return to England in 1807, he was sent under Lord Cathcart to Denmark, and was twice wounded at the siege of Copenhagen. He had no sooner returned from that expedition than he was despatched with 10,000 troops to reinforce Sir John Moore. Having effected a junction, Sir David shared in all the hardships of the dreadful retreat, and finally rendered excellent service as second in command at Corunna, where he lost his left arm.

Bajee Rao, the son of Ragoba, became, on the death of Madhao Rao II. in 1796, the natural heir to the office of Peishwa. On acceding to office, Lord Wellesley made it his great object to conclude a subsidiary alliance with Bajee Rao. The march of Holkar on Poonah (1801) so alarmed the Peishwa that he began to treat, while the total defeat of his own and Scindiah's troops at the battle of Poonah, Oct. 25, 1802, drove him to the English residency, and from thence to the coast, where, at his own request, he was transported by an English ship to Bassein. He was now eager for the English alliance, and on Dec. 31, 1802, the memorable Treaty of Bassein was concluded. The Peishwa himself, however, repented of the treaty as soon as he had affixed his seal to it, and commenced a series of intrigues with Scindiah and the Bhonslah to render it ineffectual. The treaty, however, had effectually curbed his power, and the victories of the English in the war which followed set a seal to this by completely breaking up the Mahratta Confederacy. Under the rule of Sir George Barlow, Bajee Rao made a vain attempt (1806) to reassert his lost power. The Peishwa, however, waited anxiously for a chance of revenge on the English. A general confederacy of Mahrattas and Pindaries was organised against the English in 1815. The next year Bajee Rao's attitude became more hostile, and he began to intrigue with Scindiah, Amear Khan, and Holkar, and assembled a large body of troops near his capital. A British force was ordered up to Poonah, and the Peishwa was compelled to accept the treaty of June 5th, 1817, which bound him to dismiss his mischievous minister Trimbukjee, the great opponent of the British; to renounce the formal headship of the Mahrattas for ever; to dismiss all foreign ambassadors, and refer all communications from foreign states to the Company's government. Bajee Rao had no sooner signed this treaty than he proceeded to hasten his intrigues, and, in the full assurance of powerful support, he plunged into hostilities Nov. 5, 1817. The defeat of Kirkee was immediately followed by the surrender of Poonah and the retreat of the Peishwa. He was again severely defeated, by General Smith, at Korgaom, on Jan. 1, 1818, and at Ashtee, soon after which battle he was forced to surrender. He was taken to Bithoor, sixteen miles from Cawnpore, where he received an annuity of eight lacs of rupees for the rest of his life. He died in 1853, leaving an adopted son, Nana Sahib.

Balaclava, THE BATTLE OF (Oct. 25, 1854), during the Crimean War, was brought on by the Russian general, Prince Mentschikoff, who moved a body of 30,000 men on Balaclava, hoping to get possession of the harbour, and to cut the allies off from their supplies. The Russians first attacked the redoubts in the valley of Kadikoi, defended by the Turks, who fled almost immediately. The Russian cavalry then advanced towards Balaclava, but were checked by Sir Colin Campbell's Highland Brigade, and by the Heavy Brigade of cavalry. The charge of the Heavy Brigade was a peculiarly brilliant piece of cavalry fighting. The Russians, though more than twice as numerous as their opponents, were driven back in confusion. The main body of the English and French now came into action, and the fighting about the captured redoubts began to thicken. Lord Raglan, thinking the enemy were retiring with the guns from one of the redoubts, sent orders to Lord Lucan, in command of the cavalry, to follow and harass their retreat. But by the time the Light Brigade was prepared to carry out the order the broken Russian cavalry had re-formed, and the main body of Liprandi's corps d'armée had advanced and formed at the bottom of the valley. Notwithstanding, Lord Lucan—"from some misconception of the order given," as Lord Raglan's despatch said, and of the verbal instructions of Captain Nolan, the aide-de-camp—"considered that he was bound to attack at all hazards," and, in spite of Lord Cardigan's remonstrance, insisted that the charge should be carried out. Accordingly, the Light Brigade (consisting of the 5th and 11th Hussars and the 17th Lancers), in all 673 men, commanded by Lord Cardigan, rode down upon the whole Russian army. They broke their way right through the enemy's lines, and struggled back again through the valley, in which the Russian guns played on them from front, flank, and rear as they rode, with the loss of 113 killed, 134 wounded, and 15 prisoners. Except for some desultory cannonading, this ended the battle. The Russians had not effected their object, but they kept possession of the ground they had won in the valley, so that the victory may be said to have been indecisive.

Balance of Power may be defined as the existence of such a connection and such relations of power among a majority of neighbouring states, that no one of them can endanger the independence or the rights of any other state without effectual resistance, and without danger to itself. The term seems to have come into existence at the beginning of the sixteenth century. The Duc de Rohan's work, Trutina Statuum Europæ, was published in 1645. The first attempt towards establishing a balance of power in Europe was probably that of Henry IV. and Sully, which dates from 1603. Their idea was to create a confederation in Europe under the title of the "République très chrétienne." It was to contain fifteen states: five elective monarchies—the Pope, the Emperor (the ancient freedom of election being restored, with a provision that no two successive Emperors were to be chosen from the same house), the Kings of Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia; six hereditary monarchies—those of France, Spain, England, Denmark, Sweden, and Lombardy, the last a new kingdom created for the Duke of Savoy: four republics—Holland, Venice, a republic containing Genoa, Florence, and Central Italy, and Switzerland, which was to be considerably enlarged. Each of these states was to have its limits so well defined that it could not exceed them without being attacked by all the rest. There was to be liberty of conscience—Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and Calvinists were to be on an equality; there was to be a general federal council, to keep peace at home, and to make war upon the infidel. (See Sully, Economies Royales in Petitot's Collection of Memoirs.) The plan of Henry IV. came to nothing, and the Peace of Westphalia (1648) is generally regarded as the foundation of the modern political system of Europe. It established a modus vivendi between Catholics and Protestants; recognised the Republics of Switzerland and the United Netherlands; placed the German Empire on a firmer footing; and raised a bulwark against the ambition of the house of Austria. The second great settlement was that of the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), which put an end to the war of rivalry between France and Austria for the throne of Spain. Since the Peace of Westphalia the equilibrium of Europe had been more seriously threatened by the house of Bourbon than by the house of Hapsburg; but the Treaty of Utrecht gave Spain to a younger branch of the Bourbon line. England was the principal power in the negotiation, whereas she had taken no part in the Treaty of Westphalia. The third great settlement of Europe was in the Peace of Vienna in 1815. This was designed to restore to Europe the tranquillity which had been broken by the wars of the French Revolution and of Napoleon. Its arrangements were based on calculations of the balance of power, but many of them have been falsified by events. The theory of the balance of power may at one time have been defensible, but it has often given rise to spoliation and violations of justice. It is impossible to restrain every state within the limits which once sufficed for it. The growth of wealth, of population, of colonisation, the inevitable facts of annexation and conquest, are witnessed in all ages of the world. Peace is destroyed if each of these increments is held to justify a similar addition to neighbouring states. The law of progress determines the shifting of the balance; but there is no reason why each of these changes should be the signal for a European war. The modern law of nations depends rather on securing the equality of all states, great and small, before the law, and the protection of the weak against the violence of the strong. The growth of one state in power and prosperity is not necessarily a danger to the rest. It may even be sometimes regarded as an additional guarantee for peace.

Baldock, ROBERT (d. 1327), was Chancellor of England from 1323 to 1326. He was one of Edward II.'s chief supporters, and shared with the Despensers the hatred of the baronage. Soon after his appointment a conspiracy was formed to murder him, and, though this failed, his tenure of office was a troubled one. In 1326, on the landing of Queen Isabella, he fled with the king and the Despensers into Wales, where he was seized and sent to the Bishop of Hereford's palace in London. Hence, by the connivance of his enemies, he was dragged by the mob, and, after much ill-usage, thrust into Newgate, where he shortly afterwards died from the injuries he had sustained.

Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury (1185—1190), born at Exeter, was educated at Ford Abbey. He became Bishop of Worcester in 1180, and in 1184, despite the claims of the monks of Canterbury to elect, was chosen by the bishops of the province Archbishop of Canterbury. He preached the second crusade in England, and himself took the Cross. He was present at the siege of Acre, where he died of a fever.

Bale, JOHN (b. 1495, d. 1563), one of the most zealous of the Reformers under Henry VIII., was made Bishop of Ossory by Edward VI., 1552. He was compelled to leave England during the reign of Mary, and took refuge at Basle, but returned on the accession of Elizabeth, and was made Prebendary of Canterbury. Bale was a voluminous writer, and wrote, besides several miracle-plays, a work of British biography, entitled Illustrium Majoris Britanniæ Scriptorum Catalogus, which extends from Japhet to 1549. In his controversial works he is violent and abusive, so that Mr. Froude has called him "a foul-mouthed ruffian;" but he seems to have been an honest, if too zealous, Reformer.

A selection from Bale's Works was published by the Parker Society in 1849. The fullest account of him is given in Cooper, Athenæ Cantab.

Balfour, JOHN (of Burley), in conjunction with Hackston, his brother-in-law, and John Henderson, murdered Archbishop Sharp, 1674. He made his escape after the murder, and was present at the battle of Drumclog (q.v.).

Baliol, THE FAMILY OF, was one of the wealthiest in Normandy, being possessed of the lands of Nyvelle and Bailleul; the house also acquired considerable estates in the north of England after the Conquest, and held Harcourt and Barnard Castles. Its members, such as Bernard and Henry de Baliol, are found taking an active part on the side of England in all the Border wars. John de Baliol having married Devorguilla (a daughter of Alan of Galloway, and Margaret, daughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon), transmitted to his son, John Baliol, a claim to the Scottish crown, 1291.

Baliol, JOHN DE, one of the regents of Scotland during the minority of Alexander III., was deprived of his office by the English party, 1255. He was Lord of Nyvelle in Normandy, and of Barnard Castle.

Baliol, JOHN, Lord of Galloway, was the son of John de Baliol, regent of Scotland, and Devorguilla, granddaughter of David of Huntingdon, from whom he derived his claim to the Scottish throne. On the death of the Maid of Norway in 1290, and the consequent failure of heirs to Alexander III., Baliol, in conjunction with Robert Bruce, John de Hastings, and a host of minor competitors, laid claim to the crown of Scotland. Together with other Scotch nobles, he was summoned by Edward I. to a conference at Brigham, 1291, where the succession to the Scotch throne was to be settled. At this meeting forty commissioners were appointed by Baliol, forty by Bruce, and twenty-four by Edward, to report on the claims of the competitors; the meeting was adjourned to June, 1292, when the arbiters announced that as Baliol was representative of the elder daughter of David his claims were preferable to those of Bruce. Baliol was accordingly declared King of Scotland by Edward, and did homage to him as his liegeman, Nov. 20, 1292; he was crowned at Scone ten days afterwards, and renewed his homage to Edward, Dec. 26, at Newcastle. Edward soon began to exact the rights of an overlord, encouraging appeals to his own courts from those of Baliol; on the appeal of Macduff of Fife, the Scotch king was summoned to appear in London, and, though he disobeyed this summons, he went to the English court on the appeal of Sir William Douglas in 1293. Little by little Scotch feeling against the action of the English king was aroused; in Oct., 1295, Baliol, urged by public feeling in the country, concluded an alliance with Philip of France, and in March of the following year invaded England, laying waste the northern counties, and also sent a document renouncing his allegiance to the English king. Edward at once marched northwards at the head of a large army, and took Berwick, Dunbar, and Edinburgh. On July 10, 1296, Baliol, seeing that further resistance was useless, made his submission at Montrose, renouncing to his liege lord the kingdom of Scotland. Edward ordered his imprisonment in England for a short time, after which he was permitted to retire to his lands of Bailleul in France.

Baliol, EDWARD, the son of King John Baliol, was in 1324 brought over to England from the court of France, and, on the death of Bruce in 1328, secretly encouraged by the English government, and joined by the "disinherited barons," he put forward his claims to the throne of Scotland through hereditary succession (although his father had resigned all connection with the kingdom). In 1332 he landed with an army in Fifehire, and won the battle of Duplin; shortly afterwards he successfully held Perth against a besieging army, and was crowned at Scone, Sept., 1332. His first act was to render homage to Edward, who at once sent an army to assist him, but the national party gradually gathered strength, and Baliol found himself compelled to retire to the English court after a defeat at Annan. Having obtained the aid of some English barons, he returned to Scotland, where he met with a few successes in the southern part of the country; in 1338 he went to reside in England, where he remained for some time; in 1346 he ravaged the Lothians with an English army, but gained little advantage; in 1356 he resigned absolutely his claims to the crown and kingdom to Edward III.

Ball, JOHN (d. 1381), one of the leaders of the Peasant Revolt [Cade's REBELLION], is said to have been one of Wiclif's "Poor Priests," and at all events he preached doctrines very similar to theirs. He had been notorious as a wild fanatic for many years, and was imprisoned by the Archbishop of Canterbury in Maidstone gaol, whence he was released by the insurgents, to whom he preached a famous sermon on Blackheath full of socialistic doctrine. He took for his text the popular distich—

"When Adam dalf and Evè span,
Who was then the gentleman?"

On the suppression of the revolt he was seized and executed.

Ballads are of great historical importance, for they were the literature of the people, and give indications, which can be obtained nowhere else, of the popular feeling in stirring times. They were numerous in the old English days, and were sung in the thegn's hall and in the churl's cottage. Some specimens, chief of which is the song of the Battle of Brunanburh, were so popular that they were embodied in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. After the Conquest, the songs of the people no longer circulated amongst the Norman barons. Not till barons and people were united in the attempt to assert their common liberties did a ballad literature arise which breathes the spirit of all classes. In the reign of John, we again find political songs, and in the times of the Barons' War they were numerous. There are French ballads which were sung in the barons' halls, Latin ballads which were current among the educated class, and rude but spirited English ballads which were sung by the people. Chief in importance amongst these is a Latin "Song of the Battle of Lewes" (Wright, "Political Songs," p. 72), which is a remarkable assertion of constitutional principles, and might have been written by a Whig in 1688. The reign of Edward I. awakened a national spirit, which found its expression in national and martial songs, accompanied by others which grumble at oppression. In the reign of Edward II. the latter kind prevail, while under Edward III. the balance is restored by the patriotism kindled by the French war. The number of English songs becomes greater; the French and Latin sink into the background. The end of the reign of Edward III. saw the English songs disappear, and the others became less spirited. The national impulse was spent, and the problems of the succeeding period awakened no popular expression. Ballads gradually ceased to have a direct bearing on politics, and were concerned with chivalry and romance. They satisfied the popular desire for adventure, but did not deal with current events. The minstrel became a recognised personage, and was generally said to come from "the north country," the land where border-raids still kept alive the adventurous spirit. The ballads of Chevy Chase, Edom o' Gordon, and Adam Bell, all show their northern origin. It is of them that Sir Philip Sidney wrote, "I never heard the old songs that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet." During the Reformation period ballads dealt with polemical topics, often in a coarse and irreverent manner. However, the influence of ballads naturally declined before the growth of other forms of literature. The stage and the pamphlet afforded other means of expressing popular opinion. The struggle between the Stuarts and the Parliament did not give rise to much ballad literature. But the unpopularity of James II. was sung and whistled all over England in Wharton's "Lillibullero." A vein of very beautiful ballad-poetry was struck in Scotland by the Jacobite risings of the eighteenth century. In Ireland also ballads survive to the present day as a political power. The songs written for the Nation newspaper, collected under the name of "The Spirit of the Nation," deserve their popularity by their poetical merits. At the present day there are numerous collections of old ballads; but it is difficult to determine their date, and, in many cases, their genuineness.

Ballard, JOHN, or FORTESCUE (d. 1586), a Jesuit priest of Rheims, and the original instigator of the Babington plot (q.v.), landed in England (1585), having previously obtained the sanction of the Pope to the queen's murder. He made a tour of the north and west of England, and subsequently reported to Mendoza, who had been ambassador at Elizabeth's court, that the death of the queen was necessary to the success of an insurrection. In 1586 Ballard returned to England, and was in close communication with Babington. On Aug. 4, 1586, he was arrested, and executed at Tyburn in the following month.

Ballinamuck, SURRENDER OF THE FRENCH AT (Sept. 8, 1798). The French force under General Humbert, which had landed at Killala and routed the troops sent against them at Castlebar, found their way to Longford barred by a large force under Lord Cornwallis, while General Lake with fresh troops was close behind, so that Humbert had no alternative but to surrender. Eight hundred French, and 1,500 Irish surrendered. Many of the latter were at once hanged.

Ballot, VOTE BY. The ballot is properly a mode of voting in which little balls are used, but it is employed to signify any kind of secret voting. The vote by ballot for members of Parliament appears to have been first proposed in the reign of William III. In 1710, a Bill authorising vote by ballot passed the Commons, but was rejected by the Lords. During the agitation for Parliamentary reform, which resulted in the Reform Bill of 1832, it was not lost sight of as a remedy for bribery; and some disappointment was felt, on the introduction of the Reform Bill by Lord J. Russell, that provisions for secret voting were not contained in it. It was replied that the reason why a ballot clause was not introduced into the Bill, was because it was desirable that the two questions should be kept distinct. When it was found that the ministry did not intend to follow the Reform Act by a Ballot Act, the matter was taken up by independent members of the Liberal party. Mr. George Grote made his first motion in favour of the ballot on April 25, 1835. He repeated it every year till 1839, on which occasion the ayes were 216, the noes 333. Mr. Grote's place in moving the adoption of the ballot was taken by Mr. Henry Berkeley, who in 1851 carried his motion in spite of the opposition of Lord J. Russell and the government by a majority of fifty-one. It was, however, rejected on several subsequent occasions. Vote by ballot was one of the points of the People's Charter, and perhaps the one to which the greatest importance was attached. It was advocated on the ground of its being the only efficient safeguard against bribery and intimidation; it was opposed on the ground of the safeguard being itself founded on falsehoods, and the probability of a man promising to vote in one way and voting in another. The revelations made before a select committee of the House of Commons convinced many statesmen, Mr. Gladstone among others, that the step could not be long delayed. This committee reported, in 1869, that the ballot presented many advantages—that it would put an end to some of the evils in our electoral system, and that it would tend to mitigate rather than to aggravate those which it would not entirely remove. In 1871, the matter was referred to in the Queen's Speech, and a Bill was introduced. It passed the Commons, but was rejected by the Lords on the ground that it was brought before them too late in the session. It was introduced again in 1872, and passed the Commons, but an amendment was introduced in the Lords making secret voting optional. This the House of Commons would not accept, and after a struggle the Lords yielded the point. With the establishment of secret voting, public nominations of the candidates and public declarations of the poll, which had frequently been occasions of serious disorder and rioting, were abolished.

Ballymore, THE BATTLE OF (June 3, 1798), was fought during the Irish Rebellion between Colonel Walpole and Father Murphy. The former, marching carelessly towards Enniscorthy with some 500 royal troops, was surprised in a defile by a body of insurgents under Father Murphy. Colonel Walpole fell with a considerable portion of his force, and his guns were captured.

Balmerino, ARTHUR ELPHINSTONE, LORD (b. 1688, d. 1746), was a noted Jacobite. He early entered the army, and held command of a company of foot in Lord Shannon's regiment under Queen Anne; but on the accession of George I. he resigned his commission. Elphinstone took part in the Jacobite rebellion of 1715, and fought at the battle of Sheriffmuir. He escaped to France and served in the French army until 1733. He was one of the first to repair to the Young Pretender's standard in 1745, and at once became colonel, and captain, of the second troop of Charles Edward's life-guards. Early in 1746 he succeeded to the title of Balmerino on the death of his brother. Taken prisoner at the battle of Culloden he was tried for high treason before the Lord High Steward's Court in Westminster Hall, found guilty, and executed. He maintained his principles to the end, and his last words were, "God bless King James."

Balnavis, HENRY, of Halhill (d. 1570 ?), was one of the earliest of the Scottish Reformers. He was appointed a Lord of Session in 1538, and sat in Parliament in the same year, and supported the Act for the translation of the Old and New Testaments. He was one of the commissioners in May, 1543, appointed to treat of the marriage between Edward VI. and Mary. In 1547, he was taken prisoner by the French force sent to assist the Queen Regent, and conveyed to France in company with Knox. Recalled in 1554, he was in 1563 reappointed a Lord of Session. He was on the commission appointed to revise the Book of Discipline, and one of those who accompanied Murray on his mission to England in connection with the murder of Darnley.

Baltic Expedition, THE (1854—55), occurred during the war with Russia. On March 11, 1854, a strong squadron, consisting of eight screw line-of-battle ships, and eight frigates and paddle-wheel steamers, sailed for the Baltic under the command of Sir Charles Napier. Previous to the departure of the fleet a banquet was given to the admiral at the Reform Club, where speeches calculated to increase the war feeling in the country were made by Lord Palmerston and Sir James Graham, and provoked much animadversion in Parliament. In April Sir Charles Napier, strongly reinforced and accompanied by a powerful French fleet, established a blockade of the Gulf of Finland, and captured many Russian prizes. In August Bomarsund was bombarded and taken; but except that a large Russian army had been kept inactive in the Baltic forts, and the Russian fleet had been driven from the sea, nothing further of much importance was done this year. Consequently the government evinced dissatisfaction that more had not been effected, and on the return of Sir Charles in December, he was treated with great coldness, and finally deprived of his command. Rear-Admiral Dundas succeeded him in 1855, and in the summer of that year there were eighty-five English war vessels, besides a large French fleet, in the Baltic Seas. The fleet consisted entirely of steamers, and was accompanied by a flotilla of floating batteries, mortar vessels, and gunboats. Some delay occurred in consequence of a collision between one of the squadron and an American emigrant ship. On June 1st, however, the allied fleets met in the Baltic and proceeded to bombard Sveaborg. This place was battered with shot and shell for three days, with an immense destruction of life and property, but without any appreciable result on the course of the war. The fleets then retired in consequence of the unfavourable weather, and returned home, having effected nothing in proportion to the expense which they had involved, and the expectations to which they had given rise.

Baltimore, GEORGE CALVERT, 1st LORD (b. 1580, d. 1632), was Secretary of State to James I., but was compelled to resign his office in 1624, in consequence of having become a Roman Catholic. He had always taken a great interest in colonisation, and obtained in the year of his death the charter of Maryland from Charles I. An expedition was sent out in 1633 under the patronage of Cecil Calvert, second Lord Baltimore (who died in 1676), and the colony of Maryland was successfully planted. The capital was named Baltimore in honour of its patron.

Bamborough, anciently "Bebbanburgh," is mentioned by Bede, and is said in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to have been built by Ida, King of Northumbria, about the year 547, and named in honour of his wife Bebbe. There is a very strongly-situated castle, some portions of which possibly belong to a period before the Norman Conquest. The castle was besieged by Penda of Mercia in 642, unsuccessfully defended by De Mowbray against William Rufus, and it played an important part in the civil wars of the fifteenth century. In 1720 it passed into the possession of Nathaniel, Lord Crewe, Bishop of Durham, who turned it into an institution for various charitable purposes, and fitted up apartments for shipwrecked seamen, a library, schools for poor children, an infirmary, &c.

Banbury, judging from the number of Roman remains which have been discovered there, was probably a place of importance before the English Conquest. It appears in Domesday Book as Banesberie. In the reign of Henry I. a great castle was erected by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln. In 1469 a battle was fought near the town by the troops of Edward IV., under the Earl of Pembroke, and a strong body of northern insurgents, in which Pembroke (weakened by the desertion of Lord Stafford) was defeated, and subsequently beheaded. [Edw. core.] In the Civil War the inhabitants of Banbury were specially zealous for the Commonwealth. After the battle of Edgehill the town was taken by the king, and stood a desperate siege in 1644, for fourteen weeks, when the garrison were reduced to the last extremity before they were relieved by the Earl of Northampton. It was again besieged by Whalley in 1646, but held out till the king had surrendered to the Scots army. The castle was subsequently destroyed by order of the Parliament.

Bancroft, RICHARD, was Archbishop of Canterbury from 1604 to 1610. He was born in Lancashire in 1544, and was educated at Cambridge University. Bancroft early gained considerable fame as a preacher, and having won the favour of Sir Christopher Hatton, obtained rapid preferment, becoming Treasurer of St. Paul's (1585), Canon of Canterbury (1594), and Bishop of London (1597). He had already made himself very popular by his denunciations of the Puritans, and Archbishop Whitgift, who was old and unfit for work, entrusted the sole management of church affairs to him. Three years later he was employed on an embassy to Denmark. Bishop Bancroft took an active part in the Hampton Court Conference between the representatives of the Establishment and the Puritans, at Hampton Court, in 1604. Later in the year he succeeded Whitgift as Archbishop of Canterbury, and at once proceeded to compel the clergy to subscribe the articles imposed in the new book of canons which he had compiled, the result being that some three hundred of the Puritan clergy were ejected from their livings. At the same time he was engaged in superintending the present translation of the Bible. In the following year he presented to the king a series of articles of complaint against the judges, who, acting on the advice of Coke, had issued prohibitions in the Ecclesiastical Courts in order to stop the cases before them; but the judges declared that they would submit to an Act of Parliament, and to that only. The undaunted archbishop, who in the meantime had been active in securing the condemnation of the Puritan Fuller, renewed his appeal in 1608, but James, who was inclined to support him, after a violent altercation with Coke, thought it best to reserve his conclusion. The same result happened in the following year, when he, urged on by the prayers of the ecclesiastical lawyers, brought forward his complaint a third time. Bancroft is said to have used his influence to soften the rigour with which Parliament was inclined to treat the Papists after the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot; but he could not prevent the passing of a Bill of Pains and Penalties. In 1608 he was made Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and just before his death took great interest in James's scheme for an episcopal church in Scotland. Archbishop Bancroft was a remarkably sincere though perhaps a narrow-minded man, never deliberately cruel; but a firm believer in the divine origin of the Episcopacy—a doctrine which he was one of the first to assert—he suppressed the Puritans mercilessly, and they, in return, never ceased to abuse him. He has been called covetous, but probably without much foundation.

Bangorian Controversy. [HOADLEY.]

Banished Lords (1583) was the name given to the nobles of the Ruthven party who seized Stirling Castle, but were compelled by Arran and a large royal army to flee across the border. They formed a small community, which they attempted to regulate on strict religious principles at Newcastle. The Scottish government outlawed them, and demanded their surrender; this was, however, refused. In 1585 the banished lords, with the Hamiltons and Maxwells and a strong force, marched to Stirling, captured the king, and procured the reversal of their outlawry and the restitution of their estates.

Bank Charter Acts, BANK OF ENGLAND, BANK OF IRELAND, &c. [BANKING.]

Bank Holidays Act, THE, was brought in by Sir John Lubbock, and carried in May, 1871. It declared that Easter Monday, Whit Monday, the first Monday in August, and the day after Christmas should be kept as public holidays.

Banking (1) seems to have originated in modern Europe among the Italian money-lenders, especially those of Florence, of whom the Bardi and Peruzzi, who were ruined by the inability of Edward III. to pay his debts, most concern English history. Banking was first practised in England during the reign of Charles II. by the goldsmiths of Lombard Street, and it soon became an important trade, when the advantages of cheques over ready money payments became known, in spite of its dangers as displayed by the frequent bankruptcy of the goldsmiths. Private banks sprang up, such as those of Messrs. Child at Temple Bar, and of Messrs. Hoare in Fleet Street, and the question of a national bank began to be eagerly discussed.

(2) THE BANK OF ENGLAND was projected by a Scotchman, William Paterson, who submitted his plan to the government in 1691. It was well received, but was allowed to lie dormant until 1694, when Montague, the ablest financier in William III.'s ministry, suddenly determined to establish the Bank in order to relieve government of its many difficulties caused by war and misapplied taxation. He borrowed £1,200,000 at eight per cent., and formed the subscribers into a company, who treated the loan to government as part of their capital, the interest being secured upon the taxes. By their charter, which was granted for eleven years, from July 27, the government of the bank was entrusted to a governor and twenty-four directors, who were to be elected annually by such members of the company as possessed £500 capital stock. Sir John Hornblow was the first governor. The company was restrained from trading in anything but bullion, bills of exchange, and forfeited pledges, and from lending money to the crown without the consent of Parliament. In spite of the popularity of the Bank of England, the government loan of which was raised in ten days, it had at first to encounter much opposition, and several crises occurred, especially during the year 1696. The goldsmiths, who hated the Bank of England, attempted to destroy it by buying up its paper, and suddenly demanding immediate payment. The directors, however, referred them to the courts of law, and, during the time thus gained, managed to restore their credit by extensive calls on their subscribers. They were strengthened by the fall of their rival the Land Bank, whose brief popularity had seriously affected their operations during the crisis. This was the idea of two men named John Briscoe and Hugh Chamberlayne, who thought that a bank could be formed to lend money on landed security, their doctrine being that every one who had real property ought to have besides paper money to the full value of their property. The scheme was adopted in a modified form by Harley; he promised to advance two millions and a half to government at 7 per cent., the interest being secured upon a new tax on salt. If a quarter of the money was paid in by the 1st of August the subscribers were to be incorporated under the title of the National Land Bank. William, urged by want of money, grasped at the idea, and headed the list with £500, but the scheme proved an utter failure. The subscriptions never rose to more than £7,500. Thereupon the government turned in despair to the Bank of England; the subscribers, in full court, resolved to lend it £200,000, and thus began the alliance between the Bank and the Whig ministries. In 1708, the Bank capital was doubled, and in the same year an important Act was passed forbidding the issue of notes by associations of more than six persons, which checked the formation of joint-stock banks. In 1720 came the second great crisis of the Bank's existence. The South Sea Company then proposed to take over the government debt, consisting of about thirty-two millions, to its capital, receiving in return interest at 4 per cent.; but such was the anxiety entertained by all public companies to have the government for a creditor that the Bank of England contended against the Company for the privilege, but was, fortunately for itself, outbidden. In a few months the bubble burst and the Bank stood secure, though it was compelled by government to pay up two millions out of the £3,500,000 which in a weak moment it had promised to lend its tottering enemy. With the exception of a run on the Bank during the Jacobite rebellion of 1745, which was only averted by payment in sixpences, and a violent attack upon it by the mob during the Lord George Gordon Riots of 1780, there is nothing of especial moment in the history of the Bank of England until 1792, when a violent commercial panic occurred chiefly owing to the reckless use of paper by country banks, some fifty of which failed totally. The Suspension of Cash Payments in 1797 was caused chiefly by the drain of bullion due to the war, subsidies to foreign allies, the exclusive purchase of provisions abroad owing to bad harvests, and the hoarding of coin owing to fear of invasion. A run on the Bank set in from all sides, and on February 25th, when little over a million remained in its cellars, a proclamation was issued forbidding it to issue cash in payment. This was followed by a Bill prohibiting it to pay more than 20s. in cash, or to advance more than £600,000 to government; at the same time the Bill of 1777, which prohibited notes for less than £5, was suspended. This measure, by which Bank of England notes became inconvertible, though intended to be temporary, lasted until 1821, during which period the value of paper varied very considerably. The Resumption of Cash Payments was proposed by Mr. Peel in 1819; the Act was to have come into effect in 1821, but its provisions were adopted by the Bank two years earlier. In 1825 another crisis occurred. During the last six weeks of the year seventy houses failed, and the Bank itself was only saved, it is said, by the discovery of a cluster of 700,000 £1 notes. The measures of the government were prompt; notes for less than £5 were suppressed, and the law of 1708 repealed, banks with any number of partners being permissible beyond sixty-five miles from London, while the Bank in return was allowed to establish branches to be carried on by its agents. The Bank Charter Act of 1833, framed on the occasion of the renewal of the Charter at the instance of Sir R. Peel, Lord John Russell, and others, attempted to stop runs on the Bank by enacting that notes of the Bank of England were to be made legal tender, whereby the country banks would be enabled to meet a panic with notes instead of gold. A deduction of £120,000 a year was to be made in the sum allowed by government to the Bank for the management of the National Debt, while in return a quarter of £14,686,800, the sum due, was paid back. The principle that the paper issued and specie kept in hand should bear to each other the ratio of three to one was established, and the Bank was compelled to publish a general statement of its condition quarterly. In spite of this remedial measure, bullion was continually lacking in London, and in 1839 the Bank of England was in imminent danger of stopping payment, so that Sir R. Peel brought forward the Bank Charter Act of 1844. Its object being to regulate the issue of notes, it enacted that the Bank should not be allowed to issue more than £14,000,000 in notes, unless a corresponding amount of specie were retained. Further, no new banks established after the measure became law were to issue their own notes, and the old banks were not to increase their issue. Sir R. Peel's great Act was the last important piece of legislation affecting the Bank of England.

(3) JOINT-STOCK BANKS were rendered possible by the Act of 1825. They increased largely in numbers after 1836. By Sir R. Peel's Bank Charter Act of 1844 they were allowed to accept bills of any amount or date, and could sue or be sued. Banks other than the Bank of England are regulated by the Companies Act (1862). This Act provides that no association of more than ten persons can carry on a bank unless registered under the Companies Act, that an unlimited company may convert itself into a limited one, that a bank of issue shall, with certain relaxations, though registered as a limited company, have unlimited liability with respect to its notes, and that accounts must be audited and published once a year. There is also the law of 1867, which provided for minute registration with regard to the sale or purchase of shares in a joint-stock banking company.

(4) THE BANK OF SCOTLAND was established by Act of the Scottish Parliament in 1695. Its capital was £100,000 sterling, of which about £10,000 was paid up, and it had the exclusive privilege of banking in Scotland for twenty-one years. Its capital was intact from state loans, and it was also temporarily exempt from public burdens. Nevertheless, the great African Company started a banking branch in rivalry, but they soon abandoned it for the more exciting pursuit of trade. The bank began to issue notes and establish branches in 1696, and in 1704 it issued £1 notes, and still continues to do so. After the union of England with Scotland it undertook the re-coinage, and conducted it with great success. Its capital was increased to £2,000,000 in 1774, and to £2,500,000, its present amount, in 1804, with power, if necessary, to raise it to £3,000,000. It established an office in London in 1867, the restrictions of English joint-stock banks not affecting Scottish. After the monopoly of the Bank of Scotland expired, many unchartered banks started, of which the Royal Bank of Scotland (1727) and the British Linen Company (1746) were the oldest and most successful. The smaller banks, were, however, absorbed in the earlier part of the century into seven or eight large banks with constantly increasing branches still in existence. In 1844 Sir R. Peel's Bank Charter Act allowed the Scottish banks then issuing notes to continue to do so, provided that for every note issued above the average issue of the previous year, a corresponding amount of specie should be kept in stock.

(5) THE BANK OF IRELAND was established in 1783 by charter in pursuance of a request from the Irish Parliament, with the same constitution and privileges as the Bank of England, and a capital of £600,000, increased to £1,000,000 in 1809, and lent to government at 4 per cent. It was prohibited from lending money on mortgage, and this restriction was not repealed until 1860. The restrictions on joint-stock banks as to paper issues caused such an amount of distress in Ireland, that in 1821 government allowed the Bank of Ireland to increase its capital to £3,000,000, while joint-stock banks were to be established beyond fifty miles from Dublin.

Bankruptcy Legislation. In the English Statute Book almost the first recognition of bankrupts as distinguished from fraudulent debtors is the Act 13 Eliz., c. 7, by which the goods of a trader who failed to meet his obligations were to be sold for the benefit of his creditors. By Acts passed in the fourth and tenth years of Queen Anne, bankrupts who had paid a dividend might, with the consent of their creditors, obtain their discharge from the Court of Chancery. Bankruptcy jurisdiction belonged to the Court of Chancery, but by the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 56, proposed and carried by Lord Brougham, a special Court of Bankruptcy was established. It provided that six commissioners and four judges should be appointed to try all cases of bankruptcy. The commissioners could adjudicate only in cases where there was no dispute; if the matter was disputed it was to be referred to a judge. By an Act of 1849 fraudulent bankrupts were rendered more certainly liable to punishment, and composition by arrangement made possible. In 1861 the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts were extended to others besides traders. The most important of the numerous Bankruptcy Acts of the present century is that of 1869, which remodelled the Court, and made important changes in the law. The commissioners were abolished, and there were to be a Chief Judge (usually a Vice Chancellor) and a number of registrars. The county courts were constituted local bankruptcy courts with an appeal to the Chief Judge. The property was to be placed in the hands of trustees appointed by the creditors instead of official assignees, and there were provisions by which the bankrupt could not obtain his discharge, except with the consent of a majority of the creditors, unless he had paid ten shillings in the pound. The Act also provided for "liquidation by arrangement," with the consent of the creditors; and repealed or consolidated all former enactments on the subject of bankruptcy. In 1883 a new Bankruptcy Act was carried by Mr. Chamberlain. It enacted severe punishments against fraudulent bankrupts, and abolished the system of trustees, substituting for them a staff of official receivers appointed by the Board of Trade. In Scotland bankruptcy was placed on a legal footing by the Act of 1696. There is no separate Bankruptcy Court, but by 7 Will. IV., c. 56, the Sheriffs have jurisdiction as well as the Court of Session. In Ireland, by an Act of the year 1872, the law of bankruptcy was assimilated to that of England. [DEBT.]

Banneret, or Knight-Banneret, was a degree of knighthood superior to that of knight bachelor. Bannerets were privileged to carry the square banner instead of the pointed pennon borne by other knights. The distinction was originally awarded for special bravery on the battle-field, and the ceremony of cutting off the corner of the pennon so as to make it a banner was performed by the king in person standing beneath his own royal banner. Bannerets ranked before all other knights except those of the Garter. The dignity was altogether personal, and was never hereditary. It has been sometimes regarded, but erroneously, as a rank of peerage inferior to a barony. It conferred no right to sit in Parliament. The order gradually died out, and in modern times has become extinct; but a knight-banneret was created by George III. as late as 1797.

The name is, of course, derived from banner; but it was sometimes supposed to be a derivative or diminutive of baron, and the Latin form baronatus occasionally occurs in some writers and old State-papers.

Bannockburn, THE BATTLE OF (June 24, 1314), one of the greatest defeats the English ever suffered, was fought near Stirling, on the attempt of Edward II. to relieve the castle of Stirling, which was being besieged by Robert Bruce. The Scots were far outnumbered by the English troops, who, including a large body of Welsh and Irish auxiliaries, may have numbered nearly 100,000 men. Bruce, however, gained the victory in great part by having previously dug holes in the ground so as to impede the magnificent cavalry of the enemy, and by massing his foot into solid squares and circles—a system of receiving cavalry hitherto unpractised, except at the battles of Falkirk and Courtrai, where it had been signally successful. The belief on the part of the English that the camp followers of the Scottish army formed part of a reserve completed their discomfiture; the rout was thorough, and an immense booty fell into the victors' hands. The Scotch generals, in addition to Bruce, who slew in single combat Henry de Bohun, one of the bravest of the English knights, were Rando'ph, the king's nephew, Edward Bruce, Walter Stewart, and James Douglas; the English were led by Edward II. in person, and the Earls of Pembroke and Gloucester. Edward narrowly escaped being taken prisoner, and had to ride at full speed to Linlithgow, hotly pursued by Douglas; his privy seal fell into the hands of the victors. The result of the battle was a futile meeting of Scotch and English commissioners with a view to bringing about a better understanding between the two countries.

Bantam, in Java, was the site of an English settlement from 1603 to 1683, in which year the English were expelled by the Dutch. The place was again in the possession of the British from 1811 to 1814.

Bantry Bay is a deep inlet on the west of the county of Cork. Here, on May 1st, 1689, Chateau Renard anchored with a French fleet and put on shore a quantity of stores. Admiral Herbert followed him; but an engagement, claimed as a victory by both parties, was all that took place. In Dec., 1796, a large French fleet of seven sail of the line, three frigates, and seventeen transports, sent to aid an Irish rising, anchored here for a week. They did not immediately land their men, owing to the absence of General Hoche, their commander, who had got separated from the squadron; and subsequently a storm arose and drove them back to France. In 1801, the fleet under Admiral Mitchell mutinied here. Twenty-two of the ringleaders in the mutiny were condemned to death at Portsmouth in Jan., 1802, but only eleven were executed.

Baptists, THE, are a sect of Protestant Nonconformists who hold that the baptism of infants is invalid. On the Continent, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, a body of men with similar views were known to their opponents as the Anabaptists, or re-baptisers. They spread over Switzerland, Germany, and the Netherlands, but, in consequence of the violence of their religious and social doctrines, were forcibly suppressed (about 1535) by the governments of those countries. Some of the Dutch Anabaptists fled to England, and were put to death by Henry VIII.; but the true sect never existed here in large numbers, and the name was vaguely applied to all who insisted on adult baptism. The Anabaptists or Baptists suffered for their faith under the Tudors, by whom their secret conventicles were forbidden. The last of them who was burnt alive was Weightman, in 1612. During the next few years their views were, in part, adopted by the Brownists or Independents, and it is difficult to draw a distinction between the two sects. In 1633 the Peculiar or Calvinistic Baptists separated from the Independents, and founded a church of their own, and in 1644 the London Baptist Churches published a Confession of Faith. The story of their persecution after the Restoration, and of the gradual removal of their religious disabilities after the Revolution, does not differ from that of other dissenting churches. During the seventeenth century the differences between the Peculiar and General Baptists, principally on the doctrine of the Redemption, became wider, and in 1770 the latter body became separated into the General Baptists' New and Old Connexion. The Scotch Baptists appear to have become a recognised body about 1760. As each church is complete in itself and the form of government is congregational, considerable differences of opinion prevail among the Baptists on minor points. As a rule, neighbouring churches unite into associations, and the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland connects them all together. The Baptists have displayed much energy in mission-work, chiefly in India and the East.

Baratariana was the title of some letters written in the Dublin journals by Henry Flood and his followers in 1767. Barataria was Ireland, and Townshend was Sancho; the members of his council were the officers of Sancho's household. These letters created much sensation on account of their wit and boldness.

Barbados, one of the Windward Islands, is supposed to have been discovered by the Portuguese about 1518; it was first colonised by an English expedition under Sir Oliver Leigh, 1605, and in 1624 was granted by James I. to Lord Ley, who sent out a number of colonists. Shortly afterwards the whole of the Caribbean Islands was made over to Lord Carlisle, and a long dispute ensued as to the ownership of Barbados; the quarrel lasted for some years, and frequent collisions between the two parties took place in the island. In 1647 Lord Carlisle granted a lease of the island for twenty-one years to Lord Willoughby, who fortified the island for the king, and in 1651 defeated a large Parliamentary force which had been sent out from England under Admiral Ayscue. The Barbadians, however, were shortly afterwards compelled to capitulate, though many of the leading men subsequently received from Charles II. substantial rewards for their loyalty. In 1663 the sovereignty of Barbados became vested in the crown, and the proprietary government was dissolved; in 1675 and 1692 slave insurrections broke out, but were speedily suppressed. In the next century, especially during the administration of Lord Howe (1733—36), the condition of the Barbadians was much improved, both socially and politically, though property in the island was almost entirely destroyed by a severe hurricane in 1780. The condition of the slaves in Barbados was almost as bad as in Jamaica, and in 1826 there was an insurrection, which was, however, soon quelled; the slaves were emancipated in 1834, and the apprentice system done away with in 1838. On the assumption of the sovereignty of the island by the crown in 1663, a tax of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was imposed on all native produce exported. This tax proved a great burden upon the planters, and was abolished in 1838. The governor of Barbados is governor-in-chief of the Windward Islands; the administration is representative, and is vested in a legislative and executive council nominated by the governor, and a house of assembly of twenty-four members elected by the freeholders. It is owing to the opposition of the Barbadians that it has hitherto been found impracticable to form a federation of the Windward Islands, as has been done in the Leeward Islands. Barbados was divided into parishes as early as 1629.

Barbour, JOHN (d. 1395), was the author of the great national Scottish epic, The Bruce. Of his life little is known. He was probably born about the year 1316; studied at Oxford, and became Archdeacon of Aberdeen, Clerk of the King's household, and one of the Auditors of the Exchequer in Scotland. The Bruce extends from the death of Alexander III. to the death of King Robert. It is a noble epic, full of spirit and vigour, and true chivalrous feeling; and is, moreover, highly interesting historically, as being almost the only Scottish authority for this period. Barbour also wrote a book of Legends of the Saints, and The Brute, dealing with the story of Brutus.

The earliest edition of The Bruce was printed at Edinburgh in 1570. The poem has been carefully edited by Mr. Innes for the Spalding Club (1866); and by Mr. Skeat for the Early-English Text Society (1875).

Barbuda, one of the Leeward Islands, and celebrated for the salubrity of its climate, is the property of the Codrington family, who have held it under lease from the crown since 1684.

Barcelona, the chief town of Catalonia, played an important part in the Spanish Succession War. In 1704 an attempt was made upon it by Sir George Rooke, who landed the Prince of Darmstadt with some marines, relying upon co-operation within the city. The design, however, was betrayed by some of the conspirators, and the prince hastily re-embarked. In 1705 the allies, under the Prince of Darmstadt and the Earl of Peterborough, appeared before the town. The fortifications were ancient, but they had been repaired and strengthened, and the natural advantages of the town and the strong castle of Montjuich were very great. The besieging force was weak, and the Spanish auxiliaries showed little disposition or capacity for regular siege operations. After a fortnight the troops prepared to embark; but Peterborough suddenly announced his intention of attacking Montjuich. Ascending the hill at dawn with 1,400 men, he surprised the garrison and captured the fortress. The castle of Barcelona, now exposed to a fire from the hill, soon surrendered, and on Oct. 3rd the town capitulated. The Archduke Charles was besieged in Barcelona in 1706, by a fleet under the Count of Toulouse, and an army of 20,000 men under Marshal Tessé. Sir John Leake, with thirty ships, came to the relief of the town, but hesitated to attack the French fleet till Peterborough, who had put off in an open boat, arrived on board his ship with instructions to supersede him. The French army retired, and the fleet followed its example. After the Peace of Utrecht the Catalans refused to surrender Barcelona to Philip of Anjou; but the place was captured by the Duke of Berwick in Sept., 1714. In the Peninsular War, Barcelona was occupied by the French, Feb. 13, 1808. In March, 1809, an attempt on it was made by Lord Collingwood, in conjunction with the Catalan levies and Somatenes; but the French continued to hold it till the end of the war.

Barclay, WILLIAM (b. 1641, d. 1605), a Scotchman by birth, after serving many years in France, came to England in 1603, and was well received by James I. He had quarrelled with the Jesuits, and, though still remaining a Roman Catholic, was strongly opposed to the temporal power of the Pope. He had also written a work in favour of extreme views of royal authority, which recommended him to James I. His Catholicism, however, prevented his preferment, and after spending two years in England he returned to France just before his death. His controversy with Bellarmine respecting the Papal power earned him considerable fame, and his views as to the limits of the Pope's authority were adopted by a large number of English Catholics. In politics he was a vigorous upholder of extreme monarchical principles.

Barclay's chief works are De Regno et Regali Potestate Adversus Buchananum, etc., and De Potestate Papæ, printed together at Hanover, 1617. See Locke, Treatise on Government.

Bardolf, THOMAS, LORD (b. 1367, d. 1408), was one of the nobles who joined Henry of Lancaster in 1399, but he subsequently espoused the cause of the Percies, and joined in the plot to put the Earl of March on the throne. He fled to Scotland in 1405, and in 1408 took up arms in Yorkshire against the king, and was mortally wounded at Bramham Moor.

Barebones' Parliament (July 4th to Dec. 12th, 1653) was the nickname given to the Assembly summoned by Cromwell and the council of officers after the expulsion of the Rump (q.v.). It derived its name from a certain Praise-God Barbon, or Barebones, a leatherseller of Fleet Street, who took a somewhat prominent part as a member of this Assembly. It consisted of 139 persons summoned as representatives—122 for England (including 7 for London), 6 for Wales, 5 for Scotland, and 6 for Ireland—who were chosen by Cromwell and his officers from lists of persons "faithful, fearing God, and hating covetousness," furnished to them by the various churches. Amongst them were Blake, Montague, Monk, Ashley Cooper, and other men of position and influence. They began by electing Cromwell and four other officers to be members of their body. They set to work to reform the administration of the law, relaxed imprisonment for debt, passed a Civil Marriage Act, commenced the codification of the law, and began the process of abolishing the Court of Chancery. They decided to abolish the power of patrons to present to benefices, and the institution of tithes. These resolutions, especially the latter, would have rendered the existence of a State Church impossible, and Cromwell and the country at large were not prepared to go so far. A sudden stroke solved the difficulty. On Dec. 12th Sydenham, one of the members, having mustered his friends before many of the other party had arrived, suddenly proposed, with the concurrence of the Speaker, that the Parliament (which he described as useless and injurious to the Commonwealth) should resign its power into the hands of Cromwell. This motion was at once carried, and those who dissented were expelled by a company of soldiers under Colonel Goffe and Major White. The "sober men" of that meeting, as Cromwell called them, resigned their power into his hands. He accused the other party of an intention "to set up the judicial law of Moses," and to abolish all magistracy and ministry as anti-Christian. Some historians, objecting to the somewhat ludicrous title of Barebones' Parliament, have called this Assembly "The Little Parliament," while others prefer to style it "The Assembly of Nominees." It has been described as an assembly of obscure fanatics, but Whitelocke says that "many of this assembly" were "persons of fortune and knowledge."

Barillon, French ambassador in England (1677—1688), was employed by Louis XIV. to keep Charles II. and James II. in dependence upon France, or, at any rate, inactive in European politics. With this object he fomented the quarrel between the court and the country party, writing to his master in 1687, "It may be held as an indubitable maxim that agreement between the King of England and his Parliament is not for the interest of your Majesty." When early in 1688 the national opposition seemed likely to endanger James's position, it was Barillon who advised the bringing over of Irish troops. Yet he allowed himself to be duped by Sunderland's assurances; and it was for this reason that, after he had been obliged to leave England by William, he was not appointed to attend James in Ireland.

Barking Abbey was one of the oldest and richest nunneries in England. It was said to have been founded by St. Erkenwald, Bishop of London, and after being sacked by the Danes in 870 was restored by Edgar. The revenues of the convent were very large, and the abbess, holding more than thirteen knights' fees and a half, held her lands from the crown as a barony. The nuns were of the Benedictine order, and after 1200 exercised the right of electing their own abbess. The convent was surrendered to Henry VIII. in 1539.

At the Restoration he fled to the Continent, but was betrayed, brought back, and executed at Tyburn.

Barlow, SIR GEORGE, a civil servant of the Bengal establishment, had risen by a meritorious service of twenty-eight years to a seat in Council, under Lord Wellesley. His industry and official experience were great, but he was quite unequal to the responsibilities of empire. On the death of Lord Cornwallis, the government of India was temporarily (1805—1807) in Sir George Barlow's hands. The result of his determined non-intervention policy was the restoration to Scindiah and Holkar of many of the advantages which England had gained by the Mahratta Wars. He was a great opponent of missionary enterprise in India, and caused the Company to assume the whole management of the temple of Juggernaut, including the three hundred dancing girls. In spite of the favour of the Directors, Sir George was not appointed Governor-General, but was nominated Governor of Madras in 1807. His want of tact made him very unpopular in this position, and he was involved in bitter disputes with his subordinates. His obstinacy and violence did much to produce the Madras mutiny, but he displayed much firmness while it lasted. The result of the mutiny was his recall in 1811.

Barnard Castle, in Durham, was occupied by the Royalists under Sir George Bowes during the Northern rebellion of 1569. It was subsequently taken by the rebels under the Earl of Westmoreland in the course of the same episode.

Barnard, SIR JOHN (b. 1685, d. 1764), was an eminent London merchant who became Lord Mayor in 1757. He sat for London from 1722 to 1758. He was a vigorous opponent of Sir Robert Walpole's, and in 1733 attacked that minister's sinking fund and the excise scheme, which he declared "could not, even by malice itself, be represented as worse than it really was." In 1737 he introduced a Bill (which was rejected) to lower the interest of the National Debt by borrowing money at three per cent. to redeem the annuities for which a higher rate was being paid. In 1742 he declined to attend the secret committee appointed to inquire into Walpole's administration. He attempted, but without success, to moderate the outcry raised against Admiral Byng. He was a man of high character, and was much respected by all parties.

Barnet, THE BATTLE OF (1471), was fought between Edward IV. and the Earl of Warwick and the Lancastrians. On March 14th Edward landed at Ravenspur and marched towards London, no attempt being made to check him. Having been welcomed by the citizens of London, Edward, learning that Warwick was posted at Barnet, marched out to meet him, and drew up his army on Hadley Green. The fight commenced at five o'clock in the morning of April 14, which that year was Easter Day. The Lancastrian right wing under Lord Oxford was at first victorious, and drove in Edward's left; but a heavy fog occasioned them to mistake a part of their own army for the Yorkist force; confusion ensued, of which Edward took advantage to retrieve the fortune of the day. After very severe fighting, in which no quarter was given on either side, the Yorkists were completely victorious, and Warwick and his brother Montagu were slain. It is impossible to give any authentic statement of the numbers or the losses on either side.

Baroda Commission, THE (1875). The Guicowar, Mulhar Rao, was in this year accused of attempting to poison the Resident, Colonel Phayre. He was tried by a mixed commission of three English and three natives. The commission failed to come to any satisfactory conclusion, as the English members considered the case proved, while the natives thought the charge had not been substantiated. Lord Northbrook, the Governor-General, however, held the former opinion. The Guicowar was therefore deposed by proclamation of the Viceroy, and his widow allowed to adopt an heir.

Baron. The history of the word baron is one of those cases in which questions hotly disputed may be virtually settled by strict discrimination of the meaning of a name. The word, which originally meant "man" or "freeman," has now come to mean the simplest grade of the peerage. Between these extreme points, it passes through important alterations of meaning. The word first occurs in England after the Norman Conquest. When William the Conqueror's "barons" are spoken of, it is quite clear that this means all who held lands directly of him—that is, of course, if they held by military service. In this large body of chief tenants—some 1,400 in number, including ecclesiastics—there was naturally from the first a tendency to a practical division between the great lord, who had knights holding under him, and the simple knight, who held but his own small estate. But it is unnecessary to say with Madox that this was also a clear legal distinction, "an original difference between tenure by barony and tenure by knight service;" and it would be impossible as yet to find any principle on which to base such a legal distinction. But already, under Henry I., the practical distinction had become accentuated, and it soon came to be the custom that the greater "baron of the king" should treat for payment of his relief and aids directly with the king, instead of paying through the sheriff; that on the rates becoming fixed his relief should be 100 marks, while ordinary chief tenants paid 100s.; similarly, that he should lead his own tenants to the host, while the other served under the sheriff's banner; that he should be amerced by his equals in the King's Court, not by the sheriff; and, most decisive of all, that he was summoned proprio nomine by a special writ, not, like the "lesser barons," by a general writ to the sheriff for each shire. From the biography of Becket and the Dialogus de Scaccario, we see that this last distinction was recognised and customary early in Henry II.'s reign; while in Magna Charta it is claimed and conceded in the Article 14, which deals with the mode of convoking the Great Council; and it is acted on thereafter, even though this article was dropped in the later re-issues of the Charter. The greater barons had, in one sense, a qualification by tenure; they would all be holders of a barony, not (that is) a definite number of knights' fees, as was sometimes stated—for some baronies consisted of no more than one or two such—but holders of some group of knights' fees which had at the Conquest been endowed with such a special character, or had since come to be so regarded; and in this sense the word is used in the Constitutions of Clarendon, and as early as Henry I.'s Charter. These leading landowners, with the earls, could not well be left unsummoned. But outside this inner necessary body, the king had a wide circle of holders of baronies out of whom to select those whom he should by his writ call to special attendance in host or in council. And here a further exclusion went on. For throughout the reigns of Henry III. and Edward I., special summonses to the host were sent to more than 100 barons; while to Edward I.'s Parliaments the number so called was hardly half as great. And even so, many of those who were called were not holders of baronies, but of much smaller estates; many, too, were called only occasionally. Here, then, is to be seen Edward's steady design of "eliminating the doctrine of tenure from the region of government." The reluctance of all but the greatest lords to attend co-operated in this direction; and "Edward I. is the creator of the House of Lords almost as truly as of the House of Commons," in the sense that to him was due the smallness of its numbers, the selection (to a great extent) of its members, and the final establishment of the principle that it is constituted by writ of summons, not by tenure. Nor would it be against the desires of the great barons themselves to see the substitution of summons for tenure as the qualification. For mere tenure-in-chief, if accepted, might have flooded the House with the lesser chief tenants, and have brought into it any mere purchaser of a baronial estate. During the same period the "lesser barons" had gradually ceased to attend as barons, and merged into the mass of the country freeholders, whom they inspired with their high spirit and traditions of constitutional resistance, and to whom they acted as leaders in shire moot and in national Parliament. Under the policy of Edward I. and the operation of his statute Quia Emptores, and with the introduction of the new idea—representation for all below baronial rank, whether chief tenants or not—tenure-in-chief lost its constitutional value, and the separation of chief tenants into barons and knights, or nobles and gentry, was accomplished. To complete this, it was only required that the right to receive the special summons should be regarded as hereditary; and this too, as a legal principle, dates from Edward I.'s reign. A further limitation in the sense of the word baron was effected when the crown created barons by letters patent, first in 1387; but the instances are very rare till the close of Henry VII.'s reign. In these patents the right is limited, as a rule, to heirs male, while the older baronies, by writ of summons, could descend through females (so Sir John Oldcastle became Lord Cobham in right of his wife). The mere personal summons, not inheritable, continued under Lancastrian kings, but definitely ceased under the Tudors. The attempt to create a life peerage was disallowed as obsolete in the Wensleydale case, 1856. Since the Earl of Bristol's case in 1626 the receipt of such a writ is an inherited right which cannot be denied. Thus, out of the great mass of "barons" of the Conquest, the leading families were gradually selected (as it were) by the crown. These families have long since disappeared; the crown has supplied their place with a body four times as numerous; but this body has now a right with which the crown can no longer interfere. When the kings of the fourteenth century introduced new grades (duke, marquis, viscount) beside the old baronial body of earls and barons proper, the word baron sank to its narrowest meaning—that which it now bears, a peer who sits by no higher title. The bishops, till the Reformation, sat both in their Old English character and in their new character as barons. But Henry VIII.'s new sees had no baronies attached. The number of abbots who sat had fallen from 100 or more in the thirteenth century to a fixed number of 27 under Edward III.; those who could claim that they did not owe the service of a whole barony were glad to be excused. At the Reformation, when the abbots were excluded, the balance of numbers, for the first time, was left with the lay lords.

The political history of the baronage may be briefly summed up in three periods:—(1) The feudal baronage, whose policy was the weakening of the central power, and whose alliances and habits were those of Normans, was nearly eliminated by forfeiture before Magna Charta. The last great baron of this type may be found in Ranulf, Earl of Chester, who died in 1232. The dispersed character of their estates, the vigorous resistance of the Old English spirit, the strong arm of the Norman king, made this feudal class less formidable than it proved on the Continent. (2) On its ruins had been rising the new families of the ministers rewarded by Henry I. and Henry II., out of which was formed the national baronage which took the lead in winning the Charter, which defeated Henry III.'s plan of personal government, and which finally secured from Edward I. the results of a struggle of a century. Their typical representative is Richard, Earl Marshal in Henry III.'s reign. (3) As the great feuds began to fall in to the crown, and as the constitutional leadership passed on to the knights, the baronage turns from national aims to dynastic partisanship, family aggrandisement, and the ostentation of chivalry. The people are still only too ready to believe in and to accept them as champions. But they become more and more a narrow class, bound up with one or other of the two royal houses; and they are left alone at last to fight out the Wars of the Roses by the aid of their own retainers, and to be almost exterminated in the struggle. Yet when they were gone, and the Church was powerless in its anti-national Romanism, the nation was helpless at the feet of the new despotism. For England still required its nobles, and in their worst phases they had played a necessary part on the political stage. Even the selfish factiousness of the fourteenth and fifteenth century nobility had been obliged to adopt national grievances for its faction cries; the traditions of noble leadership had been found still to have invaluable strength for the purposes of the Hundred Years' War; and for the rest, the nobles, busy with place-hunting and court intrigues, left space for the silent growth of literature, of commerce, and of municipal life.

The great barons may be roughly reckoned at 400 in Domesday, nearly half of whom held estates in two or more counties. The number of lesser barons was rather smaller. By the thirteenth century both classes have decreased in numbers, but the former have increased the average size of their estates. By the end of the next century the baronial body has sunk to something less than 100 families, still holding, however, a vast proportion of the land of England. Soon after, the two representative estates of clergy and the Commons had risen up to share with them the functions of legislation. The baronial body retained separate and independent privileges. They constituted a great part of the standing council, which took upon itself the administration when the king was a minor. They held with the king the supreme judicial power, both original and appellate. They could be judged only by their brother peers. Till nearly the Yorkist period they were called to give counsel and consent for legislation, while the Commons only had the right of petition. For general administration they were called to "treat and give counsel;" the Commons only "to execute and consent."

Baronets were first created by James I. in 1611, when, being in want of money for the support of the army in Ulster, he offered the title of baronet to all "who would pay into the Exchequer £1,080, in three annual payments, being the sum required for the pay of a hundred foot soldiers for three years." In Ireland baronets were instituted in 1620, and in Scotland by Charles I. in 1625, and called baronets of Nova Scotia, because it was originally intended to establish them for the encouragement of the settling of Nova Scotia. The principle of this dignity was to give rank, precedence, and title without privilege. A baronet was to remain a commoner, but his title (unlike that of a knight) was to be hereditary. Since the time of Charles II. it has been usual to remit the payment due to the crown on creation of a baronetcy. It was intended that the number of baronets should be limited to 200, but the number was exceeded even before the death of James I.

Barons' War, THE. The first distinct appeal to arms of this war was made in 1263 by Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester. Five years before, the incurable misrule of Henry III. had provoked the more public-spirited of his barons to place him under the control of a commission of reform, and then of a council; from this control he had now been for three years struggling to free himself, but with little success. The situation grew daily more distracted; England had two rival governments, the king and the Baronial Council, each claiming obedience, and forbidding what the other commanded. From time to time efforts had been made to arrange the points in dispute, but in vain. Of these points the principal were: the observance by the king of the Provisions of Oxford, the right of holding the royal castles, the power of appointing and removing the state officials and counsellors, and the exclusion of all foreigners from places of trust and profit. Not one of these demands of the barons could Henry be brought to loyally concede. Accordingly, in June, 1263, the smothered disgust of the barons burst into open war. But the campaign had barely begun when Henry's astute brother Richard, King of the Romans, interposed and patched up a kind of reconciliation. Some months of troubled peace followed, which both parties spent in diligent search after the means of getting a lasting peace. In December they agreed to submit their quarrel to Louis IX. of France (St. Louis); and the chief men of both sides swore solemnly to abide by his decision, whatever it might be. At Amiens, in Jan., 1264, St. Louis heard the case that the king in person and the barons laid before him, and gave judgment. This was in favour of the king on every one of the points specified above, though the "liberties, statutes, and laudable customs of the realm of England that were before the time of the Provisions" were left intact. [AMIENS, MISE en.] Notwithstanding their oaths, the earl and his party easily found an excuse that satisfied their consciences for refusing to be bound by this decision. War was now entered upon in earnest; and in March the hostile armies were lying within a few miles of each other—the king's at Oxford, the earl's at Brackley. Here a last attempt at a pacification proved fruitless. Then the combatants parted, the king marching to take Northampton and Nottingham, the barons to add the array of the Londoners to their own, and to lay siege to Rochester. This operation brought on the battle that decided the campaign. For the king, alarmed for Rochester, hurried to its relief, and finding the siege raised on his arrival, went on to the reduction of the Cinque Ports. De Montfort cautiously followed, and on reaching Fletching learned that the royal army was but ten miles off, in and around the town and Cluniac Priory of Lewes. Thither, on May 14, he led his followers, full of religious enthusiasm and patriotic ardour, along the slopes of the bushless downs, and, almost with sunrise, burst in upon the half-prepared Royalists. The fiery onset of Prince Edward routed and made havoc of the earl's left wing, where the Londoners fought, but only rendered the baronial victory more sure. Carried off the field by his fury, Edward left his father and uncle to be crushed by the right and centre of the attacking force. Next day the two kings, Edward himself, and his cousin Henry, were prisoners in the earl's hands. De Montfort was now master of king and kingdom. He strove hard to effect a settlement; called a Parliament of the imperfect type then in use; drew up a new scheme of government; and was diligent in framing measures of reform. At the end of the year he took the step that has made him immortal: he summoned in Henry's name a national assembly that was the first to contain all the elements of a full Parliament, duly chosen citizens and burgesses, as well as knights of the shire, barons, abbots, and bishops. This body began its sittings at London in January, 1266; and did its best to strengthen the position of its creator. But this position was already undermined. The baronial party had split into sections, one of which, under Gilbert, Earl of Gloucester, openly thwarted Earl Simon's designs, and at last broke away from the old leader altogether. The end came swiftly on. While De Montfort was suppressing disturbances in South Wales, Edward escaped from his guards, gathered round him his father's friends and De Montfort's foes, and by rapid marches secured the line of the Severn. Early in August, however, the slow moving earl had forced a passage across this barrier, and, with the king still in his possession, had reached Eveham, hoping to meet his son Simon, who was leading the levies of the south and east to join him. With this object, on Aug. 4, 1265, he was starting from Eveham when he was caught by his active opponent, who had shortly before suddenly fallen upon and destroyed the younger Simon's force at Kenilworth. By wise and well-executed dispositions he now enclosed the old warrior on every side; and after a stubborn contest, the great earl and his bravest followers perished, fighting desperately. Yet the war lingered for two years longer. The harshness of the victors, who pronounced the lands of the rebels forfeit, drove the vanquished to despair. The siege of Kenilworth was prolonged till late in 1266; and at Axholm, in Lincolnshire, another obstinate band of outlaws held out stiffly against the assaults of Edward. At length Axholm was taken; and by this time experience had taught its captor moderation. In the Dictum of Kenilworth he offered milder terms to the defenders of the castle; and it surrendered at last (Dec., 1266). In the meantime others of "the Disinherited" had seized Ely, and one more siege became necessary. This lasted till the summer of 1267, when Edward forced his way into the place, and thus ended the Barons' War. [MONTFORT, SIMON DE.]

Barosa, THE BATTLE OF (March 5, 1811), was fought between the English and Spaniards, and the French, during the Peninsular War. General Graham, who had been blockaded through the winter in Cadiz, learning that Soult had marched to Badajoz, resolved to rid himself of Victor's besieging force. To effect this purpose he embarked 12,000 men, who landed at Tarifa, in the rear of the French. But with an ill-timed modesty Graham gave up the chief command to La Peña, the Spanish general, who systematically neglected his advice. The low ridge of Barosa was the key both to offensive and defensive movements, and Graham was very anxious to hold it; but La Peña ordered him to march through a thick wood to Bermeja, and left the heights of Barosa crowded with baggage and defended only by a wholly inadequate force. Victor no sooner saw Graham's corps enter the wood than he attacked and took Barosa, cutting off a Spanish division which was on its march. Graham, on hearing of Victor's tactics, at once faced about, and, marching back to the plain, without a moment's hesitation resolved to attack, although the key of the field of battle was already in the enemy's possession. He accordingly despatched one body of troops to attack Laval, who was on the flank, while Brown and Dilke attacked the heights. "The English bore strongly onward, and their incessant slaughtering fire forced the French from the hill with the loss of three guns and many brave soldiers." Victor was soon in full retreat, and the British, having been twenty-four hours under arms without food, were too exhausted to pursue. In the meantime La Peña looked idly on, so that the remains of the French army, retreating in the greatest disorder, were allowed to escape.

Barrackpore, an important military station in Lower Bengal, fifteen miles from Calcutta, was the place where, during the First Burmese War (q.v.) the 47th Native Regiment, who were ordered for service, presented a memorial (Oct., 1824), setting forth the extreme difficulty of procuring cattle, and begging to be relieved of the burden of providing means of conveyance. The sepoys were informed that they would receive no assistance. On Nov. 1st the 47th broke out into open mutiny, and refused to fall in at the word. After vainly endeavouring to reason with them, the Commander-in-chief ordered up several European regiments and a detachment of horse artillery. The sepoys were ordered to march at once, or ground arms: on their refusal a volley was discharged on them by the artillery, and the European regiments fell on them. The slaughter was very great. The ringleaders were subsequently tried by court-martial and executed; and others were sentenced to hard labour in irons. It was at Barrackpore that the first mutinous demonstrations took place during the Sepoy rebellion of 1857. In February of that year the native troops quartered at this place refused to bite the ends of their cartridges. On Mar. 29 the 34th Native Infantry mutinied; it was disbanded May 5, the 10th Native Infantry having been previously disbanded Mar. 31.

Barré, ISAAC (b. 1726, d. 1792), in 1746 entered the army, and served in Flanders and Canada. In 1759, he was present, and severely wounded, at the storming of the heights of Abraham. In 1761, Lord Shelburne gave him his vacated seat for Chipping Wycombe to Barré. Two days after taking his seat, he made a most violent attack on Pitt. He strongly supported Bute's government in the debates on the Peace of Paris in 1762, and was rewarded for his services by being appointed Adjutant-General to the British Forces, and soon afterwards Governor of Stirling Castle. But on the retirement of Lord Shelburne from the Board of Trade, Barré voted in opposition to the Grenville ministry in reference to the prosecution of Wilkes for libel, and was summarily dismissed from his military appointments and reduced to half-pay in Dec., 1763. He continued strenuously to oppose the ministry in their action with regard to Wilkes and general warrants, and his ability as a debater became more and more conspicuous. On the introduction of the Stamp Act in 1765, he was one of the "two or three gentlemen who spoke against the Act, and that with great reserve and remarkable temper." He was a firm supporter of the policy of the Rockingham government, and on Pitt's taking office in 1766 he received a minor appointment. But in Oct., 1768, he retired with Lord Shelburne, on account of differences with the Duke of Grafton, whom he forthwith attacked in Parliament. During the long period of Lord North's administration Barré was out of office, and was especially active in advocating the cause of the revolted colonies in America, and the right of Wilkes to his seat. In the second Rockingham administration in 1782, Barré was appointed Treasurer of the Navy; but while Burke was proposing his Economical Reforms, and before the contemplated enactments could have come to his knowledge, Barré accepted an enormous pension of £3,200 a year, which, however, he was subsequently induced to resign in return for the clerkship of the Pells. It has been attempted to identify Barré with the author of the Letters of Junius; but the assertion rests on no sufficient evidence. The closing days of Barré, like those of his old adversary, Lord North, were darkened by blindness.

Barrier Treaty, THE (1715). The project of giving the States-General a "barrier" against France by means of a line of fortresses along the frontier had been raised in the Grand Alliance negotiations of 1701, and again in 1703, but was defeated by the hostility of Austria. In 1709, however, a treaty was concluded between England and Holland, by which the former bound herself to obtain for the Dutch the right of supplying garrisons for the Flemish fortresses, including Ypres, Menin, Lille, Tournai, Condé, Valenciennes, Charleroi, Namur, Damm, and Dendermonde. The treaty was signed by Townshend on the part of England, as Marlborough refused to be a party to it. The arrangements were revised and considerably altered, much to the disadvantage of the Dutch, by a second agreement which was come to in 1713, in which the number of barrier fortresses was greatly curtailed. The treaty was, however, not definitively signed till Nov. 15, 1715. The chief provisions were that the Low Countries were guaranteed to the house of Austria, and were not to be alienated on any conditions whatsoever. The Dutch were to garrison Namur, Tournai, Menin, Furnes, Warneton, Ypres, and Knoque; and Dendermonde was to be garrisoned jointly by Dutch and Austrian troops. The Dutch were very dissatisfied at this curtailment in the number of towns ceded to them, and still more so at the commercial stipulations by which England was put on the same footing with Holland, as regards the commerce of the Belgian towns. But the treaty was altogether a disturbing element in European politics, and an especial source of friction in the relations of England and Austria. It was one of the causes of the alienation of England and Austria previous to the beginning of the Seven Years' War. The Barrier Treaty was annulled by the Treaty of Fontainebleau, 1786. Barrowists, THE, who derived their name from one of their leaders, Henry Barrow, a lawyer, were a sect of Separatists in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, closely allied in their doctrines with the Brownists. Henry Barrow was examined before the Court of High Commission in 1587, for his "schismatical and seditious opinions," and imprisoned, but continued to issue inflammatory pamphlets urging the abolition of episcopacy; he was found guilty of "writing and publishing sundry seditious books and pamphlets tending to the slander of the queen and government, and was executed at Tyburn, April 6, 1593. The Barrowists shared the aversion of the Brownists to legal ministry; and were deemed still more proper subjects for persecution. They refused to hold any communication with the Church on the grounds: First, that the worship of the English Church was idolatrous; second, that unsanctified persons were admitted into the Church; third, that the preachers of the Church of England had no lawful calling; and fourth, that the government was ungodly. For these views many of them were imprisoned, and in 1593, on the passing of the Act making a monthly attendance at church compulsory, a great number of the sect went with the Brownists to Holland, and subsequently founded a new home in America.

Barton, ANDREW (d. 1512), was a contemporary of Sir Andrew Wood, and one of Scotland's first great naval commanders. In 1497, he was in command of the escort which accompanied Perkin Warbeck when he left Scotland. In 1512, after doing considerable damage to the English shipping, he was killed in an engagement with two ships that had been expressly fitted out against him, and had fallen in with him in the Downs. His death was one of the grievances which led to the invasion of England by James V., and the battle of Flodden Field.

Barton, ELIZABETH (d. 1534), better known as the Nun, or Holy Maid of Kent, was the servant of Richard Masters, incumbent of the parish of Aldington in Kent. The awe excited by the moral tone of some of her ravings when under the influence of epilepsy suggested to her master and others the possibility of making her a means of fanning the growing discontent against the king. She was accordingly taught to counterfeit a state of trance, and then to give utterance to prophecies respecting matters declared to be revealed to her by the Holy Ghost. As her words were all in support of the clerical party and against the king's recent legislation, she was regarded with great favour by the clergy generally; she corresponded with Queen Catherine and Charles V., and became in a short time a dangerous power in England. When, however, she boldly declared, among other things, that if Henry divorced Catherine, and married again during her lifetime, he should not be a king a month longer, but die a villain's death, it was thought high time to take particular notice of her madness, and by the king's orders she and her more prominent accomplices were arrested. Having confessed their imposture upon examination in the Star Chamber, Elizabeth Barton and her fellow-conspirators were ordered to read their confession the next Sunday at St. Paul's Cross, immediately after the sermon. The whole matter of the imposture was then brought formally before the Parliament, and Barton and six others were attainted of high treason, and executed May 6, 1534.

Basilicon Doron (The Royal Gift) is the title of a work written by King James I. in 1599, and addressed to his eldest son, Prince Henry. In this work he maintains that the kingly office is ecclesiastical as well as civil, and therefore the king is necessarily head of the Church; and that equality among ministers is inconsistent with monarchy. The tract advocates the establishment of episcopacy, and the banishment of the principal Presbyterian ministers in the country.

The Basilicon Doron was printed at Edinburgh in 1603.

Basing House, the seat of the Marquis of Winchester, was one of the Royalist strongholds in the Civil Wars. Standing as it did a short distance from Basingstoke, it commanded one of the principal roads to the West. It was several times attacked by the Parliamentary forces without success. Finally, after a long and brilliant defence, it was taken by Cromwell, October 16, 1645, and burnt to the ground. "The jubilant Royalists had Bassein, THE TREATY OF (Dec. 31, 1802), was concluded between the English and Bajee Rao, the Peishwa. Basset, PHILIP (d. 1271), was a member of the great judicial family which furnished so many judges and ministers to the Angevin kings. In 1233 he joined in the revolt of Richard Marshall, but quickly returned to his allegiance, and was one of Henry's staunchest supporters against the barons. In 1261 he was appointed Justiciar of England, seemingly in conjunction with Hugh le Despenser, and held the office till 1263. He fought most bravely in the battle of Lewes ("Sir Philip Basset, that brave knight, worst was to overcome," says Robert of Gloucester), but was eventually taken prisoner. The king's victory at Evesham released him, but he was not restored to his office, though constantly employed in the royal service till his death.

Bastwick, JOHN (b. 1593), a physician, published in a work entitled Flagellum Pontificis (1635), attacks which he declared to be directed solely against the Pope and the Roman Catholic clergy, but which were considered by the English bishops to reflect on themselves. For this he was condemned by the High Commission Court to fine and imprisonment. While in prison he wrote two other works, Apologeticus ad Presules Anglicanos (1636), and The New Litany (1637), in which he accused the bishops of an inclination to Popery. For this he was sentenced, in 1637, to a fine of £5,000, the loss of his ears, the pillory, and perpetual imprisonment. In 1640 he was released by the Long Parliament, the proceedings against him cancelled, and £5,000 given him in reparation. Bastwick was alive in 1648, but when he died is uncertain. Clarendon speaks of him as "a half-witted, crack-brained fellow, unknown to either university or the College of Physicians, but one that had spent his time abroad between the schools and the camp, and had gotten a doctorship and Latin."

Clarendon, Hist. of the Rebellion, iii. 58.

Basutoland, the north-eastern province of Cape Colony, with which it was incorporated in 1871, was annexed by Great Britain in 1869. It was placed under the government of Cape Colony, and its local affairs were administered by an agent appointed by the governor at Cape Town and by five magistrates, each presiding over a special district. But the government of the colony found itself constantly in difficulty with the native tribes; and negotiations are now (1884) pending for the resumption of the control of the province by the Colonial Office.

Batavia, THE CAPTURE OF (1811), is chiefly interesting as being the conquest of the last surviving French settlement in the East. In the year 1810 the island of Java had come into the possession of France by the incorporation of the kingdom of Holland with the French empire; and the Indian government was bent upon its reduction. In March, 1811, 10,600 men were sent out under Sir S. Auchmuty, and early in August landed about twelve miles to the east of the town of Batavia. The united French and Dutch troops abandoned Batavia, and took up a position in a very strong camp called Fort Cornelius. On August 8th the outposts were driven in, and the advanced works were occupied by the English. At length it was decided to make a desperate attack on the main fort, as the lateness of the season necessitated speedy action. The attack was delivered from three sides at daybreak on the morning of the 26th. On the right Colonel Gillespie burst in, and pushed the defenders before him until they were met on the other side by the assaulting parties in the centre and left, who, after a stubborn fight, had almost simultaneously overthrown the defenders and burst in. The storming force lost 872 men in killed and wounded. The few troops who escaped from Fort Cornelius, after resisting for a few days, came in; and with them the whole island was surrendered to the British, to be, however, at the close of the war restored to the Dutch.

Bate's Case (1606). The Levant Company, which had been granted by Elizabeth a monopoly of the trade with Turkey and Venice, had allowed non-members to import currants on payment of 5s. 6d. per cwt. Upon the dissolution of the company in 1603, the government continued the imposition. In 1606 a merchant, John Bate, refused to pay, and the case was brought before the Court of Exchequer, which gave judgment for the crown. It was laid down from the bench that the royal power was double,—ordinary, unchangeable without authority of Parliament, and absolute, varying according to the king's wisdom; under the absolute power came all matters of commerce, including customs. Relying upon this decision, Cecil published, in 1608, a Book of Rates imposing fresh duties on many articles. In 1610 the Commons declared that impositions without consent of Parliament were unconstitutional, and petitioned for their removal; from this time the question constantly recurred in the struggle between Parliament and the crown.

Bath, ORDER OF THE, is generally supposed to have been established by Henry IV. at his coronation in 1399. After that it became the practice of English kings to create Knights of the Bath previous to their coronation, and upon other great occasions. But after the coronation of Charles II. the practice fell into abeyance, till the order was revived by George I. in 1725. It was subsequently remodelled by the Prince Regent in 1815, and at present consists of three classes—Knights Grand Cross, or G.C.B.'s; Knights Commanders, or K.C.B.'s; and Companions, or C.B.'s.

Bath, WILLIAM PULTENEY, EARL OF (b. 1682, d. 1764), was of good family and inherited a large fortune. He entered the House of Commons (1705) and distinguished himself on the Whig side during the last years of Anne's reign, having contracted a close friendship with Walpole. He defended his friend when he was sent to the Tower on the charge of corruption. [WALPOLE.] On the accession of George I., Pulteney became one of the Secretaries of State. In the political language of the day he, Stanhope, and Walpole were known as the three "grand allies." When Walpole's quarrel with Stanhope resulted in his retirement from office, Pulteney followed his patron (1717). When Walpole became supreme in 1721, Pulteney naturally expected a position in the Cabinet. Instead, a peerage was offered him. In disgust he, after some hesitation, joined the Opposition (1725), and in conjunction with Bolingbroke brought out the Craftsman, a journal in which Walpole was bitterly attacked. In 1728 he conducted a vigorous assault on Walpole's sinking fund, but without much success; but his speech against Walpole's excise scheme was more successful, and the minister was obliged to withdraw the obnoxious measure.

Pulteney's name had previously been struck off the list of privy councillors. He supported the Prince of Wales in opposition to the king and Walpole. In 1740 he was one of those who seceded from the House—an unwise step which he attempted in vain to excuse. In 1741 he conducted that last grand attack on Walpole's foreign policy which drove him from office. Pulteney, however, declined to form a ministry, and retired into the Upper House as Lord Bath. He gradually sank into insignificance, and his popularity waned. In 1743 his friends succeeded in persuading him to come forward as candidate for the premiership in opposition to Pelham; he failed, however, although supported by the splendid talents of Carteret. In 1746, he and Granville (Carteret) were commissioned by the king to form a ministry. This, the "Forty hours' Ministry," was an egregious failure, and the Pelhams returned to power. Long before his death Pulteney had become altogether forgotten by the political world. His talents were considerable, and his public life was on the whole respectable, and marked by uprightness and integrity; but he was somewhat wanting in steadfastness of purpose and discretion. His parliamentary eloquence appears to have been of a very high order. Besides some poems which were highly praised by Pope, Pulteney was the author of several vigorous political pamphlets.

Bathurst, ALLEN, 1ST EARL (b. 1684, d. 1775), entered Trinity College, Oxford, in 1699. He was returned for the borough of Cirencester in 1706, and was created a baron in 1711. In 1723, at the attainder of Atterbury, he bitterly taunted the bishops for their animosity against their brother. As a Tory politician, he supported the claim of Bolingbroke to be restored to his seat in the House of Lords. During Walpole's administration he was an active member of the opposition. From 1757 to 1760 he was Treasurer to George, Prince of Wales, and in 1762 was created Earl Bathurst. A somewhat acrimonious politician, his speeches were marked by their caustic wit and brilliancy of metaphor.

Bathurst, HENRY, 2ND EARL (b. 1714, d. 1794), the son of Allen, first earl, entered Parliament for Cirencester in 1736. He was a steady opponent of Sir Robert Walpole, and in 1745 was made Solicitor-General to the Prince of Wales by the Leicester House party. On the death of the prince, he took steps to conciliate the court, and was rewarded in 1754 by a puisne judgeship. On the death of Charles Yorke in 1770, he was appointed one of the three Commissioners to hold the Great Seal. "No one of the three," says Lord Campbell, "had any confidence in himself or in his colleagues. And after the learned trio had gone on for a twelve-month floundering and blundering, the public dissatisfaction was so loud that some change was considered necessary." The change made was the appointment of Lord Bathurst to the Woolsack. Left to himself, he got on better than he had done with his two colleagues, and relied with such modesty on the help of better men that he made few mistakes. In 1778 he resigned the Great Seal into the hands of Lord Thurlow, and became President of the Council, which office he held till Lord North's resignation. His last years he spent in retirement in the country. He has been justly called "one of the weakest, though one of the worthiest of our Chancellors."

Campbell, Lives of the Chancellors; Foss, Judges of England.

Bathurst, HENRY, 3RD EARL (b. 1762, d. 1834), was the son of the second Earl Bathurst. In 1804 he was appointed Master Worker of the Mint. In 1807 he became President of the Board of Trade. In 1809 he was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, which he held only from Oct. 11 to Dec. 6. On June 11, 1812, he was appointed Secretary of State for the Colonies, and discharged the duties of the office for nearly sixteen years. In 1828 he was appointed President of the Council, which office he retained till the resignation of the Wellington administration in 1831.

Bats, THE PARLIAMENT OF (1426), was the name given to the Parliament which assembled in this year when the quarrel between the Duke of Gloucester and Cardinal Beaufort was at its height. It received its name from the bats or bludgeons carried by the hostile and excited partisans of the rival statesmen.

Battle Abbey was founded by William the Conqueror on the site of the battle of Hastings, the high altar standing, it is said, on the very spot where Harold planted his banner. It was not consecrated till 1094. The abbey, which was dedicated to St. Martin, and filled with Benedictine monks from Marmoutier in Normandy, was richly endowed by the Conqueror, and enjoyed many privileges, including that of sanctuary. The abbot was mitred and was a peer of Parliament. At the dissolution of the monasteries in Henry VIII.'s reign, the income of the abbey was estimated at £880 14s. 7½d. The buildings of the abbey, which are partly in ruins, and have been partly converted into a dwelling-house, show that the structure must anciently have been of great extent and magnificence. The ROLL OF BATTLE ABBEY, which was lodged in the keeping of the abbot, contained a list of all those who fought on the Norman side in the battle of Hastings. The catalogue was, however, much tampered with by the monks in later times, and is of comparatively little value as an authority. A remnant of the exceptional position of Battle Abbey is to be found in the fact that the incumbent of the parish is still included among the Deans of Peculiars, though he does not appear to have any special duties.

Baxter, RICHARD (b. 1615, d. 1691), a celebrated Nonconformist divine, was in earlier life a clergyman of the Church of England, and in 1640 was presented to the living of Kidderminster. During the Civil War he was chaplain to Whalley's regiment, and in this capacity was present at the sieges of Bridgewater, Exeter, Bristol, and Worcester. He was a very moderate supporter of the Presbyterian church polity, and in temporal matters an adherent of limited monarchy; so that he was a strong opponent of Cromwell during the later years of the Protector's life. At the Restoration Baxter was appointed one of the royal chaplains, and took a leading part in the Savoy conference. He was even offered the bishopric of Hereford, which he refused. In 1662, however, on the passing of the Act of Uniformity, Baxter quitted the Church and remained for some years in retirement. In 1672 he settled in London, and lectured at several Dissenting places of worship. Subsequently, however, he was much harassed by legal proceedings under the Conventicle Act, and in 1685 was brought before Jeffreys, who, treating him with his usual brutality, sentenced him to eighteen months' imprisonment, and fined him 500 marks. Baxter was an extraordinarily prolific writer of polemics and works on divinity, and is said to have composed over 160 treatises. Some of them, e.g., The Saints' Everlasting Rest, and Reasons for the Christian Religion, are still widely popular.

Bayeux Tapestry, THE, was in all probability the idea, and possibly, in great measure, the handiwork, of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror. It is a long narrow strip of tapestry or needle-work representing, in a number of pictures worked in woollen thread, the battle of Hastings and the events which led to it. It is twenty inches wide and two hundred and fourteen feet long; and is divided into seventy-two compartments, with Latin superscriptions indicating the objects represented. The Tapestry is an authority of the utmost value for the period with which it deals. It was presented by Matilda to the cathedral of Bayeux, of which see her brother-in-law Odo was bishop, and it is to

The Bayeux Tapestry has been reproduced in engravings by Stothard, folio, 1747, and in photographs by J. Comte, 4to, 1879. It has also been engraved by the Antiquarian Society, with elucidations by G. C. Bruce, 1855. For an exhaustive and valuable discussion of the character, origin, &c., of the Tapestry, see Freeman, Norman Conquest, iii. 583 seq.

Beachy Head, THE BATTLE OF (June 30, 1690), fought during the war of the Austrian Succession between the English and Dutch on the one side and the French on the other, terminated in a victory for the latter. Lord Torrington, who commanded the combined English and Dutch fleet, had abandoned the Isle of Wight to the French, under Tourville, and retreated up the Channel, when peremptory orders from the Privy Council to engage the enemy were sent him. Accordingly, when the enemy were sighted, he bore down upon them, placing the Dutch ships in the van. He had less than sixty sail of the line, and the French had eighty. But his ships were superior in equipment and crews to those of the enemy. The Dutch, under Everteen, fought bravely for several hours, receiving very little assistance from the rest of the fleet, and they finally drew off in a shattered condition. Torrington thereupon sought refuge in the Thames. His conduct and motives on this occasion were loudly condemned, and the action was looked upon as a highly disgraceful one for England. The only use Tourville made of his victory was to burn Teignmouth. [TORRINGTON, VISCOUNT.]

Beacons, or signal-fires on the coast and on conspicuous positions in the inland country, intended to give notice of the approach of an enemy or of other danger, have been used from an early period in England. According to Stow, beacons were set up by Edward II. when the landing of Mortimer and Queen Isabella was expected. They were regularly used at stated places along the line of the Borders, to give warning of raids of the Scots. Lord Coke says that regular beacons, "pitch-boxes as they now be," were established only after the reign of Edward III. Inland beacons were erected by the sheriffs at the expense of the country; beacons on the coast were originally under the superintendence of the Lord High Admiral, and subsequently, by 8 Eliz., chap. 13, transferred to the corporation of Trinity House.

Beaconsfield, BENJAMIN DISRAELI, EARL OF (b. 1805, d. 1881), was the eldest son of Isaac Disraeli, the author of the Curiosities of Literature. He was first destined for the law, but he soon turned to literature. In 1827 he published his first novel, Vivian Grey, and subsequently travelled on the Continent and in the East for some years. In the year 1832 he appeared as the Radical candidate for High Wycombe. His opinions were gradually changing, and in 1836 he published a series called The Letters of Runnymede, which was a violent attack on the Liberal party. In 1837 he was returned as Conservative member for Maidstone. His first speech in the House was a conspicuous failure; it concluded with the well-known words: "I have begun several times many things, and I have often succeeded at last. I shall sit down now; but the time will come when you will hear me." During the first years of his parliamentary career he was a supporter of Sir Robert Peel; but when Peel pledged himself to abolish the Corn Laws in 1845 Mr. Disraeli turned towards the Protectionists, and at once became their leader. In December, 1852, Lord John Russell resigned, and Lord Derby entered office with Mr. Disraeli as Chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1858 he returned to office and brought in a Reform Bill, which, however, did not meet with much support. The Liberals again returned to office, and for ten years longer Mr. Disraeli led the opposition, and severely criticised Lord Palmerston's foreign policy. In 1867 the Liberals once more resigned, and Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli came into power. They immediately brought in and carried a Reform Bill on the basis of household suffrage, which was carried after a violent and bitter struggle. In Feb., 1868, Lord Derby retired and Mr. Disraeli became Prime Minister. His tenure of office was, however, very short. Mr. Gladstone carried his Irish Church Resolutions against the government, and in the general election which followed the Conservatives were completely beaten. Mr. Disraeli declined to take office in 1872, but in 1874 Mr. Gladstone dissolved, and when a general election returned the Conservatives with a majority of fifty, Mr. Disraeli became Prime Minister, holding office for six years. Several measures of domestic legislation were passed during this period, including a Factory Act (1878), an Artisans' Dwellings Act, and the Agricultural Holdings Act. In March, 1876, public indignation in England was violently excited by the reports of atrocious cruelties practised by the Turks on the Bulgarian Christians; and the support given by the government to the Porte was made the text for vigorous attacks by some of the leading Liberal statesmen. In Aug., 1876, Mr. Disraeli was raised to the peerage by the title of Earl of Beaconsfield. Throughout 1876 and 1877, the Prime Minister, in spite of much opposition in the country, and the withdrawal of two of his own colleagues, Lord Derby and Lord Carnarvon, continued to maintain a guarded and even hostile attitude towards Russia; and when the Russians seemed about to enter Constantinople, the British fleet was ordered to the Dardanelles, and an Indian contingent was brought to Malta. When a treaty was concluded between the belligerents at San Stefano, Lord Beaconsfield insisted that the document should be submitted to the great powers. A general congress at Berlin followed, which Lord Beaconsfield himself attended as one of the representatives of England, and in the summer of 1878 the Eastern Question was temporarily set at rest by the Treaty of Berlin. In the general election of 1880 the Liberals were returned by an enormous majority, and Lord Beaconsfield resigned. In the winter of 1881 he was prostrated by a complication of maladies, and succumbed, after a severe struggle, on April 19th. He was buried at Hughenden, in Buckinghamshire, and a memorial was voted to him in Westminster Abbey by Parliament. Lord Beaconsfield was the author of a poem, The Revolutionary Epic, a Life of Lord George Bentinck, several political pamphlets, and a number of novels, in which many of his ideas and theories on politics may be traced. The best known of these brilliant political romances are Sybil, Coningsby, Tancred, and Endymion, which last was published within a few months of the writer's death.

Beadle, or BEDELL (Old-Eng. bydel, from Anglo-Saxon, beodan, to bid), properly means the apparitor of a court who summoned persons to appear in answer to charges brought against them. Bedells seem before the Conquest to have occupied a position on the jurisdictions of the liberties, and lands held in sac and soc, corresponding to that of under-bailiff. The estate of Leominster had, according to Domesday Book, eight propositi, or reeves, and eight bedelli. Their privileges were, to have a little land of their own, and to be exempt from manual labour. The king's bedells were personages of considerable importance, and are mentioned in the lists of tenants-in-chief in Bedfordshire. After the Conquest the office sank in importance, and the bedells appear as criers in the manor courts, and in Shakespeare's time as petty village functionaries; in the forest courts they made proclamations and executed processes; while rural deans employed bedells to cite clergy to visitations, whence came the present parochial beadles. At Oxford University there is one esquire bedell and three yeomen bedells, each attached to the faculties of law, medicine, and arts; they are elected in convocation, and can be forced, if necessary, to resign at the end of the year. Their duty consists chiefly in bearing the maces before the Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor. At Cambridge, where there are three esquire bedells and one yeoman bedell, they are supposed to attend professors as well.

Beaton, DAVID, CARDINAL (b. 1494, d. 1546), the son of James Beaton, of Balfour, was educated at the University of Paris, where he became intimate with the Duke of Albany, and in 1519 was appointed ambassador from Scotland to the French Court. He was employed in various negotiations at Paris and Rome, in which he acquitted himself so well that he was made a cardinal by Paul III. in 1538. On the death of his uncle, Archbishop James Beaton, in 1539, he succeeded him as Archbishop of St. Andrews, in which capacity he showed much zeal in the persecution of the Protestants. Three years later, on the death of James V., he endeavoured to get possession of the infant Queen of Scots, and to obtain the regency by means of a forged will, but failed, and was for a time imprisoned. On his release he became Chancellor of Scotland in 1546, and distinguished himself by his zeal in bringing to the stake those Protestants on whom he could lay hands. His cruelty towards the members of the Reformed party, together with his French and Italian sympathies, caused the cardinal to be bitterly hated by the Reformers. A plot (to which Henry VIII. and the English Privy Council were probably parties) was concocted for his assassination. On May 29, 1546, his castle of St. Andrews was seized by Norman Leslie, the Master of Rothes, with Kirkcaldy of Grange, and others, and he was murdered. His character is thus stated in the Iconographia Scotica:—"The cardinal was by nature of immoderate ambition; by long experience he had acquired address and refinement, and insolence grew upon him from continual success. His high station in the Church placed him in the way of great employments; his abilities were equal to the greatest of these, nor did he reckon any of them to be above his merit. . . . He was one of the worst of men—a proud, cruel, unrelenting, and licentious tyrant."

Beaton, JAMES (d. 1539), was made High Treasurer of Scotland, 1505; in 1509 he was appointed to the archbishopric of Glasgow, and in 1523 was translated to St. Andrews. He took part in the fray of "Cleanse the Causeway" (1520) between the Douglas and Hamilton factions, and subsequently became an object of intense interest to English politicians, who sought to win him over to an English alliance. He is said to have been "very crafty and subtle," and he certainly managed to evade Wolsey's elaborate plans for getting possession of his person. At last, in a rash moment, the archbishop quitted the castle of St. Andrews, and was seized and imprisoned for a short time. He finally became an ally of England and a great friend of Wolsey.

As Chancellor of Scotland, he granted Queen Margaret a divorce from her husband, the Earl of Angus, though she found it necessary to obtain a papal dispensation as well.

Beaton, JAMES, a nephew of Cardinal Beaton, obtained the archbishopric of Glasgow, 1552. He was secretary to Mary Queen of Scots, in whose behalf he pressed on an alliance with Spain, 1565. In later years he became Mary's ambassador in France, where he unsuccessfully attempted to obtain aid for her.

Beauchamp, THE FAMILY OF, was founded in England at the Norman Conquest by Hugh de Bello Campo or Beauchamp. The earldom of Warwick was conveyed to the family by Isabella, sister and heiress of William de Mauduit. She married William de Beauchamp, Baron of Elmsley (d. 1268), the seventh representative of the family from Hugh. Their son William was first Earl of Warwick, and Guy, the second earl, is known to history as "The Black Dog of Arden." Richard, the fifth earl, married the widow of his uncle, Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Worcester, and their son Henry was created Premier Earl of England and Duke of Warwick; but he died without male issue in 1445, so that the dukedom and the male line of this branch of Beauchamps expired. But his other honours passed to his daughter Anne, and on her death at the age of six they reverted to her aunt Anne, who married the great King-maker, Richard Neville, Earl of Salisbury, subsequently created Earl of Warwick. [NEVILLE.] On the death of her daughters, Anne's inheritance was restored to her, and by her transferred to King Henry VII. The present Earl Beauchamp is descended from the second son of William de Beauchamp, Baron of Elmsley, in the female line. The peerage was created in 1815.

Beaufort, THE FAMILY OF, was descended from John of Gaunt and Catherine, widow of Sir Hugh Swynford. He married her in 1396, but all their children were born before this marriage. These children were four in number: John, created Earl of Somerset and Marquis of Dorset; Henry, afterwards Bishop of Winchester and cardinal; Thomas, Chancellor and Duke of Exeter; and Joan, married to Ralph Neville, Earl of Westmoreland. The name of Beaufort which they bore was derived from a castle belonging to the Duke of Lancaster in Anjou. They were all legitimated by a statute passed in 1397, by royal letters patent and a papal decree. The letters patent were confirmed by Henry IV., who, however, introduced a restrictive clause "excepta dignitate regali," which now appears as an interlineation in the patent roll of 20 Richard II. From John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, was descended Margaret, the mother of Henry VII., and thus arose the Tudor claim to the throne. [TUDOR.] Charles Somerset, the illegitimate son of Henry, third Duke of Somerset, was created Earl of Worcester by Henry VIII. The fifth earl, a distinguished partisan of Charles I., was created Marquis of Worcester in 1642. His grandson, the third marquis, was created Duke of Beaufort in 1682.

Beaufort, HENRY, CARDINAL (b. 1377, d. 1447), was the natural son of John of Gaunt by Catherine Swynford. In 1398 he was made Bishop of Lincoln, and in 1406 translated to Winchester. In 1403 he was appointed Chancellor, but resigned the Great Seal on his appointment to Winchester. During the latter part of Henry IV.'s reign, Beaufort sided with the Prince of Wales, and was accused, apparently not altogether without reason, of urging him to compel his father to abdicate in his favour. On Henry V.'s accession he once more received the Great Seal, which he retained till 1417, when he proceeded to Constance to attend the Council which was endeavouring to heal the great schism in the Church. Beaufort exerted his influence to induce the Council to elect a Pope before proceeding with the reformation of the Church. In gratitude for his assistance, the new Pope, Martin V., offered him a cardinal's hat, which, however, the king refused to allow him to accept. On the accession of Henry VI., Beaufort was appointed one of the members of the Council of Regency, and, in 1424, was for the third time invested with the office of Chancellor, which he held till 1426. Throughout the whole of Henry VI.'s minority, Beaufort's great aim was to counteract the dangerous influence of Gloucester, whose selfish schemes both at home and abroad threatened the greatest danger to the State. The first great quarrel between the rivals took place in 1425, when riots occurred in London, and things were such a serious aspect that Bedford had to return from France and effect a reconciliation. In 1426 Beaufort committed the great mistake of his life in accepting the cardinal's hat; it laid him open to suspicion, and caused him to be regarded with distrust by many who had previously sided with him. In 1427 he led a futile crusade against the Hussites in Bohemia, and in 1429 he preached a crusade with the same object in England, got together troops, but took them to the assistance of the English in France instead of to Bohemia. From 1430 to 1434 Beaufort was for the most part abroad, and the next six years of his life were chiefly occupied in labouring for peace with France, Gloucester being the leader of the war party. One result of his efforts was the assembly of the Congress of Arras, which, however, failed to effect anything. In 1440 he attempted to accomplish the same object by the release of the Duke of Orleans, who had been a prisoner since the battle of Agincourt, on the understanding that he should do his best to bring about a treaty. This was one of Beaufort's last public acts; he gradually retired from political life, and employed his last years in the affairs of his diocese. In 1444 he had the satisfaction of seeing a truce made between England and France, and thus his policy was at last successful. He died peacefully very shortly after his great rival, Gloucester, and the legends which make him the murderer of the "Good Duke Humphrey," and paint the agonies of his death-bed, are unsubstantiated by the smallest particle of evidence. He had been for many years, certainly since the death of Bedford, the mainstay of the house of Lancaster. "It must be remembered in favour of Beaufort," says Dr. Stubbs, "that he guided the helm of State during a period in which the English nation tried first the great experiment of self-government with any approach to success; that he was merciful in his political enmities, enlightened in his foreign policy; that he was devotedly faithful and ready to sacrifice his wealth and labour for the king; that from the moment of his death everything began to go wrong, till all was lost."

Beaufort, MARGARET (d. 1509), was the daughter of John Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, and great granddaughter of John of Gaunt by Catherine Swynford. Left by the death of her father in the guardianship of William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, she was married by him to his son John at the early age of nine years. Suffolk, however, was soon afterwards attainted and murdered at sea, and Margaret's marriage with John de la Pole was, as a consequence, pronounced a nullity. In 1455, when barely fifteen years of age, Margaret Beaufort married Edmund Tudor, Earl of Richmond, eldest son of Sir Owen Tudor, a Welsh knight, by Katherine of France, widow of King Henry V. This husband died in 1456, before her son Henry, afterwards Henry VII., was born, and she then, in 1459, married Sir Henry Stafford, a younger son of the Duke of Buckingham. In 1481 Margaret was once more a widow, and in the following year, 1482, she married for the third and last time, her husband being Thomas, second Lord Stanley. By the Yorkist princes Margaret Beaufort appears to have been treated with an unusual degree of leniency, considering the prominent position she occupied among the Lancastrians in virtue of her son. Her wealth, which was great, was simply transferred, by Richard III., from her own direction to that of her husband, Lord Stanley, whose control over its disposal appears to have been merely nominal. She was the foundress of St. John's College, Cambridge, and gave many other benefactions to the two universities, and to many religious houses. The Lady Margaret Beaufort is the reputed author of The Mirroure of Golde to the Soul, adapted from a French translation of the Speculum Aureum Peccatorum, and printed by Wynkin de Worde; and of a translation of the Imitation of Christ attributed to Gerson.

Beaugé, THE BATTLE OF (1421), was fought between the English, under the Duke of Clarence, brother of Henry V., and a combined force of French and Scots, under the Dauphin and the Earl of Buchan. The English were completely routed, and Clarence was slain. The effect of this battle in strengthening the Dauphin's party in France was very great, and Henry had to undertake another expedition to France to restore the prestige of the English.

Beaulieu Abbey, a famous abbey and sanctuary in Hampshire, was founded by King John for Cistercian monks in 1204. There Anne Neville, widow of the King-maker, took refuge after her husband's defeat and death at Barnet in 1471; and to Beaulieu it was that Perkin Warbeck fled in 1497, after the failure of his attempts to seize the crown.

Beaumont, THE FAMILIES OF. (1) Turolf, descendant of one of Rollo's comrades, married the sister of Gunnor, wife of Duke Richard the Fearless of Normandy. From this marriage descended Robert de Bellomonte, or Beaumont, who inherited the county of Meulan, in Normandy, from his mother, and, following the Conqueror into England, obtained there ninety-one manors. In reward for the support he gave to Henry I., he received the earldom of Leicester. His eldest son Waleran succeeded to the county of Meulan; his second son Robert to the English earldom. With the death of the fourth earl, Robert, without issue, 1204, the earldom expired. Simon de Montfort, afterwards leader of the crusade against the Albigenses, having married Amicia, eldest sister of the last earl, received a grant of the earldom from John. (2) Henry de Beaumont, styled in 1307 "consanguineus regis," and possibly a descendant of a natural daughter of Henry I., was summoned to Parliament in 1309 as a baron. His descendant, John Beaumont, sixth baron, was created viscount 1440, being the first of that dignity in England. His son, a partisan of the house of Lancaster, was attainted 1461, and his estates conferred on Lord Hastings. In 1485 he was restored in blood and honour, but on his death without male heir the viscounty became extinct. In 1840 the abeyance of the barony was terminated in favour of Miles Stapleton, a descendant of the last viscount's sister.

Beaumont, HENRY DE (d. 1340), was the son of Louis of Brienne, and grandson of John of Brienne, King of Jerusalem. He was employed by Edward I. in Scotland, and became one of Edward II.'s favourite advisers. In 1311 the Ordainers demanded his banishment, but this does not seem to have been carried out, as we find him subsequently enjoying the royal favour. He deserted Edward in 1326, and joined Isabella and Mortimer, who confirmed him in his possessions, and gave him some of the confiscated lands of the Despensers.

Becket, ST. THOMAS, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY (b. 1118, d. 1170), was the son of Gilbert Becket, a native of Rouen, a merchant, and at one time port-reeve of London. His mother was a native of Caen. Thomas was put to school—first at Merton Priory, and then in London. He was trained in knightly exercises in the household of Richard de L'Aigle at Pevensey, and grew tall and strong. His father lost money, and Thomas became a clerk in the office of Osbern Eightpenny, his kinsman, and there gained a good insight into business. He was introduced into the household of Archbishop Theobald, and took minor orders. As Theobald introduced the teaching of canonical jurisprudence into England, Thomas, who soon became his favourite, devoted himself to that study. He went to Bologna, where Gratian was lecturing, and stayed there a year, and then went to Auxerre. On his return Theobald employed him in some important negotiations. In 1152 he prevailed on Pope Eugenius to forbid the coronation of Eustace, and thus paved the way for the success of Henry of Anjou. The archbishop richly rewarded Becket's services. He was made rector of St. Mary-le-Strand and of Otford in Kent, and prebendary of St. Paul's and Lincoln; in 1154 Archdeacon of Canterbury and Provost of Beverley. When Henry succeeded to the throne he made Thomas his Chancellor. The early years of the reign must have been full of work for the new Chancellor. Thomas was zealous for his master. When Henry levied scutage on Church lands the Chancellor approved the step, while his old patron Theobald opposed it. The scant regard which he had for ecclesiastical pretensions is proved by the part which he took in the suit between the Bishop of Chichester and the Abbot of Battle (Chron. de Bello, pp. 88—104). Much of the time of the Chancellor was taken up with hearing causes, and he visited some counties as an itinerant justice. His style of living was splendid, and many young nobles were educated in his household, among whom was the king's eldest son, Henry. This splendour was remarkably displayed in his embassy to Louis VII., in 1158, to arrange the marriage of the young Henry. In the expedition to Toulouse the next year, he fitted out and maintained a large force at his own expense, and, clad in armour, led his troops in person, and distinguished himself in the field.

In 1161 Henry was anxious to make his Chancellor archbishop. Thomas was unwilling to accept the office, and told the king that it would cost him the royal favour. The next year he was elected by the monks of Christ Church and by the suffragan bishops and clergy of Canterbury. He was ordained priest, and the following day received consecration. From that time the life of Thomas was changed. Till then his sympathies and efforts had been wholly for the king; henceforward they were devoted to the Church. The man remained the same—impulsive, vigorous, obstinate, and sensitive. He was not such as would serve two masters, and soon resigned the Chancellorship. He made some devoted friends, and already had many enemies. Gilbert Foliot, Bishop of London, a strict ecclesiastic, disliked the appointment of one who had led so secular a life, and this feeling was probably shared by many. In reclaiming the property of his see, Thomas made other enemies, and seems to have acted with impolitic violence. In 1163 he attended the Council of Tours, and came back filled with thoughts of the power of the Church. He soon increased the feeling of distrust awakened in the king's mind by the resignation of the Chancellorship, for he excommunicated one of the tenants of the crown, contrary to the rule laid down by the Conqueror. He also opposed a change which the king wished to make with reference to the assessment of a tax, which Dr. Stubbs has thought (Const. Hist., i. 462) to have probably been the Dane-geld, and high words passed between the king and the archbishop. The same year (1163), in a Council at Westminster, Henry proposed his plan of bringing criminal clerks under the jurisdiction of the lay courts. Though this change was necessary for the welfare of the state, it was naturally offensive to churchmen. Thomas was not alone in objecting to it; he was alone in daring to withstand it. Henry complained of the exactions of the ecclesiastical courts, and demanded whether the bishops could agree to the customs of his grandfather. By the advice of the archbishop they answered that they would do so "saving their order." This answer enraged the king, and Thomas was called on to surrender the honours of Eye and Berkhamstead. In Jan., 1164, at a Council at Clarendon, the famous Constitutions were brought forward which purported to be declaratory of the ancient customs of the kingdom. These Constitutions, by bringing the clergy under secular jurisdiction, by their settlement of the election and status of bishops, by taking away the right of free appeal to Rome, and by other provisions, tended to destroy all clerical immunities. Thomas was persuaded to consent to them. After he had done so he repented, withdrew his consent, and begged the Pope to pardon him for his weakness. In October the same year the archbishop was cited to a council at Northampton. He was not summoned personally, as was his right, but through the sheriff of Kent, to answer a plaint made against him by John the Marshal. At this council a violent attack was made upon him, and he was commanded to render an account of his chancellorship, though he had received an acquittance on his resignation. The bishops did not stand by him. Some, like the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of London and Chichester, were his enemies; others were afraid of the king. The archbishop saw that the king was determined to crush him. He fled, took ship, and, landing near Gravelines, found shelter in the Abbey of St. Bertin. Flanders was, however, no safe place of refuge. Louis, glad of an opportunity of embarrassing Henry, welcomed the archbishop to France. Alexander III. was at Sens, having been forced to leave Italy by the Emperor Frederic. His fear of turning Henry wholly to the side of the Emperor made the Pope half-hearted and vacillating in his support of the archbishop, and he commanded him to take no steps against the king for awhile. Henry confiscated the revenues of the see, and banished all the kindred of the archbishop. His violent measures were carried out with great brutality by Ranulf de Broc. Thomas found shelter in the Cistercian Abbey of Pontigny. There he led a life of ascetic severity, and gave himself to the study of the Canon Law, which must have strengthened his resolution to defend the rights of the clergy. In 1166 Alexander was able to return to Rome. Freed from the papal prohibition, the archbishop at Vezelay solemnly excommunicated his most violent enemies, and, with a voice broken with emotion, declared that, unless the king repented, he would excommunicate him also. In return Henry, by threatening the Cistercians, compelled them to cause the archbishop to leave Pontigny. He took shelter at Sens. The Pope was still in danger from Frederic, and disapproved the Vezelay excommunications. In 1167 he thwarted the archbishop by sending legates to Henry, and thus suspending his legative power. The destruction of Frederic's army by pestilence did not enable the Pope to act more firmly, for he was forced to remain in exile. In 1169 a meeting took place between Henry and the archbishop at Montmirail in the presence of Louis. The archbishop refused to submit to the judgment of the two kings, except with the condition "saving the honour of God," and no good was done. The same year another meeting took place at Montmartre, and ended in failure, for Henry refused the archbishop the kiss of peace. Alexander was anxious to end the quarrel. He was annoyed by the violence of the archbishop, and excited his indignation by absolving the Bishops of London and Salisbury whom Thomas had excommunicated. Henry, in 1170, caused his eldest son to be crowned by the Archbishop of York. This was a violation of the rights of Canterbury, and Thomas threatened to lay the kingdom under an interdict, which he now had power from the Pope to pronounce. Louis was enraged with Henry, and formed a combination against him. [HENRY II.] A reconciliation was effected at Freteval, July 21. Even after this the king and the archbishop were on anything but friendly terms. The king complained because Thomas delayed his return to England, for he was anxious to get him out of France. The archbishop complained of the injuries done to his see. Henry still put off the kiss of peace. The archbishop landed in England Dec. 1, and was greeted with delight by the people. A morbid desire for martyrdom had taken hold of his mind. He came back with no intention of living in peace with his enemies; he would withstand them to the end, and lay down his life for the cause of the Church. He sent before him papal letters suspending and excommunicating the bishops who had taken part in the coronation. He went to London to see his former pupil, the young king, and all the city was moved with joy at his coming. Young Henry refused to see him, and bade him return to his see. His enemies, and especially the family of De Broc, annoyed him in every way in their power; and, on Christmas Day, he uttered a violent anathema against them. When the king heard of the excommunication of the bishops he spoke the well-known hasty words of anger against the archbishop. Four of his knights, Hugh de Morville, Reginald FitzUrse, William de Tracy, and Richard Brito, acted on these words. They crossed to England, took with them Ranulf de Broc and a band of men, and murdered the archbishop in his church, Dec. 29, 1170. Archbishop Thomas was canonised 1173, and his festival was appointed for the day of his martyrdom. The impression that the martyrdom made on the popular mind was very deep, and for three centuries after his death his shrine was the favourite place of pilgrimage for Englishmen.

Beckford, ALDERMAN (b. 1708, d. 1770), was an extremely wealthy merchant, owning large estates in the West Indies. Going through the regular steps of municipal dignity, he became an alderman, and was also returned to Parliament for the City of London. Both in Parliament and in the Common Council he was a firm and enthusiastic supporter of Lord Chatham. In 1768 Beckford became Lord Mayor, and in the following year he was re-elected—an almost unprecedented honour. With the City authorities the government was very unpopular, nor had it a fiercer opponent than the Lord Mayor. A petition from the Corporation of London to the king had been treated as unconstitutional and unworthy of an answer. A remonstrance was next sent, to which the king replied with a dignified rebuke. Nevertheless, Beckford, on May 23rd, laid another remonstrance before the king, and, when the king had expressed his annoyance and displeasure, proceeded to argue with him. "The insolence of Beckford," says an eye-witness, "exceeded all his or the City's past exploits." Within a month he was dead of a fever, which common report said was caused by the excitement of his interview with the king. Beckford's enormous wealth descended to his son William, the eccentric author of Vathek.

Bedchamber Question, THE (1839—1841). On the resignation of Lord Melbourne in 1839, Sir Robert Peel was summoned to form a ministry. On his mentioning incidentally to the Queen the changes which he thought it necessary to make in the royal household, he received a letter from her Majesty saying that the removal of the ladies of her bedchamber would be repugnant to her feelings. Finding that Sir Robert would not give way on this point, the Queen summoned Lord Melbourne to her aid. Lord Morpeth's sister and Lady Normanby were the two ladies to whom Peel specially objected. The desire to support the Queen induced the Whig statesmen, in spite of their previous humiliations, to return to their posts. In 1841, on the downfall of the Whig ministry, the question arose again. The Prince Consort, however, arranged that three great Whig ladies should resign the situations which they held in the Household of their own accord. This prudent compromise settled the difficulty, and saved the assertion of Peel's principle.

Bede (BÆDA) (b. 672, d. 735) was born probably at Jarrow, in the territory of the abbey of Wearmouth, founded by Benedict Biscop. By this learned man Bede was educated, and eventually entered the monastery of Jarrow, an offshoot of the Wearmouth foundation. Here Bede spent the remainder of his life, dividing all the time not engrossed by religious teaching between learning and teaching. He was a very prolific author, as is sufficiently proved by the long list of his writings which he appended in his fifty-ninth year to his Ecclesiastical History, and even on his death-bed he was busy with literary labour. His great work is the Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum, on which his fame rests. It is divided into five books. The first twenty-two chapters of the first book form only an introduction, wherein, after a short description of Britain and its ancient inhabitants, we have the history of the country, reaching from Julius Cæsar to the introduction of Christianity among the Angles by Gregory's missionaries. From this point only (chap. 25) begins the independent research of Bede. The Church history of the English is then carried down in this book to the death of Gregory the Great (604). The second book begins with a long obituary of this Pope, so important for the English Church, and ends with the death of Edwin, King of Northumbria (633). The third book reaches to 635. Here begins the fourth book, extending to the death of Cuthbert (687), the famous saint already twice celebrated by Bede himself. The last book (to the year 731) concludes with a survey of the several sees, and of the general state of Britain in that year. Bede's History is our main and, indeed, almost our only authentic source of information for the century and a half that followed the conversion of the English to Christianity, and is therefore a work of much interest and importance, apart from its attractions of style. Besides the Historia Ecclesiastica, which was translated into Anglo-Saxon, it is said, by King Alfred, Bede wrote a very large number of minor works, among which are a Life of St. Cuthbert; a Chronicon, or general summary of history up to the year 729; The Lives of the Abbots of Wearmouth and of Jarrow, and An Epistle to Egbert, Archbishop of York, which gives an interesting account of the state of the Church. All are of considerable historical importance, though they yield in interest to the Ecclesiastical History. The greater number of Bede's compositions—said to have amounted to nearly 150—were probably theological treatises or commentaries on the Scriptures.

The best edition of Bede is that of Dr. Giles, in six vols., Lond., 1843, &c.; and there is a good edition of the Historical Works by Mr. Stevenson (Eng. Hist. Soc.), in two vols., Lond., 1841. An edition of the Hist. Bedæ Anglor. has been published by the Clarendon Press, and there is a translation in Bohn's Antiquarian Library. A scholarly edition of Books iii. and iv. of the History has been published by the Pitt Press, under the editorship of Prof. Mayor and Mr. Lumby, which contains a vast amount of learning and research, and is enriched with a translation of Ebert's account of Bede, from which the main facts stated above have been gathered. [F. S. P.]

Bedford first appears in history in 571, when the Britons were defeated there by the Saxons, under Cuthwulf. The castle underwent many sieges. In 1138 it was taken by King Stephen, and in 1215, during the war between John and the barons, it was captured by Falkes de Breaute, who continued to hold it till 1224, when he took one of the justices prisoner. Thereupon a force was levied against him, and Bedford was besieged. On its capture, the castle was dismantled. During the Great Rebellion Bedford declared for the Parliament, but in 1643 was captured by the Royalists.

Bedford, PEEBAGE OF. In 1415, John, third son of Henry IV., was created Duke of Bedford. In 1549, John Russell, Lord High Steward of England, who had received the lands of the Abbey of Woburn, in Bedfordshire, was created Earl of Bedford. In 1694 William Russell, fifth earl, was created Duke of Bedford.

Bedford, JOHN, DUKE OF (b. 1390, d. 1435), was the third son of Henry IV., and was created Duke of Bedford in 1415. In 1416 he distinguished himself by defeating the French fleet, and in the next year commanded an expedition to Scotland to avenge the "Foul Raid" (q.v.). During Henry V.'s absence in France, Bedford was appointed Lieutenant of England, and on his death-bed Henry constituted him Regent of France. To cement the Burgundian alliance, Bedford, in 1422, married the sister of the Duke of Burgundy, and by the vigour and ability of his administration the English not only succeeded in maintaining their conquests for several years, but even gained ground upon their enemies. In 1424 he won the great victory of Verneuil; but the relief of Orleans interfered with the progress of the English arms, and in revenge for the powerful aid she had given to the enemy, Bedford caused Joan of Arc when she fell into his hands to be burned to death as a witch. In 1432 his wife died, and in the next year he married Jacquetta of Luxemburg, thereby increasing Burgundy's estrangement from the English. In home affairs Bedford was always ready to act as the mediator between Gloucester and Beaufort, and by his influence over the former was able to restrain his reckless and extravagant disposition to a certain degree. The latter years of Bedford's life were embittered by the follies of Gloucester, the successes of the French, and the defection of Burgundy. With him perished all hopes of English supremacy in France, and all chance of retaining even Normandy and Guienne. A brave soldier, a skilful general, a prudent and far-sighted politician, and, taken altogether, a just and merciful governor, Bedford had in him many of the elements of greatness. "He was certainly equal," says Mr. Stevenson, "possibly superior, to Henry the Fifth. But for the treacherous friendship of the Duke of Burgundy, he would probably have overrun France and expelled Charles the Seventh. It is questionable whether the hero of Agincourt would have been able to effect to much as the hero of Verneuil did." His misfortune was that he was the champion of a cause which was radically unjust, and which was destined from the beginning to ultimate failure. The greatest blot on Bedford's memory is his treatment of Joan of Arc, which it is difficult to palliate; it was equally cruel and impolitic. But, if we except this episode, Bedford was seldom guilty either of harshness or impolicy.

Bedford, JOHN RUSSELL, 1ST EARL OF (d. 1555), was a gentleman of Dorsetshire attached to the court of Henry VIII. Russell obtained considerable grants out of the monastery spoils, and thus laid the foundation of the wealth of his family. In 1536 he co-operated energetically with the Duke of Suffolk in repressing the first seeds of discontent in Lincolnshire. Later on in his career Russell again distinguished himself by the complete suppression of the revolutionary outbreak of 1549 in the western counties. Defeating the insurgents in a pitched battle at St. Mary's Clyst, he succeeded in relieving the city of Exeter, which had just previously been hard pressed by the rebel forces; and in entirely destroying their hopes in Cornwall and Devonshire, which were at once placed under martial law. In the Council, Russell, after these events, took part with Warwick against Somerset, and materially contributed to hasten the Protector's fall. For his services on this occasion Russell, who had been made a peer in 1539, was now, in 1550, created, by Northumberland's influence, Earl of Bedford. On the death of Edward VI. Russell thought it prudent to conform to the Catholic mode of worship. He continued accordingly under Mary to enjoy the royal favour, and he was employed by her on several embassies of importance.

Bedford, FRANCIS RUSSELL, 2ND EARL OF (b. 1528, d. 1585), was one of Elizabeth's most trusted counsellors in the early part of her reign. In 1561 he was sent on a special embassy to the Court of France, and three years later to Scotland in conjunction with Sir Thomas Randolph. He subsequently commanded the Northern army at Berwick, and in 1566 was sent to represent Elizabeth at the baptism of James VI. In the course of his negotiations in Scotland he managed to incur the displeasure of the queen, who accused him of taking part with the Scotch lords against Mary, whose marriage with the Duke of Norfolk he subsequently opposed.

Burghley Papers; Froude, Hist. of Eng.

Bedford, FRANCIS RUSSELL, 4TH EARL OF (d. 1641), was the only son of Lord Russell of Thornhaugh, and on the death of his cousin, the third earl, in 1627, succeeded him in the earldom of Bedford. He was one of the chief promoters of the great work of draining the fens called the Great Level, afterwards, in his honour, known as the Bedford Level. In politics he occupied a moderate position. He was a personal friend of Pym, but was desirous of devising a modus vivendi between king and Parliament. He was the head of the Commissioners who negotiated the Treaty of Ripon with the Scots in 1640, and in the early part of the next year, when Charles conceived the idea of forming a ministry from the more moderate of the opposition leaders, he offered Bedford the post of Lord Treasurer and practically that of Prime Minister. This scheme, which seemed to promise success, was frustrated by the sudden death of the Earl of Bedford from small-pox. Clarendon sums up his character thus:—"He was a wise man, and would have proposed and advised moderate courses; but was not incapable, for want of resolution, of being carried into violent ones if his advice was not submitted to; and therefore many who knew him well thought his death not unseasonable, as well to his fame as his fortune."

Bedford, WILLIAM RUSSELL, 1ST DUKE OF (b. 1614, d. 1700), was the son of the fourth Earl of Bedford. He was an opponent of the arbitrary policy of Charles I. and Strafford, and a moderate supporter of the Parliament. When the Civil War broke out he joined the Parliamentary standard with a body of horse, and took part in the battle of Edgehill; but he separated from the Parliament in 1645, and joined the king. He was present at the battle of Newbury, on the Royalist side, and greatly distinguished himself. His estates were confiscated, but he succeeded in making his peace with the Parliament and getting them restored. He took some part in the Restoration, and was a prominent supporter of William of Orange at the Revolution of 1688, after which event (in 1694) he was created Duke of Bedford.

Bedford, JOHN RUSSELL, 4TH DUKE OF (b. 1710, d. 1771), succeeded to the dukedom in 1732. Ten years later he took an active part against Sir Robert Walpole. In 1744 he was appointed a Lord Commissioner of the Admiralty, and a member of the Privy Council. He was soon afterwards appointed First Lord of the Admiralty. In 1748, on the resignation of Lord Chesterfield, he was appointed Secretary of State for the Southern Department, but resigned in 1751, on the dismissal of Lord Sandwich. Five years later he was sent to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant. In that office he did not succeed, and exasperated the Irish by asking for his sister-in-law a pension on the Irish establishment. His principle of government was to silence opposition by donatives: nor did he forget his friends, especially Rigby, in the general distribution of Irish money. In 1761 he resigned on Bute's accession to power. In the following year he went to Paris as plenipotentiary to negotiate for peace. In the Grenville ministry he became President of the Council. He seems to have acted an independent part in the king's closet, and to have insisted as firmly as Grenville himself on the dismissal of Lord Bute, to whom he was now thoroughly opposed. He was in advance of his age in the knowledge of political economy, and incurred the most violent hatred by opposing a Bill to impose duties on foreign silks. In 1765 he was summarily dismissed from office along with Grenville, and, refusing the overtures alike of Lord Chatham and the Duke of Grafton, remained for the rest of his life out of office. But he continued to take an active part in politics, and in 1769 proposed to resuscitate a statute of Henry VIII. in order to dispense with juries in the American Colonies. Walpole calls the duke "a man of inflexible honesty and good-will to his country," but says that "his manner was impetuous." To this unfortunate trait was probably due his almost universal unpopularity. His portrait has been drawn by Junius, exaggerated and distorted by the rancour of personal animosity.

Bedford Level is the name given to a flat district in the east of England, which comprises the Fen country, and includes parts of Cambridgeshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdonshire, Northamptonshire, and Lincolnshire. During the earlier Middle Ages this district was a vast swamp, partly inundated by the sea. Attempts were made to reclaim it in the reigns of Henry VI. and VII., and an Act was passed for this purpose in 1601. In 1634, Francis, Earl of Bedford, and a number of other landowners of the eastern counties, obtained permission from the crown to drain the district on condition of receiving 95,000 acres of the reclaimed lands for themselves. The works, however, owing to disagreement with the crown, and the Civil War, were suspended for some years till 1649, when the undertaking was renewed. In 1664 the company was incorporated by royal charter, and it still exists. The operations of the original projectors have been largely supplemented by drainage works undertaken in more recent times.

Begum, an Indian word for queen, princess, &c., is generally used as the title of wives of a reigning or defunct monarch, or of a woman regnant—e.g., Begum of Bhopal, Begums of Oude.

Behar. [CLIVE, LORD.]

on his Crusade (1271). On his return he took orders, and was made Archdeacon of Durham in the year 1279, and bishop in 1283. In 1290 he was sent by Edward to act in concert with the guardians of Scotland, and with the advice of the Estates as lieutenant for Queen Margaret and her husband; and in 1294 he was employed as ambassador to the Emperor. He accompanied the king in his expedition to Scotland in 1296, commanded a division of cavalry at Falkirk in 1298, and was present at the siege of Caerlaverock in 1300. In the same year he became engaged in a quarrel with the monks who constituted the chapter, which lasted the rest of his life. His first quarrel with Edward was occasioned by his refusal to show his franchises to the royal officers, but this difference was soon compromised, and in 1295 Bek was appointed one of the guardians of the counties beyond the Trent. He obtained the empty but high-sounding title of Patriarch of Jerusalem from Clement V., to which he added the title of "King of the Isle of Man." After he got possession of the island by mortgage, Edward I. compelled him to hold it "as of the king's gift," and deprived him of his palatine rights over Durham; these were, however, restored by Edward II., with whom he was a great favourite, and he enjoyed them till his death in 1310. Bek represented the Baronial party in the Church, which saw in Edward I.'s consolidating and centralising policy the overthrow of its own privileges.

Bekoagnog, THE CONVENTION OF (Oct. 3, 1806), was concluded between Great Britain and Sweden, in order to enable Sweden to join heartily in the European coalition against Napoleon. The terms of the convention were very much the same as those of the Convention of Helsingborg, which had been concluded in the preceding August, and consisted in an arrangement as to the subsidy to be supplied by Great Britain. Sweden agreed to employ 12,000 men in Pomerania, for whom England was to pay at the rate of £12 10s. annually for each man. Pay for five months was to be handed over to Sweden in advance, and £50,000 was to be paid down at once for the purpose of putting Stralsund into an efficient state of defence.

Belaszye, JOHN, LORD (d. 1689), was the second son of Lord Fauconberg, and, like his father, took a prominent part on the Royalist side in the Civil War. He took part in the battles of Edgehill, Newbury, and Naseby, and the sieges of Reading and Bristol, and subsequently was made Governor of York. He was wounded several times, and three times suffered imprisonment in the Tower. He was raised to the peerage in 1644, and at the Restoration was appointed commander of the force in Africa and governor of Tangiers, which offices he held till 1667. In the reign of James II. he was appointed one of the Lords of the Treasury.

Belesme, ROBERT OF, one of the Norman followers of William the Conqueror, and eldest son of Earl Roger of Shrewsbury, was created Earl of Montgomery. He was the leader of the disaffected barons against the Norman kings. In 1077 he joined Robert against his father, in 1087 he opposed William II.'s accession to the English throne, and in 1101 supported Robert's claims against Henry I. On this latter occasion he was banished from England, to the great joy of the people, and sought refuge in Normandy. In 1112 he was sent to Henry as an ambassador by the French king, but Henry served him as a rebel and kept him a prisoner till his death, the date of which is unknown. He stands out as the very worst example of the feudal noble. "His contemporaries," says Lappenberg, "are unanimous in describing him as one of the most detestable characters known in history, to whom the most unheard-of barbarities were not merely acts of revenge, but an insatiable enjoyment." Ordericus Vitalis exclaims, when mentioning his banishment from England in 1101, "Rejoice, King Henry, and give thanks to the Lord God, for you became a free ruler from the day when you banished Robert of Belesme from your realm."

Belfast was the site of an important Norman castle which was in the possession of the De Burghs, Earls of Ulster, in the thirteenth century. In 1333, William de Burgh was murdered there by the rebellious English of the Pale. The castle subsequently fell into the hands of the O'Neils, from whom it was taken after the rebellion of Shane O'Neil, and forfeited to the crown. In 1604 the castle and district was granted to Sir Arthur Chichester, who settled there numerous colonists from Devonshire. The castle was rebuilt, and a town speedily grew up round it. In 1611 the town was constituted a borough, and became very flourishing. In 1637 Strafford gave it certain trading privileges which did much to increase its prosperity. The town has ever since continued to increase, and has become the chief manufacturing and commercial town in Ireland.

Belgæ, THE, were the inhabitants of part of the south and south-west of ancient Britain. Their districts included the modern counties of Hants, Wilts, Dorset, and part of Somerset. They were in all likelihood closely connected with the Continental Belgæ and are generally considered to have belonged to the Gallic branch of the Celtic stock, and to have migrated to Britain from north-eastern Gaul. It is probable that they contained a very considerable intermixture of Germanic elements, and Mr. Wright, and some other authorities, have maintained that the Belgæ were, in fact, a Teutonic tribe, and were comparatively late settlers in this island. A directly opposite opinion has, however, been maintained by other Celtic scholars. [BARRONS; CELTS.]

Belgian Question, THE (1830—32). The effect of the French Revolution of July, 1830, in Europe, was to cause a general uprising of nationalities. Belgium, among others, threw off the yoke of Holland, and all Europe now became interested in the settlement of the difficulty. The Dutch government applied to Lord Aberdeen for troops. Thereupon he summoned the London Conference. This Conference in vain attempted to solve the question. It lingered on till Sept. 30, 1832, and then separated, having effected nothing, the final cause of separation being a difference of opinion between the three Northern and the two Western powers as to the employment of force. A convention was immediately concluded between England and France for carrying out the stipulations of the treaty of November. This treaty was signed Oct. 22, and on the 6th Nov. an embargo was laid on all vessels bearing the Dutch flag in British ports. A French army entered Holland and captured Antwerp; and the war was over. Belgium gained her independence with the capitulation of Antwerp.

Belleisle, (1) THE BATTLE OF, was fought Oct. 25, 1747, and resulted in the defeat of the French by the English fleet commanded by Admiral Hawke. Early in the day Hawke fell in with a large fleet of merchant ships bound for the West Indies, and convoyed by nine men-of-war. Without waiting for his ships to fall into line of battle, he vigorously attacked the enemy, and was rewarded with the capture of seven out of the nine men-of-war. The French were completely defeated, and the admiral received the honour of knighthood for the exploit.—(2) THE CAPTURE OF, took place during the Seven Years' War. In 1761 (June 7), a fleet under Admiral Keppel, conveying 8,000 troops under General Hodgson, arrived before the south-east point of the island. The troops, after being once repulsed, made good their landing, captured Palais, the chief town of the island, and compelled the garrison to capitulate. The island was held till the close of the war (1763).

Bellingham, SIR EDWARD (d. 1549), was sent to Ireland as Lord Deputy by Somerset in 1548, having previously won fame for himself in Hungary and at Boulogne, as well as in the Isle of Wight, where, in his capacity of governor, he defeated the French in 1545. His short period of rule in Ireland was eminently successful, and was marked by strong, wise, and vigorous administration.

Benares, THE TREATY OF (Aug., 1773), was concluded between Warren Hastings and the Vizier of Oude. Its stipulations were that Hastings should lend the Vizier an English force to be used against the Rohillas, and should cede the districts of Corah and Allahabad; that the Vizier should give a donation of forty lacs of rupees, and a monthly payment of two lacs for the services of the troops; and that he should pay fifty lacs additionally for the ceded districts. [ROHILLA WAR.]

Benbow, JOHN, ADMIRAL (b. 1650, d. 1702), entered the merchant service very early in life. In 1680 he was master of a ship which traded in the Mediterranean. He is said to have pickled the heads of a crew of Saltee pirates, which he threw down as salt provisions on the table of the Cadiz magistrates. On his return James II. placed him in command of a ship in the Royal Navy. William III. employed him in checking the Dutch privateers, and in bombarding the French ports, duties which he carried out with courage and success. In 1698 he was sent with a squadron to the West Indies. There he attempted to settle the disputes which had broken out between the Spanish and English settlers owing to the attempted colonisation of the isthmus of Darien by the Scotch. On his return he was made Vice-Admiral (1700). He was sent out again in order to engage the Spanish colonies to disown Philip, the French claimant to the crown of Spain; or, if they refused this, to seize their galleons. He arrived at Barbadoes in 1701 and sailed thence for Jamaica, where he heard that Du Casse had arrived with a squadron of French ships in order to crush the English slave trade. On August 19th, 1702, Benbow, while cruising off St. Domingo, came in sight of Du Casse. He resolved to attack, but the captains of his three best ships, from motives of personal dislike, refused to bring their vessels into action. Benbow, however, with his own ship, fought the enemy for four days. At last the captains addressed a written remonstrance to him, in which they declared that the odds were too great for a continuance of the conflict. Benbow, who was badly wounded, returned to Jamaica to die. Before his death he had the satisfaction of procuring the condemnation of two of his captains, and the dismissal of the third from the service.

Benburb, THE BATTLE OF (June 5th, 1646), was fought between Owen Roe O'Neil and General Monroe with the Scottish and English troops. O'Neil had his rear protected by a wood, and his right by the Blackwater. Monroe had ordered his brother to join him with a considerable force, but this O'Neil prevented, while he amused the Scots by feints till his own forces, detached for this purpose, had rejoined him. Monroe now tried to retreat, but was at once charged by the Irish, his horse fled, and the only formidable stand was made by an English regiment under Lord Blaney; when they had been cut to pieces the rest of the Scots fled in disorder. Lords Montgomery and Blaney, with 21 officers and 150 men, as well as all the artillery and ammunition, were captured, Monroe himself escaping with difficulty. Altogether, 3,243 of the English and Scots fell, while the victors lost 70 killed and 206 wounded. This battle was the last great victory achieved by an Irish general on Irish soil.

Bench, KING'S. [KING'S BENCH.]

Bencoolen, in Sumatra, was held by the East India Company as a trading settlement from 1682 to 1824. It was attacked and laid in ruins by the French in 1760. In 1824 it was given up to the Dutch in exchange for their Malacca settlements.

Benedict Biscop was born of a good Northumbrian family, and was in the service of King Oswy. In 653 he went on a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return laboured hard in missionary work in the north of England. After two years he undertook a second journey to Rome, and subsequently entered the Benedictine monastery of Lerins, where he took the tonsure, and remained some time. He then went to Rome again, and was commissioned to return to England as assistant and interpreter to Archbishop Theodor. On their arrival in England, Benedict was made abbot of the monastery of St. Peter's, at Canterbury. At the expiration of two years he abandoned this office, and undertook another journey to Rome. On his return he received from Egfrith of Northumbria a grant of land at the mouth of the Wear (674). Here he founded a monastery with a church of stone, and glass windows, and endowed it with numerous books, pictures, and relics, obtained by him on his journeys to Rome. In 682 he founded a second monastery at Jarrow, where Bede spent most of his life. By the impulse he gave to monasticism and to ecclesiastical art in England, Benedict did work of considerable service to the Anglo-Saxon Church.

Benedictines, THE, were the most important of the monastic orders, founded 529 by St. Benedict of Nursia (480—542). Up to this time there had been neither uniformity nor permanence in monastic societies. Benedict's work was that of organisation; instead of fluctuating assemblies of individuals, there was to be a careful gradation of ranks and duties; and though the abbot was bound to consult the monks, his authority was supreme. Moreover, though the Benedictine rule was milder than previous practices, the vow was rendered irrevocable. Instead of devoting themselves entirely to contemplation, the monks were to busy themselves in manual labour or in reading. Soon most of the monasteries of the West were subject to the Benedictine rule. There is some doubt as to the exact date of the introduction of the Benedictine rule into England. Probably it was introduced by Augustine, whose companions were in all likelihood Benedictine monks, but the first introduction is also claimed for Benedict Biscop, and for Wilfrid. The order is mentioned in a charter of Kenred's to the monks of Evesham in 709; but Bede has no reference to it, nor is it alluded to in the act regulating the English clergy at Clovesho in 747. It was not till the time of Edgar that the strict Benedictine rule, under the auspices of Ethelwold, Dunstan, and Oswald (himself a Benedictine of Fleury), became generally prevalent in England, and a "Concord of Rules" was promulgated by Dunstan for the guidance of English monks. Henceforward the Benedictines became by far the richest and most powerful of the monastic orders in England. All the cathedral convents, except Carlisle, and four of the cathedrals instituted by Henry VIII., namely, Chester, Gloucester, Oxford, and Peterborough, and all the English mitred abbeys except Waltham and Cirencester, belonged to the Benedictine order. So important are they in comparison with all other orders of monks in England, that the history of English monasticism is to a large extent the history of the English Benedictines. [MONASTICISM.] At the time of the dissolution of the monasteries, the number of Benedictine abbeys and cells was 113, with revenues amounting to over £57,000, besides 73 Benedictine nunneries with revenues of nearly £8,000.

Benefice denotes "the right which a clerk has to enjoy certain ecclesiastical revenues on condition of discharging certain services." For the enjoyment of a benefice four things are necessary:—(1) Ordination as a priest; a deacon or a layman may be presented, but he must be ordained priest before he can be instituted. (2) Presentation by the patron. In theory, a patron, himself a clerk, may petition for his own admission; but the usual plan is to make over the right to some other person before the benefice becomes vacant. (3) Institution to the cure of souls by the bishop, if satisfied of the sufficiency of the clerk. If the bishop refuse, the patron has a remedy by quare impedit in the common law court, and must show satisfactory reasons for his refusal. When the bishop is himself patron, there is neither presentation nor institution, but collation. (4) Induction to the temporalities by the archdeacon or a neighbouring clergyman upon the bishop's mandate. The papal power of granting dispensation from that canon of the Lateran Council of 1215, which forbade the holding of two benefices by the same person, was transferred at the Reformation to the Archbishop of Canterbury. But the evils of pluralism were so great that by the Acts 1 and 2 Vict., c. 106, and 13 and 14 Vict., c. 98, it was forbidden to hold two benefices unless the churches were within three miles of one another, and the value of one was not greater than £100. In 1867, 6,403 benefices were in the patronage of private persons, 6,485 in that of the crown, public bodies, and functionaries.

Benefit of Clergy was the right claimed by the clergy to immunity from secular jurisdiction in certain cases. It was never extended to high treason or offences not capital, and where the punishment would not touch the life or limb of the offender. It was at first restricted to bond-fide clerics, but subsequently got extended to all who could read a verse in the Psalter, known as the "neck-verse," generally out of the 51st Psalm. Should it be declared by the bishop's commissary that the prisoner read it like a clerk, he was delivered over to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It was, however, an indictable offence at common law to teach a felon to read in order that he might claim benefit of clergy. The abuse of this custom was very great, and in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries it produced constant disputes between the judges and ordinaries. Henry VII., in 1488, restricted it by declaring that it should not be allowed more than once to persons not actually in orders, and in Queen Anne's reign the neck-verse was no longer required to be read. Benefit of clergy was not finally abolished till the reign of George IV. Benefit of clergy never extended to women till they were included by the Statute 3 and 4 Will. III.

Benevolences, a means of raising money by extorted loans, were first used by Edward IV. Probably in earlier times the practice of expecting and even asking for "free-will offerings" was not unusual on the part of kings. Edward II. and Richard II. seem to have made some use of this method of levying money. But Edward IV. raised it to a system, and by his popular manners was wonderfully successful in dealing with that large number of his subjects who did not know how to refuse a king's request. Such a method of using personal pressure was, of course, unconstitutional, and gave the king a dangerous means of raising money without Parliament. Under Richard III., in 1484, an Act of Parliament was passed abolishing benevolences as "new and unlawful inventions;" but in spite of this, Richard III. continued to exact them. Henry VII. also revived them, and obtained a quasi-parliamentary sanction by an Act of 1492, which enforced the payment of arrears of money promised by private persons to the king. It was often argued seriously that the law of Richard III., being the act of a "usurper," was not valid. Henry's Chancellor, Archbishop Morton, used to beg for his master, and invented a dilemma which was known as "Morton's fork." If a man lived handsomely he told him that he clearly had money to spare; if he lived plainly, that he was saving money, and must be rich enough to help the king. Henry VIII., in 1545, appointed commissioners, who, under the name of a benevolence, were to move men to grant to the king twenty pence in the pound on the value of their lands: those who refused were to be summoned to answer before the Privy Council. Elizabeth at times solicited loans, but she was frugal, and generally repaid them in time. James I., in 1614, had recourse to this, amongst other schemes for raising money. The Council wrote to the sheriffs requesting them to solicit subscriptions in their counties. Lord Bacon defended the proceeding, saying that it asked for a free gift, and had nothing in common with the extortions of previous times. So many protests, however, were made against this exaction, and so little money was raised by it, that it was not again used by the crown. Even Charles I., in his worst straits, rejected proposals for reviving so unpopular a usage.

Bengal. The province of British India which lies about the lower portions and the deltas of the Ganges and Brahmaputra. It includes the provinces of Bengal Proper, Behar, Orissa, and Chota Nagpur, and has a population of over sixty-four millions. Bengal was conquered by the Mohammedans in the thirteenth century, and was subsequently ruled by Mussulman viceroys appointed by the various reigning dynasties. In the eighteenth century the Nawab of Bengal was a deputy of the Mogul at Delhi. The first English settlements were formed between the years 1620 and 1640. In 1696 the English bought a small district at the mouth of the Ganges, on which Fort William (Calcutta) was erected. For many years the English were involved in frequent disputes with the native governors, culminating in Suraj-ud-Dowlah's massacre of the Europeans in 1756. [BLACK HOLE.] This was followed by Clive's great victory at Plassey, and some years of fighting. [CLIVE.] In 1765 the dewanny of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, was ceded to the East India Company, and the Nawab, Meer Jaffier, was pensioned off. A native dewan was, however, appointed to collect the revenues. In 1773 Warren Hastings abolished the double government, and placed the administration directly in the hands of the Company. The Governor-General of India was also Governor of Bengal, till 1854, when the offices were separated, and Bengal was placed under a Lieutenant-Governor. In 1793 Lord Cornwallis effected the "Permanent Settlement," by which the zemindars, or tax collectors, were recognised as proprietors on payment of a land tax to the government; but the rights of the cultivators were recognised and extended by the Bengal Land Law of 1859.

Bengal Mutiny (1795—6). One of the chief results of Lord Cornwallis's administration had been the abolition of sinecures and perquisites in both branches of the service. The civilians had been compensated by increased salaries, but this was impossible in the army, and though the pay was very high, it was disproportionate to that of the civilians. Sir John Shore therefore found he had to deal with a widespread spirit of mutiny. Delegates were elected from each regiment to form an executive board, and the terms offered by it were that the Company's regiments should not be reduced; that the king's troops should be limited by law; that promotion should go by seniority; that all the old allowances should be restored. If this was not granted, they were prepared to assume the government themselves by violence. The matter was entirely mismanaged. At one time obnoxious regulations were issued, which merely enraged the mutineers; at another the greatest concessions were made, one of the ringleaders being promoted to a confidential post in the India House. The arrival of Lord Wellesley ended this. Seeing a number of malcontent commanders congregated at his first levée, he peremptorily ordered them to rejoin their regiments within twenty-four hours. His commands were obeyed, and the mutiny was at an end, quelled, it was said, by a glance of Lord Wellesley's eye.

Bennington, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 16th, 1777), fought during the American War of Independence, took place at Bennington, in New Hampshire, where the Americans had stored large supplies. Burgoyne had detached a considerable force, under Colonel Baum, to seize the magazines at Bennington, and thence to march on to Albany and join the main army there. Finding the place stronger than he expected, Baum entrenched himself, and sent for reinforcements. General Stark, with the New Hampshire men, in vain offered him battle, and on being reinforced, determined himself to attack. The movement was conducted with great skill, and Baum's position was secretly surrounded before he was aware of an intended attack. The entrenchments were gallantly held until ammunition failed the defenders, who then made a bold attempt to cut their way through the American lines. Baum, however, was shot, and the rest of the force laid down its arms.

Bennington, in Oxfordshire, near Wallingford, although now a village, was in early times a place of considerable importance. It was one of the four towns that Cutha took from the Britons in 571; and in 775 Offa defeated Cynewulf of Wessex here, and took the town from him.

Bentham, JEREMY (b. 1747, d. 1832), educated at Westminster and Queen's College, Oxford, was originally intended for the bar, but being possessed of private means, he determined to devote his life to the reformation, rather than the practice, of the law, and wrote numerous works with this object. In spite of their unequal value, his books remain a storehouse for the politician and the law reformer. Indeed, there are few administrative reforms which have not been suggested wholly or in part by Bentham's writings. But his value does not only consist in being a suggester of reform on the details of legislation and procedure; he is also one of the fathers of English jurisprudence. His place in that science is midway between Hobbes and Austin. Hobbes had first discerned the doctrine that whatever be the form of government the sovereign authority is ultimately absolute; but he had deduced from this the theory of non-resistance. Bentham perceived the fallacy in this deduction, and separated clearly the legal necessity for obedience from the political duty of resistance. The test of the propriety of political resistance Bentham held to be "Utility," in the sense of the greatest happiness of the greatest number. This maxim, whatever may be its value as the basis of a philosophy, furnishes an excellent rule for practical action. In fact, as Sir Henry Maine has pointed out, by thus making the good of the community take precedence of every other object, Bentham offered a clear rule of reform, and gave a distinct object to aim at in the pursuit of improvement. In this respect his influence may be compared with that of the jus n in Roman law.

Bentham's works, which are very numerous, have been collected by his disciple, B. (London, 1837), who has prefixed to the collection a sketch of Bentham's method. To his writings which will best repay perusal are The Fragment on Government (1776), in an edition by Blackstone; The Book of Fallacies, and Th on Usury. His theory of punishments is tained in The Principles of Morals and Leg (published separately by the Clarendon and in a translation from the French of ciple Dumont, entitled The Theory of Leg. For criticisms of Bentham's philosophy see the preface to Green and Grose's edition of and W. L. Courtney, Criticism on the Ph of J. S. Mill. [B. R.]

Bentinck, LORD GEORGE (b. 1802, d. 1868), acted for some time as secretary to Canning and in 1828 entered Parliament for Regis. He was chiefly occupied in matters till within a few years of his death. He came prominently forward in the of the Opposition in 1846, after Sir Peel abandoned the cause of Protection. Identifying himself with the Protectionists he quickly became their chief, a them in the bitter campaign which followed against Peel. In this position he displayed energy, determination, and original power which seemed to mark him for high distinction as a political leader. He, however, died suddenly from heart disease, within three years of the time he had first come prominently before the public.

B. Disraeli, Lord George Bentinck: a Biography (1851).

Bentinck, LORD WILLIAM (b. 1789, d. 1839), entered the army in 1791, attached to the headquarters of the Emperor Suvaroff during the campaign of 1795. In April, 1803, he quitted England as Governor of Madras, which post he held till Jan., 1808. In August of that year he was appointed on the staff of the army in Portugal under Sir Harry Burrard. He was at the battle of Corunna, and was appointed minister at the court of Madrid and Commander-in-chief of all his Majesty's forces in the island. At the head of an expedition he landed in Catalonia and, after some successes, was defeated at Villa Franca. In 1814 he left England and repaired to Tuscany, and incited the French to throw off the French yoke. He went to India as Governor-General. He arrived in 1828, and was compelled to enter at once on the unpopular task of retrenchment, owing to the deficit caused by the Burmese War. All allowances were reduced, and an order was issued in 1828 to curtail the batta allowances of stations within 400 miles of Calcutta. This impolitic and unjust order produced a mutiny, but was forced upon the Directors. The rev augmented by increasing the opium trade, and by resuming all lands fraudulently alienated from the state. In 1832, on the murder of the Rajah of Cachar (a little province on the north-east frontier of Bengal), Lord William annexed it, in accordance with the general wish of the people; and in 1834 Coorg was also annexed. In other respects Lord William based his policy on the principle of non-intervention. The assumption of the government of Mysore was, however, forced upon him by the incompetence of its ruler. Attempts were also made to establish a connection with the independent states beyond the Company's territories, and to form defensive alliances with the Ameers of Scinde and Runjeet Sing, of Lahore, with whom Lord William concluded treaties in 1831. The civil administration of Lord William stands high in the history of British India as an era of progress. The reform of the law courts and the laws, the admission of native Christians to office, the settlement of the North-West Provinces, the abolition of suttee and the suppression of the Thugs, the introduction of steam communication, and the encouragement of education, serve to mark the period of his rule with distinction. In 1835 Lord William returned to England. He was elected M.P. for Glasgow in 1837, but he did not take any prominent part in home politics.

Beorn (d. 1046) was the son of Ulf, and consequently the nephew of Gytha, wife of Earl Godwine. He attached himself to the fortunes of his uncle, and probably about the year 1045 received an earldom which seems to have included the counties of Hertford, Bedford, Huntingdon, and Buckingham. On the outlawry of Swegen in 1046, part of his earldom was granted to Beorn. On Swegen's return Beorn consented to intercede for him with the king, but Swegen, having lured him on board his ship, murdered him and buried his body at Dartmouth. His remains were subsequently translated with great pomp to Winchester.

Berar. [MAHRATTAS, THE.]

Berengaria, QUEEN (d. circ. 1230), was the daughter of Sancho VI. of Navarre, and in 1191 was married at Cyprus to Richard I. She accompanied him to the Holy Land, and it was owing to discourtesy shown to her at Cyprus that Richard I. attacked and conquered the island. After the death of her husband, she resided chiefly in the dower city of Le Mans, and compounded with King John for her dower lands in England, receiving in return a promise of 2,000 marks a year, which was very irregularly kept. She retired in 1230 to the abbey of L'Espau, to which she was a great benefactress, and here she is supposed to have died shortly afterwards.

Beresford, WILLIAM CARR, 1st VISCOUNT (b. 1770, d. 1854), a natural son of the first Marquis of Waterford, entered the army in 1785, and first saw active service at the siege of Toulon in 1793. In 1799 he went to India, and took command of a brigade of Sir David Baird's army, which was on its way to oppose Napoleon in Egypt. In Egypt he remained as commandant of Alexandria, till its evacuation, when he returned home, and was sent to Ireland. In 1805 he shared in the conquest of the Cape of Good Hope, whence he was despatched as brigadier-general with a small force against Buenos Ayres, which he took, only, however, in turn to be compelled to surrender to an overwhelming force. After remaining a prisoner for six months, he managed to escape, and on his return to England was sent in command of an expedition against Madeira, of which, on its capture, he became governor. In 1808, with the rank of major-general, he joined the British armies in Portugal. He accompanied Sir John Moore's expedition, and rendered good service, both on the retreat and in the battle of Corunna. In the spring of 1809, he was appointed marshal and generalissimo of the Portuguese armies, and proceeded to co-operate with the commander-in-chief. But in May, 1811, he rashly engaged the French at Albuera, and by good fortune rather than skill of his own gained a victory, which, however, weakened him so much that he was unable to reap any benefits from it. [ALBUERA.] In the campaigns of 1812 and 1813 he was second in command to Wellington, and was present at Nivelle, Bayonne, Orthes, and Toulouse [TOULOUSE], in the last of which especially he took a most important part. In 1814 he was raised to the peerage, and was immediately charged with an important mission to Brazil, where he was delayed just too long to allow him to be employed at Waterloo. In the year 1816 he was appointed to the command of the Portuguese armies by the King of Portugal, and for some time held that office, until he came into political conflict with the people, when he threw up his appointment, and returned to England in 1822. Of his victory at Albuera, Napier says: "No general ever gained so great a battle with so little increase of military reputation as Marshal Beresford." But he deserves great credit for the vigour and energy he displayed in the organisation of the Portuguese armies; and, in a subordinate position, he rendered most valuable service on many occasions throughout the Peninsular War.

Berlin, THE TREATY OF (1878), was concluded between Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, Russia, and Turkey, for the settlement of affairs in the East after the war between Russia and Turkey. Its chief provisions were, that Bulgaria should be an autonomous and tributary principality under the suzerainty of the Sultan, to be ruled by a Christian government and a prince freely elected, and provisionally administered by a Russian commissary; and that Eastern Roumelia should remain under the direct political and military authority of the Sultan, under conditions of administrative autonomy, and should have a Christian governor-general, to be nominated by the Porte with the assent of the powers. In the event of the Porte and Greece being unable to agree as to the rectification of their frontier, the powers would mediate. Bosnia and Herzegovina were to be occupied and administered by Austro-Hungary. The independence of Servia, Roumania, and Montenegro was recognised. Ardahan, Kara, Batoum, and other portions of Armenia, were ceded to Russia. Complete toleration, equality, and protection of all religions was guaranteed in Turkey. The plenipotentiaries who represented England in the Congress held under the presidency of Prince Bismarck, which preceded the treaty, were the Earl of Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury.

Bermudas, THE, or Somers Islands, situated in the west of the Atlantic Ocean, were discovered in 1527 by a Spaniard named Bermudas, who gave his name to the islands. They are about three hundred in number, though about twenty only are inhabited. In 1609 Sir George Somers, who was wrecked there on his way to Virginia, took possession of the Bermudas for the crown, and settlers soon began to arrive from England. In 1616 a Bermuda Company was formed, and after the Civil War many Royalists came out to settle. The islands were strongly fortified and rendered almost impregnable, a precaution which alone preserved them for England during the American War of Independence. The government, which has been representative ever since 1620, is vested in a governor, an executive council of nine members appointed by the crown, and a House of Assembly of thirty-six members.

Bernard's Case (1858). On January 14th, 1858, a desperate attempt was made by a man named Orsini, and others, to murder the Emperor of the French, by throwing bombs filled with explosives at him near the Opera-house in Paris. The attempt failed, but many persons were injured and some killed. Dr. Simon Bernard was indicted in England for being an accessory to the attempt before the act. There is little doubt that Bernard was an active accomplice in the plot. But a good deal of political feeling had been imported into the matter. The French Foreign Office had addressed a despatch to England on the subject of the conspiracy; this had caused great irritation, which was increased by the insulting language towards England used by some of the French officers in their address of congratulation to the Emperor Napoleon. It was felt that the conviction of Bernard would be a mark of subservience on the part of England, and a triumph for the unconstitutional government of the French Emperor. The trial took place at the Central Criminal Court on April 14; and after a six days' hearing the jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

Berners, Sir JOHN BOURCHIER, LORD (b. circa 1469, d. 1532), the holder of many important state offices during the first part of the reign of Henry VIII., and the best of the early writers of English prose, was born at Thetford in Hertfordshire, and probably educated at Balliol College, Oxford. In 1474 he succeeded to the title of his grandfather—John Bouchier—who had been created Baron Berners in 1455. In 1496 Berners aided in crushing the rebellion of the Cornishmen, who had risen against Henry VII.'s tax-gatherers, and after fighting with the army in France at the taking of Teroenne (1573), he accompanied the Princess Mary to Paris, as her chamberlain, on the occasion of her marriage with Louis XII. (1514). In 1515 he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was subsequently English envoy in Spain, attended Henry VIII. at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, and was installed in the office of Deputy of Calais in 1520. Although in ill-health, and embarrassed by debt, he zealously performed the duties of the position until his death in 1532. It was at Calais that he undertook a translation of Froissart's Chronicles. The translation was so skilfully executed in idiomatic English that it might have been easily mistaken for an original work, and to its popularity has been ascribed the promotion of a taste for historical reading and composition in England in the sixteenth century. His other works include translations of several French and Spanish romances, and of the Golden Book of Marcus Aurelius.

H. Walpole, Royal and Noble Authors, i. 239. The editio princeps of Berners' Froissart was printed by Pynson in London in two vols., 1523 and 1525. After passing through many editions in the sixteenth century it was reprinted by Mr. Utterson in 1812.

Bernicia. [NORTHUMBRIA.]

Bertha (BERCTA), QUEEN, was the daughter of Charibert, King of Paris, and the wife of Ethelbert of Kent. On her marriage it was stipulated that she should be allowed to profess Christianity and worship as she pleased. The little Roman church of St. Martin at Canterbury was set apart for her use. Her influence was of great service to Augustine in his missionary work. [AUGUSTINE.]

Bertric (BEORHTRIC) (d. 800), King of Wessex, succeeded on Cynewulf's death. He married Eadburgh, daughter of Offa, and is said to have met his death by drinking a cup of poison prepared by her hands for another person. His reign is chiefly remarkable for the banishment of Egbert and the first appearance of the Danes on the English coast. Peace was secured by the practical acknowledgment on the part of Wessex of the supremacy of Mercia.

Berwick was one of the fortresses delivered to the English in 1174, as security for the fulfilment of the conditions of the Treaty of Falaise, and it remained in their hands till 1189. It was one of the four burghs (Edinburgh, Roxburgh, and Stirling being the other three) having a parliament, or court, of their own, and from its importance and wealth was for centuries a thorn in the side of England. In March, 1296, it was taken by Edward I., and most of the townsmen put to the sword, but was recaptured by Wallace in September, 1297. Having fallen again into the hands of the English, it was taken by Bruce in 1318, and held by the Scots until after the battle of Halidon Hill, 1333, when it was seized by Edward III. From this time it was rarely in the hands of the Scots until it was surrendered by Henry VI., in 1461, in order to secure a refuge in Scotland. It became again an English possession in 1482. It was made independent both of England and Scotland in 1551. In 1836 it was created a county of itself.

Berwick, JAMES FITZ-JAMES, DUKE OF (b. 1670, d. 1734), was the natural son of James II., by Arabella Churchill, the sister of the Duke of Marlborough. At an early age he was sent to learn the art of war under Charles of Lorraine, and was present at the siege of Buda in 1685. In 1687 he was created Duke of Berwick. After the Revolution of 1688, Berwick fought for his father in Ireland, and was present at the battle of the Boyne. He accompanied James to France, and served under Marshal Luxembourg in Flanders. He was taken prisoner at Neerwinden, but exchanged. In 1696 Berwick took a very prominent part in the unsuccessful plot for a Jacobite insurrection, which was to have been aided by a French force; but it is probable that he knew little of the darker schemes of some of the plotters, who aimed at removing William III. by assassination. In 1704, Berwick, whose military talents were now highly esteemed, was appointed to the command of the French army in Spain. In 1705 he suppressed the Camisard insurrection in Languedoc. In 1706 he was again sent to Spain, and he did much to restore the French cause, which previously appeared almost desperate. In 1707 he completely routed the English and Imperialists at the great battle of Almanza, in which his opponent was a Frenchman, Ruvigny, Marquis of Galway. In 1709, and the following years, he was employed in Dauphiny, and conducted a skilful defensive campaign. In 1713 he returned to Spain and captured Barcelona. In 1716 he was appointed commandant of Guienne; and in 1718 he once more led a French army into Spain, this time in opposition to Philip V., whom he had done so much to place on the throne. At the conclusion of the interval of peace, which terminated in 1733, Berwick was called to superintend the operations on the Rhine. He was killed by a cannon-ball at the siege of Philipsburg. Berwick was created a peer of France and a grandee of Spain. One of his sons was created Duke of Liria, in Spain, and the other Duke of Fitz-James, in the peerage of France. Berwick's military talents were of a very high order, and perhaps not altogether unworthy of comparison with those of his celebrated uncle. In some other respects his characteristics were not unlike those of Marlborough. He had the same coldness, and could be disturbed neither by excitement nor by danger. His integrity, piety, and high sense of duty were unquestioned, and his character has been very highly praised by Montesquieu. Bolingbroke called him the best great man that ever lived.

Berwick's Mémoires, written by himself down to 1716, and continued to 1734 by the Abbé Hook, were published in 1778, with an Eloge Historique by Montesquieu. [S. J. L.]

Berwick, THE PACIFICATION OF (1639), was the name given to the agreement concluded between Charles I. and five Scotch Commissioners, the terms being that the Scottish and the Royalist armies should be disbanded, ecclesiastical matters referred to a free general assembly, and civil matters to a parliament.

Berwick, THE TREATY OF (January, 1660), was concluded between Queen Elizabeth (represented by the Duke of Norfolk) and the Lords of the Congregation (q.v.). Its object was the expulsion of the French garrisons and troops from Scotland, Elizabeth engaging to send troops to the North for that purpose.

Bessborough, JOHN WILLIAM PONSOMBY, 4TH EARL OF (b. 1781, d. 1847), better known as Lord Duncannon, entered Parliament for Knaresborough in 1805. He was an active member of the Whig party for many years, and had a considerable share in drafting the Reform Bill. In 1831 he was made Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, in 1834 he received the seals of the Home Office, and in 1835 the Privy Seal. In 1846 the Earl of Bessborough was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland by Lord John Russell. His accession was very popular, as he was a resident Irish landlord, and had always displayed a patriotic and liberal interest in Irish affairs. His viceroyalty extended over the period of the great famine, and his efforts were earnestly directed to the alleviation of that calamity. He died in May, 1847, during his tenure of office.

Bexley, NICHOLAS VANSITTART, LORD (b. 1766, d. 1851), the son of an East Indian Director, was educated at Oxford and called to the bar in 1792. In 1796 he was returned to Parliament for Hastings. In February, 1801, he was sent with plenary powers to detach the court of Denmark from the Northern Alliance. Returning to England he was elected for Old Sarum, and supported the Addington ministry, under which he held the office of joint Secretary to the Treasury. He continued in office when Pitt again resumed the Premiership, and, in 1805, was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland. This place he resigned in the same year through some difference with Pitt in regard to Lord Melville's conduct. In the ministry of Lord Grenville he again became Secretary to the Treasury. In 1812, having published some letters on financial questions, he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer by Lord Liverpool. In this important office he remained eleven years, and on his resignation was raised to the peerage with the title of Lord Bexley, and was at the same time appointed to the office of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which he held for nine years. "Industrious and plodding," says Mr. Walpole, "he had made an excellent Secretary to the Treasury; but he had neither the knowledge of finance nor the dexterity of debate which would have qualified him for the post which, by a strange fate, he occupied for a longer period than any of his successors."

Beymaroo, THE BATTLE OF (Nov. 23, 1841), was one of the disasters which befell the English during the first Afghan War. The English were in cantonments near Cabul; and on the 14th of November a large force of Afghans, which had assembled with cannon on the Beymaroo hills, was dislodged with some difficulty by Brigadier Shelton. On the 22nd they appeared again at Beymaroo. On the 23rd a strong force set out before daybreak to dislodge them. The hill was carried without difficulty, but thousands of men quickly swarmed out of the city, and the English were overmatched, with only a single gun to answer the long-range matchlocks of the Afghans. The troops, shot down like rabbits, pining with cold and hunger, lost courage and refused to follow their officers. Finally, the whole body of English soldiers abandoned the field and took to flight. Beyrout, THE BOMBARDMENT OF (1840). A joint British, Austrian, and Turkish squadron in this year sailed to the coast of Syria, and proceeded to bombard Beyrout, a sea-port at the northern extremity of the Pachalic of Acre, which was held by the troops of the rebellious Pasha of Egypt, Mehemet Ali. The town was quickly reduced to ruins.

Bhawulpore, or Doodpoutra, is a native state of the Punjab governed by a prince called the Bhawal Khan, with Bhawalpore as his capital. The Bhawal Khan's dominions extended at one time across the Sutlej to the Upper Indus, but he was a tributary of the Dooranee monarch. Runjeet Singh demanded the same tribute, and, on failure of payment, seized the territory between the rivers. The Ameers of Scinde also took from the Bhawal Khan a large district on the left bank of the Lower Indus. Thus pressed, he readily accepted, in 1838, the protection of the British, by whom his dominions were guaranteed against further encroachments on the part of his powerful neighbours.

Bhopal is a small Indian native principality in Malwa, in the valley of the Ner-buddah. In 1778 the reigning prince was the only chief in Central India who afforded any support to General Goddard in his adventurous march across the peninsula. This created an undying friendship between the Bhopal dynasty and the English, who protected Bhopal against the Mahrattas. In 1817, during the Mahratta War, Lord Hastings concluded a defensive alliance with this state, and granted it five valuable provinces which had been taken from the Peishwa. The Bhopal state has long been governed by female rulers or Begums, who have displayed great capacity for administration. The principality is said to be the best governed of the Indian native states. In the Indian Mutiny the Begum of Bhopal gave great assistance to the English, and both she and her daughter and successor were created Knights of the Star of India.

Bhonsla was the family name of the Rajahs of Nagpore or Berar. [MAHRATTAS.]

Bhotan War, THE (1864—1865). In the year 1862 a quarrel arose between the independent Bhotan state in the Eastern Himalayas and the English government with reference to some frontier territories in Assam. Various outrages were committed by the Bhotias on English subjects, and in 1863 an embassy under the Hon. Ashley Eden was insulted and ill-treated. War was declared in Nov., 1864. It was badly conducted, and the country was unhealthy. The Bhotias struggled desperately, but finally were compelled to sue for peace. The Bhotias ceded the frontier districts of Assam, for which the English agreed to pay a yearly grant of 25,000 rupees.

Bhurtore. A native state of Rajputana. The town of Bhurtore has been twice besieged by the English. (1) In 1805, the Bhurtore Rajah having taken part with the Mahrattas, General Lake determined on investing the place. It was a town and fortress, eight miles in circumference, surrounded by a lofty mud wall of great thickness, and protected by numerous bastions, and a deep ditch filled with water. It was garrisoned by about 8,000 of the Rajah's troops and the remnant of Holkar's infantry. Without a sufficient siege train, without an engineer officer of any experience, without even a reconnaissance, Lake resolved at once to carry the town by assault. Four unsuccessful assaults were made, entailing the loss of 3,200 men in killed and wounded, and the British finally were compelled to withdraw. This memorable siege lasted from Jan. 4th to April 21st. (2) In the year 1825, a disputed succession to the throne of Bhurtore occurred. The expelled prince had been under British protection, and so, though Lord Amherst was at first inclined for non-intervention, Lord Combermere, the commander-in-chief, undertook to reduce the hitherto impregnable stronghold. Having demanded the dismissal of the women and children, which was refused, he proceeded to bombard the town. After two months' siege, the assault was given, and in two hours the town was taken; the fortress was then razed to the ground, and the rightful prince restored.

Bhye, in Hindustani, signifies "lady," and was affixed to the names of all Mahratta ladies of distinction—e.g., Tara Bhye, the wife of the first Holkar; Toolseye Bhye, the celebrated concubine of Jeswunt Rao Holkar, &c.

Bible, ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS OF THE. In the early times of English Church history translations of portions of the Scriptures were undertaken for the use of the less learned priests. Bishop Aldhelm, of Sherborne (who died in 709), is said to have translated the Psalter. Bede translated the Gospel of St. John, and finished the work on his death-bed in 735. King Alfred encouraged, if he did not actually undertake, the translation of the Gospels, which was current in the tenth century. Towards the end of that century, a Benedictine scholar, Ælfric (who died Archbishop of Canterbury in 1005), translated parts of the Books of Moses, together with Joshua, Judges, Kings, Esther, Job, Maccabees, and Judith. After the Norman Conquest, the early form of the English language gradually altered, and these translations became obsolete. In the middle of the thirteenth century a version of the whole Bible in Norman-French was current amongst the nobles. In the fourteenth century, about 1325, two translations of the Psalms into English appeared almost at the same time. One was by William of Shoreham, a Kentish priest; the other by Robert Rolle, who is known as the Hermit of Ham-pole. The end of the fourteenth century saw the first complete version of the Bible into English, a work directed by John Wyclif. Besides being a philosopher and theologian, Wyclif was also a fervent and diligent pastor. He was struck by the popular ignorance of the Bible, and resolved to remedy it. He himself undertook the New Testament, and his friend and follower, Nicolas of Hereford, began the translation of the Old Testament. Nicolas advanced in his work as far as the Book of Baruch, when he was called to account for a sermon which he had preached at Oxford. Wyclif, most probably, completed the unfinished work. It would seem that this translation was done by the end of 1382, and was rapidly disseminated among the people by itinerant preachers. The translation was made from the Latin version of St. Jerome, known as the Vulgate. There was a great difference in style between the work of the two translators. Nicolas of Hereford gave a literal rendering of the Latin in a stiff and bald manner. Wyclif was less a slave to the original, and showed a power of forcible and idiomatic writing which sets his translation as the highest point in the development of Middle English prose. No sooner was the work done than Wyclif was aware that it needed revision. This task he at once began, and it was carried on after his death by his follower, John Purvey, who finished the revision in 1388, and thereby gave greater uniformity and precision to the work. The circulation of the Wyclifite versions in manuscript amongst the people did much to prepare the way for the doctrinal changes which the influence of the German reformers introduced amongst a growing party in the English Church. But Wyclif's translation existed only in manuscript, and the printing-press had begun to work its change in the spread of literature. A printed Bible was necessary, and this work was undertaken by a Cambridge scholar, William Tyndale. He did not adopt Wyclif's version, because its language was by this time antiquated, and it was a translation of the Vulgate, whereas the knowledge of the Greek text had in his day made considerable progress amongst learned men. Tyndale translated the New Testament from the Greek text of Erasmus, but was obliged to withdraw to the Continent for the purpose of printing it. In 1526 this translation, which was printed at Worms in 1525, was secretly introduced into England, and was largely circulated, though efforts were made by the bishops to seize the copies and commit them to the flames. Tyndale next began the translation of the Old Testament, and published, in 1530, an English version of the Pentateuch. He was continuing his labours when, in 1535, he was imprisoned at Antwerp and was put to death as a heretic in the following year by the order of the Emperor Charles V. At his death his translation had advanced as far as the end of the Books of Chronicles. His work was revised by his friend and fellow-labourer, John Rogers, and its publication, under the name of Thomas Matthew (probably a wealthy merchant who found the funds for the undertaking), was begun secretly in Antwerp. Meanwhile, another English translation of the Bible was in progress at the hands of Miles Coverdale, who was favoured by Cromwell. This translation was not made from the original, but was the result of a comparison of the Vulgate and the German translations. It was published secretly (probably at Zurich) in 1535, and dedicated to Henry VIII., to whom it was presented by Cranmer and Cromwell. Tyndale's version, as edited by Rogers, was completed from Coverdale's translation. It was published by Grafton, an English printer, in 1537, and received the king's licence. The royal sanction given to this translation marked the final victory of the party which was in favour of doctrinal reform. From this time the knowledge of the Scriptures was no longer regarded as dangerous for the people, but was expressly sanctioned. The circulation of translations of the Scriptures was eagerly promoted. In 1539 was published at London an edition of Matthew's Bible, slightly revised by R. Taverner. In 1540 a considerable revision of this version was made under Cranmer's direction, and Cranmer's Bible, known also as the Great Bible, was the first "appointed to be read in churches" by royal command. In 1542 a reaction set in. The Roman party objected to Cranmer's Bible, and endeavoured to obtain a revision in their own favour. Henry VIII., by Act of Parliament, forbade the perusal of the New Testament in English to women, labourers, and uneducated persons. During the reigns of Edward VI. and Mary nothing more was done in the way of translation. But at the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth appeared a new version, known as the Geneva Bible, because it was the work of English exiles at Geneva, where it was first published in 1560. Chief among the translators were Goodman, Whittingham, and Knox. It was translated from the Hebrew and the Greek, but, as was to be expected, betrayed leanings towards the theology of Calvin. In consequence of the existence of these various translations, Archbishop Parker thought it desirable to establish a uniform and amended edition. He accordingly distributed the various books of the Bible, as they stood in Cranmer's edition, amongst the bishops for revision, desiring them not to change the text save where it varied manifestly from the Hebrew or Greek original. The result of two years of revision was the publication, in 1568, of the Bishops' Bible.

The Convocation of 1571 ordered that all Church officers should provide copies for use in their churches. Finally, the English Bible assumed its present form in the reign of James I. For the purpose of securing a complete revision, forty-seven of the most learned men in the kingdom were selected for the task. They divided themselves into three companies, which met at Westminster, Oxford, and Cambridge. Twenty-five undertook the Old Testament, fifteen the New Testament, and seven the Apocrypha. They worked under rules laid down by the king for their guidance. They were bidden to take as their basis the Bishops' Bible, and depart from it only when necessary. The work done by the separate committees was afterwards supervised and reduced to regularity by a committee of six persons. After three years' labour the version known as the Authorised Version was produced. Some doubt, however, exists as to the nature of the authorisation. It bears on its title-page the words "appointed to be read in churches;" but there exists no record of any authoritative or exclusive authorisation. However, either by royal authority or by natural selection, the version of 1611 has ousted its predecessors, and for two centuries and a half has been exclusively used in England. In 1870 the conviction that increased knowledge both of the text and of the language of the original required an alteration of the Authorised Version, found expression in the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury. Two companies for the revision of the Authorised Version were appointed, one for the Old Testament, the other for the New. The members were chosen from Biblical scholars of various Protestant denominations, and committees were formed in America for the purpose of acting with the English revisers. Following previous precedent, the object of the revisers was the revision of the Authorised Version with as few changes as was consistent with faithfulness. The revised version of the New Testament was published early in 1880.

Bidassoa. THE PASSAGE OF THE (Oct. 7, 1813), by the English in the Peninsular War, was a well-planned surprise of a remarkably strong position. The French held the heights of a lofty mountain group—the Rhune, the Commissari, and the Bayonette—and they had also strengthened their position by artificial works. Wellington, with great skill, concealed the real point of his attack. Suddenly, in the early morning of the 7th, the columns of attack forded the river with such celerity that the French had not even fired a gun before the troops formed up on the right bank. One after another the three ridges—the Bayonette, Commissari, and Puerto de Vera—were successively carried; but Clausel fell back on the Rhune, the strongest of all, and held it during the night. On the next day, afraid of being cut off, he retreated, and concentrated his forces on the ridge behind Sarre. The loss of the allies was 1,600, that of the French 200 less; but many of the reported losses among the former were really stragglers, who were becoming more numerous every day.

Bigod, FAMILY OF. Roger Bigod, a poor Norman knight, entered England with William the Conqueror, and in 1075 received a grant of a large part of the confiscated lands of Ralph of Wader, Earl of East Anglia. His elder son William was drowned in the White Ship, 1120; his younger, Hugh, obtained the earldom of Norfolk from Stephen (date uncertain), was confirmed in it by Henry II., and took part in the revolt of 1174. His son Roger, second earl and godson (afterwards third earl), was among the twenty-five executors of Magna Charta. Hugh, third earl, married Mand, eldest co-heiress of William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, and had two sons—Roger, fourth earl, who inherited the Marshalship of England through his mother, and died without issue; and Hugh, who was appointed Justiciar by the Barons in 1258, and whose son Roger succeeded his uncle in the earldom in 1270. It was this Bigod who helped to secure the Confirmation of the Charters. He surrendered his earldom and estates, in 1302, to the king, and received them back for life only; and though he left a brother, upon his death in 1307, the earldom became extinct in the Bigod family.

Billeting soldiers in private houses had become such an oppressive burden under Charles I. that one of the clauses in the Petition of Right is expressly directed against the practice of quartering soldiers or mariners on private individuals against their will. The practice, however, still continued until an Act passed in 1681 provided that "no officer, military or civil, or other persons, shall quarter or billet any soldier upon any inhabitant of the realm of any degree, quality, or profession without his consent." This Act is suspended annually by the Mutiny Act, which allows soldiers to be billeted on innkeepers and victuallers.

Bills, PARLIAMENTARY, are either public, dealing with matters of public policy, or private, being such as concern personal or local interests. The system by which legislation was founded on petition made it possible to alter the terms of the petition so that the statute should not really answer to the request, and even to found a statute on a petition in which the Commons had not concurred. These evils were remedied in the reign of Henry VI., when bills in the form of statutes began to be passed by both Houses. As the Commons have the sole right of taxation, the larger number of bills must originate with them. Bills on certain subjects, such as religion and trade, must originate in Committee of the whole House. The mode of procedure with reference to bills is nearly the same in both Houses. In the Commons, however, a member has to obtain leave to bring in a bill, but this is not the case in the Lords. When leave is moved for, the title of the bill is read and its object is usually stated. If the motion is agreed to, the bill is ordered. It is then presented, and the question is put that it be now read the first time. This question must be decided without amendment or debate. If it is negative, the bill disappears from the orders, but the question may be again brought forward. If it is carried, the question is put that it be read a second time, a day is fixed for the second reading, and the bill is printed. When the day comes the bill appears in the orders, and the question is put that it be now read a second time. This is the critical stage, and the whole principle can now be made a matter of debate. A bill may be opposed at all its stages, but as it is at this point that opposition is generally made, it is well to speak of this subject here. It is usual, in opposing a bill, to do so by an amendment of postponement for three or six months, or by some resolution contrary to the tenor of the measure. "The previous question" may also be moved. By this means, however, the bill is not extinguished and can be ordered for another day, while the postponement of a bill to a time when Parliament will not be sitting, or the adoption of an adverse resolution, puts an end to it for the session. It is unusual to reject a bill in direct terms, and such a course would imply that it contained matter offensive to the House. When the bill has been read a second time, it is brought before the Committee of the whole House, and receives any amendments which may be made to it. When it has received its final shape it is reported to the House. It has then to be read a third time, and after that the question is put "That this bill do pass," and on this it is not usual to divide. It is then sent up to the Lords or down to the Commons, as the case may be, and may be amended or rejected by the House which receives it. If it is amended, it is again sent to the House in which it originated, and if the amendments are disagreed upon, it is usual to send a message to state the reasons of the disagreement, or to desire a conference. When the bill is passed by both Houses it receives the royal assent, which may be given by commission, in the words, "La reine le veut." The form of dissent, "La reine s'avisera," has not been used since 1707, so that the crown may perhaps be said to have relinquished its right in this matter. All money bills must originate with the Commons, and, though the Lords may reject a money bill, they may not amend it. This gave rise to the unconstitutional practice of "tacking," by which, when the House of Commons wished to force a measure on the Lords, it was tacked on to a money bill, so that the Lords had to pass the bill entire or refuse the supply. This plan was adopted on the questions of the Irish Forfeitures, 1699, and of the Occasional Conformity Bill, 1706. The rejection by the Lords of the bill repealing the paper duty, 21st May, 1860, was viewed with much jealousy by the Commons. Such rejection is now made almost impossible by including the whole financial scheme of the budget in a single Act.

Petitions to Parliament on private matters occasioned the appointment of Receivers and Triers of Petitions. These officers, if they found no redress for the wrong complained of in the Courts, referred the matter to Parliament. Petitions to the Commons are frequent from the reign of Henry IV. From these petitions private bills took their rise. These pass through the same stages as public bills. In dealing with them the judicial functions of Parliament are especially prominent. Private bills are brought in on petition and at the expense of the promoters. Before a private bill is brought in, it is subjected to Examiners of both Houses, who see that the standing orders are complied with. The second reading of a private bill affirms the claim, but only on the supposition that the facts stated in the preamble can be made good. It is referred, if opposed, to a Select or Special Committee to decide on this, and by this Committee the question between the petitioners and their opponents is heard and determined. [PARLIAMENT.]

Bingham, SIR RICHARD, who was employed in Ireland, 1680, was one of Elizabeth's most able naval officers. In 1686 he was employed on service in Ireland, and cut to pieces a Scotch force which had landed to join the rebels on the banks of the Moy. He was subsequently made Governor of Connaught, and, whilst holding that office, gained considerable notoriety by putting to death all the Spaniards who were wrecked on the coast of Ireland during the dispersion of the Armada in 1688.

Birinus (d. 650), the apostle of Wessex, was probably an Italian by birth, and was commissioned by Pope Honorius to "scatter the seeds of the holy faith in those farthest inland territories of the English which no teacher had yet visited," but landing in Hampshire in 634 he found that Wessex was still in heathenism, and accordingly preached the Gospel there, meeting with immediate success. The two kings, Cynegils and Cwichelm, were baptised, and Birinus was established as Bishop of Dorchester, from whence he "went up and down among the West Saxons, that is, from Dorset to Buckinghamshire, from Surrey to the Severn, preaching, catechising, baptising, calling many people to the Lord by his pious labours, and building and dedicating churches."

Birmingham, JOHN, EARL OF LOUTH (d. 1329), was descended from the Lords of Athenry, and was nominated, in 1318, commander-in-chief of the English forces in Ireland. He won the battle of Dundalk, and sent Edward Bruce's head to Edward III. As a reward for this service, and for his prowess in fighting the O'Connors, he was made Earl of Louth. He was afterwards engaged as the ally of the Butlers and of the Earl of Desmond in their feud with the houses of De Burgh and Poer. In 1329 he, together with some 160 noblemen and gentlemen, was treacherously murdered by the "Germans and savages."

Birmingham, as a market town, is of considerable antiquity. Previous to the Conquest it formed part of the possessions of a family of the same name, and the manor continued to belong to the Birminghams till the sixteenth century. In Leland's time it was already known for its cutlery and hardware manufactures. During the Civil War Prince Rupert's passage through the town, in 1643, was resolutely opposed by the inhabitants, and a sharp skirmish took place. Birmingham shared largely in the industrial movement at the close of the last century, and rapidly reached a position of the first importance among English towns. Its inhabitants took a very prominent share in the transactions which led to the Reform Bill, and have been distinguished by their activity in all political movements since that time. It received the franchise by that measure, a municipal constitution by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, and a third representative in 1868.

Birmingham Political Union, THE, was an association formed in the beginning of 1830. Its original purpose was to obtain a repeal of the Act of 1819 for the resumption of cash payments; but it soon adopted the programme of Parliamentary Reform, and became the centre of the agitation for that purpose. As early as Feb., 1830, it was noticed and denounced in the House of Commons by Huskisson. Its leading member was Mr. Attwood, who afterwards sat in the reformed Parliament for Birmingham. The original design was "to form a general political union between the lower and middle classes of the people;" and as the political unions of many other places were affiliated to that of Birmingham, it may be said that the reform agitators of that town were practically at the head of the movement. When the House of Lords showed a disposition to reject the Bill, immense meetings were held under the auspices of the Birmingham Union, in which threats of refusal to pay taxes, and even of open violence, were freely used. In 1831 a proclamation was issued against political unions, and, in consequence, the Birmingham Union considerably modified its organisation. It continued, however, to display great activity, and on the 7th of May, 1832, all the Unions of the Midland Counties assembled at Newhall Hill, Birmingham, to the number of 160,000 members. Such proofs of the determination of the country had their effect on the House of Lords, and brought about the final acceptance of the Bill.

Birmingham Riots (1791) arose out of the intolerant party spirit which was largely evoked in England by the events of the French Revolution of 1789. In many places associations had been formed for the celebration of the 14th July, as the anniversary of the Revolution. The extreme Tories, who styled themselves "the friends of order," everywhere took alarm; and in Birmingham a handbill was circulated in which the principles and objects of the association were grossly exaggerated or misrepresented. The association at once denied its authenticity, and at first thought of giving up the meeting in consequence of the feeling excited by the circular. This opinion was, however, overruled; and the meeting took place on the 14th July. While the members of the association were at dinner, the hotel was surrounded by a mob, who, after shouting, "Church and King!" for half an hour, retired only to return in redoubled force. They then broke into the house, but found that the members had fled. Baffled and disappointed, they diverted their fury upon two Dissenting chapels, which they demolished. They next attacked the house of Dr. Priestley, and setting fire to it burnt it, together with the valuable library of its owner; and for two days and nights they carried on the work of destruction against the property of prominent Dissenters. On the third day their efforts slackened, and on the fourth several squadrons of cavalry coming into the town soon restored order.

Bishop. The highest order of clergy in the Church. The early British Church was organised under bishops, three of whom were present at the Council of Arles in 314. Christianity, which died away before the invasion of the English, was brought back in southern England by the Roman missionary Augustine, who, under the direction of Pope Gregory I., established bishops to direct the ecclesiastical affairs of his converts. In Northumbria the Columban missionaries had monastic bishops after their custom. When the conversion of England was completed, and the Church united under the Roman organisation, Archbishop Theodore (669—693) carried out the work of diocesan arrangement. The whole of England was divided into dioceses which were the sphere of administration of a bishop. England was also divided into two ecclesiastical provinces, over each of which was set an archbishop. The mode of electing bishops seems to have varied; sometimes the clergy appointed, sometimes the king in the Witenagemot. The bishops sat in the Witenagemot, and also in the shire-moots; they had temporal jurisdiction within their own lands; moreover, they exercised a penitential discipline over moral offenders, and judged the offences of the clergy. The connection between Church and State was close, and we find no disputes between the ecclesiastical and secular jurisdiction. Similarly, national or provincial councils made canons for the Church, frequently in the presence of the king and ealdormen. Bishops soon showed themselves statesmen, and Dunstan may be reckoned as the first great English minister. After the Norman Conquest William I. recognised the political importance of bishops by dispossessing the English occupants of their sees and setting Normans in their stead. Archbishop Lanfranc was in all things William I.'s chief adviser, and by his influence the ecclesiastical courts were separated from the secular courts. The bishops no longer held pleas in the hundred court or shire court, but in courts of their own, which alone decided spiritual cases according to canon law. William II. applied to the lands of bishops the full rigour of feudal extortion, and kept bishoprics vacant that he might himself receive their revenues. Under Henry I. Anselm raised the question of investitures—he refused to receive at the hands of the king investiture to a spiritual office. The result of this conflict was a compromise, by which it was agreed that bishops were to receive the emblems of their spiritual office from spiritual persons, and were to do homage to the king for their temporalities. By this change the bishops were not really benefited; their constitutional position was made more like that of barons, and lost much of its distinctive character. The election to bishoprics, according to the canons, was invested in the chapter of the cathedral churches; but practically their right was exercised in accordance with the royal will. The methods of capitular elections frequently led to disputes, which were referred to the decision of the Pope. In 1206 Pope Innocent III. rejected both the nominee of the king and of the Chapter of Canterbury, and appointed Stephen Langton archbishop. From this time the Popes frequently appointed, and appeals were common. The system of provisions was in the next century extended to bishoprics. But as the crown grew stronger in the next century the king nominated, and the Pope appointed the same person by provision. Papal interference was strong enough to overthrow the rights of chapters, but was powerless against a strong king.

The bishops of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were a strong element in the resistance to the royal oppression, and rank amongst the staunchest upholders of English liberties. But the growth of Lollardism in the fourteenth century led them to support the crown, and under Henry VIII. they were unable to oppose the royal will. The alternations of religious policy in the reigns of Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, led to frequent deprivations, imprisonment, and in the case of Crammer, Ridley, and Latimer, to the execution of bishops. In the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth the rapacity of courtiers despoiled the sees of many of their possessions. Elizabeth showed her bishops scant courtesy, suspended them at her pleasure, and even threatened them with deposition. From that time, with the exception of the reign of Charles I., bishops exercised little political influence. Under the Commonwealth episcopacy was abolished and bishops were dispossessed of their sees till the Restoration. The petition of the seven bishops to James II. against his declaration of indulgence, and their subsequent trial for libel and acquittal, is the last time when the action of bishops materially affected the course of English history.

At present a bishop is the head of the clergy within his diocese. He has the power of ordaining priests and deacons, of consecrating churches, and performing certain ecclesiastical acts according to the law of the Church; he is an ecclesiastical judge in certain cases within his diocese, and exercises disciplinary power over his clergy. There are two archbishops and thirty-one bishops in England and Wales. The Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishops of London, Durham, and Winchester, always sit as lords spiritual in the House of Lords; and of the other bishops, twenty-one are summoned to Parliament in order of seniority of creation. The Bishop of Sodor and Man is in no case a lord spiritual, and by an Act of 1847, it was enacted that the number of lords spiritual should not be increased by the creation of new bishoprics. The election to bishoprics was settled by an Act of 1544; providing that the king send to the dean and chapter his licence to elect, called his congé d'élire, which is always accompanied by a statement of the person whom he would have them elect; if they delay above twelve days the king may nominate. In the year 1848 the Dean and Chapter of Hereford elected, according to the royal congé d'élire, Dr. Hampden; but at the time of his confirmation objections against him were tendered. The Court of Queen's Bench decided that these objections need not be received, as the congé d'élire was imperative. Thus the appointment to bishoprics is practically vested in the crown.

Bishopric. The sphere within which a bishop exercises his authority. In the British Church there seem to have been three bishoprics corresponding to the three provinces into which Britain was divided by the Romans. When in 597 Pope Gregory I. sent Augustine to evangelise England, his scheme for ecclesiastical organisation was that London and York should be the centres of the island. Augustine was to be Bishop of London with twelve suffragans, and was to send another to York, who was in turn to have twelve suffragans. This scheme was not fully carried out; but the formation of sees marks the progress of the conversion of England, and the sees followed the divisions of kingdoms or tribes. Augustine at Canterbury was Bishop of Kent; in 604 he set up Justus at Rochester as Bishop of West Kent, and Mellitus at London as Bishop of the East Saxons. In 625, Paulinus was ordained Bishop of the Northumbrians with his see at York; but the work of Paulinus did not last, and Northumbria received Christianity from the Columban monks of Iona, one of whom, Aidan, was made Bishop of Lindisfarne in 635. In 630 Felix created the see of East Anglia at Dunwich. In 635 the West Saxons received as bishop Birinus, who fixed his seat at Dorchester. The see of Mercia was, in 650, set up at Lichfield. Thus the early kingdoms received bishops, and were converted into ecclesiastical dioceses. The further organisation of England was due to the energy of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Theodore, a monk of Tarsus, who laboured from 669 to 693. He broke up the large dioceses, but in so doing followed the lines of tribal arrangements that were earlier than the seven kingdoms. He divided East Anglia into north and south, and set a bishop over the northern part at Elmham in 673. He established a see for the Hecanas at Hereford in 676, and for the Lindiswaras at Sidnacester in 678. The Northumbrian Church had before this conformed to the Roman use. Its large extent was divided by the recognition of York as the see of the Deirans, while Bernicia was divided between Lindisfarne and Hexham, which was made a see in 678; in 681 the Northumbrian dominions in Strathclyde received a bishop at Whithern. In 680 the Hwiccas had a bishop at Worcester, and the Middle Angles at Leicester.

In 705 Wessex was divided by a new see at Sherborne, and in 709 a mission see for the South Saxons was set up at Selsey. In 909 King Edward the Elder divided the see of Sherborne, and gave the men of Somerset a bishop at Wells, and the men of Devon a bishop at Crediton. The troubles of Northumbria affected its episcopal arrangements; after 814 no Bishop of Hexham was appointed, and through the ravages of the Picts the bishopric of Whithorn ceased about 810. In 875 the monks of Lindisfarne were driven to quit their monastery, carrying with them the body of St. Cuthbert. In 882 they settled at Chester-le-Street, whence they were again driven in 990, and finally settled at Durham in 995.

At the time of the Norman Conquest episcopal sees were transferred from villages to cities, as being more convenient. Already in 1050 the see of Crediton had been changed to Exeter. In 1075 the see of Sherborne was removed to Old Sarum, that of Selsey to Chichester, and that of Lichfield to Coventry. The see of Dorchester was removed to Lincoln in 1085. In 1088 the see of Wells was transferred to Bath; that of Elmham, which had been transferred to Thetford in 1078, was finally established in Norwich in 1101. With the gradual conquest of South Wales the British Church lost its independence, and received Norman bishops. The Archbishop of St. David's (who had never perhaps exercised any practical authority over the other Welsh bishops) became a suffragan of the province of Canterbury in 1115; Bangor and Llandaff soon afterwards; and the see of St. Asaph was established (or possibly only re-established) in 1143. Moreover, Henry I. cared for the interests of the Church in England by subdividing the huge diocese of Lincoln in 1109, and setting a bishop over the great minster of Ely. In like manner the allegiance of the new English possession of Cumberland was strengthened by the appointment of a Bishop of Carlisle in 1133.

From this time till the Reformation no new sees were created. After the dissolution of the monasteries, Henry VIII. made some show of restoring the goods of the Church by the creation of six new bishoprics—Westminster in 1540, Gloucester, Chester, Peterborough, and Oxford in 1541, Bristol in 1542. The see of Westminster did not long continue. Its first occupant, Thomas Thirlby, wasted its possessions; he was translated to Norwich in 1550, and the see was dissolved. In 1542 the ancient see of Sodor and Man, which was founded by Pope Gregory IV., was annexed to the province of York; but as the island of Man did not come into the possession of the crown till 1825, its bishop was never a peer of Parliament. No further creations were made till the increase of population in the present century led to the formation of the see of Ripon in 1836, and of Manchester in 1847. In 1836 the sees of Gloucester and Bristol were united. An attempt to unite St. Asaph and Bangor proved abortive. Within the last few years new sees have been created by voluntary effort, according to the provision of an Act of Parliament. The sees of Truro and St. Albans were founded in 1877, that of Liverpool in 1880, that of Newcastle in 1882, and that of Southwell in 1883.

Bishopric, THE. A special title given to the patrimony of St. Cuthbert, which was ruled by the Bishops of Durham. On Cuthbert's consecration as Bishop of Lindisfarne in 683, Egfrith, the Northumbrian king, made him large grants of land round Lindisfarne, as well as the vill of Craik near York, and the town of Carlisle. In 883 the monks of Lindisfarne were fleeing with the body of their patron saint before the Danish invaders. The Danish king was dead, and his host was without a leader. St. Cuthbert appeared in a vision to Abbot Eadred, and bade him tell the Danes to take as their king a young captive who was a slave. The Danes obeyed the admonition, and their new king Guthred, aided by the advice of Alfred the Great, showed his gratitude by conferring on St. Cuthbert the land between the Tyne and the Tees. Over this new grant, and the old lands of the church of Lindisfarne, the bishop was given the rights and dignities of the king. Bishop Cuthbert (900—915) purchased the ancient parish of Bedlington north of the Tyne, with an area of thirty square miles, and received a grant of similar jurisdiction over it. It is probable that William the Conqueror, finding this state of things, considered it desirable to leave it unchanged, and recognised the lands of the church of Durham as a county palatine. [PALATINE COUNTIES.] The Bishopric was not co-extensive with the diocese of Durham. It consisted of the modern county of Durham, and the districts known as Bedlingtonshire, Islandshire, and Northamshire. Within this the bishop held his own courts and appointed his own officers; writs ran in his name, and he had his own mint. The men of the bishopric were similarly privileged, and went by the name of Halincerefole, men for the defence of St. Cuthbert and his patrimony. This exceptional position continued till the Ecclesiastical Commissioners recommended its abolition in 1833, and with the death of Bishop van Mildert, in 1836, the bishopric came to an end.

Bishops, THE SEVEN, is the appellation usually given to the prelates who were tried for their resistance to James II.'s Declaration of Indulgence (q.v.). On April 26th, 1688, the king issued his second Declaration of Indulgence, and on May 4th an Order in Council enjoined that it should be read in all churches on two successive Sundays, the bishops being required to distribute copies of it in their dioceses. The Primate Sancroft and six bishops (Ken of Bath and Wells, White of Peterborough, Lloyd of St. Asaph, Trelawny of Bristol, Lake of Chichester, and Turner of Ely) drew up and presented a petition, declaring the loyalty of the Church, but begging to be excused from reading in Divine service an illegal declaration, since Parliament had declared that the sovereign had no power to dispense with statutes. "This is the standard of rebellion," James said as he read it; and, when only four churches in London obeyed the order, he determined to take his revenge by trying the bishops for publishing a seditious libel. The bishops, after having at the king's command acknowledged their writing, were committed to the Tower, where they were visited by many Whig peers and a deputation of Non-conformist sympathisers. When the trial came on, the handwriting was proved by the evidence of the clerk, who had heard the bishops' confession; and Sunderland, whom they had begged to present it, proved the publishing. Among the counsel for the defence was Somers, afterwards Chancellor, whose speech on this occasion created his reputation. After some hours' disputing, the king's brewer, who was on the jury, was persuaded to risk the loss of royal patronage, and a verdict of Not Guilty was returned (June 30th). The action of the king in this matter lost him the active support of the Church, and disposed of it to at least acquiesce in the measures of William of Orange.

Black Act, THE (1722), was the name given to an Act passed to check the outrages committed by persons with their faces blackened or otherwise disguised, who appeared in Epping Forest, near Waltham, and destroyed the deer. The penalty of death was imposed on all such transgressions of the law. The Act was made perpetual in 1758, but was repealed in 1827.

Black Assize. [ASSIZE.]

Blackburn Riots, THE (1826), were a demonstration by the weavers of Lancashire against the use of machinery. In April a large number of persons assembled at Henfield and proceeded to Accrington, where they demolished the machinery in several mills. The mob then proceeded to Blackburn, and, though a party of dragoons arrived there as soon as the rioters, they could not prevent them from breaking into the factory of Messrs. Bannister, Eccles and Co. A collision occurred; stones and firearms were freely used by the mob; and the Riot Act was read. A great deal of Messrs. Eccles' machinery was destroyed, and much damage done all through the town; and the excitement became so dangerous that the dragoons were ordered to clear the streets. The following day a great deal of destruction was completed, and another collision occurred between the rioters and the military, in which the former were finally routed by a discharge of musketry, nine persons being killed and several wounded. Similar riots broke out next day in Manchester. Troops, however, quickly poured into the disturbed districts, and the riotous assemblages were at an end.

Black Death, THE. This name has been given to an epidemic disease of fearful destructiveness which devastated England, in common with the rest of Europe, in 1348—9, and burst forth anew in 1361—2, and again in 1369. In contemporary and later literature it is usually called the "Pestilence," or the "Great Pestilence," under the former of which expressions it is mentioned by both Chaucer and Langland. It is regarded as having been merely an aggravated outburst of the ordinary plague, which had been smouldering among the population since 1342, and was suddenly kindled into fatal activity by the working of special causes, due to natural phenomena of rare concurrence and exceptional power. The forces of nature, we are told, had been let loose; for several years mighty earthquakes, furious tornadoes of wind and rain, violent floods, clouds of locusts darkening the air or poisoning it with their corrupting bodies, and other abnormal manifestations of elemental strife, had been, from China to Europe, destroying men and their works, blighting vegetation, turning fruitful lands into noxious swamps, and polluting the atmosphere. Whether these disturbances of nature were answerable for the visitation may be questioned; but there is abundance of evidence to prove their actual occurrence, and the ablest scientific writer on the subject—Hecker—has no doubt of the connection between the adulteration of the air that followed them and the virulence of the pestilence. "This disease," he says, "was a consequence of violent commotions in the earth's organism—if any disease of cosmical origin can be so considered." It would be safe at least to suspect that the lingering traces of the epidemic of 1342, and the general physical demoralisation produced by the disturbance of the conditions of life, left men's bodies an easier prey to the malignant agency. The quickening power, however, came from the East. Carried by commerce across the Black Sea from Western Asia to Constantinople, the disease spread widely and swiftly from that centre, and early in 1347 fell upon Sicily, Marseilles, and several towns on the coast of Italy. After a brief pause at these places, it broke out with unsparing fury at Avignon in January, 1348; advanced thence to Southern France, to Spain, to Northern Italy, and early in April appeared at Florence, where it came under the observation of Boccaccio, who has left a detailed account of its action. Passing through France and visiting, but not as yet ravaging, Germany, it made its way to England. This country it entered at some point in Dorset, where it cut down its first English victims in August, 1348. Thence it travelled—by way of Devon and Somerset, of Bristol, Gloucester, and Oxford—to London, but so slowly that winter had begun before it reached the capital. Soon it embraced the whole kingdom; no spot, however isolated, escaped its rage; England became a mere pest-house. Its chief symptoms in this country were spitting, in some cases actual vomiting, of blood, the breaking out of inflammatory boils in parts, or over the whole, of the body, and the appearance of those dark blotches upon the skin which suggested its most startling name. Some of its victims died almost on the first attack, some in twelve hours, some in two days, almost all within the first three. Before it medical skill was powerless; few recovered, until, as the plague drew towards its close, men bethought them of opening the hard, dry boils—a treatment that relieved the system of the venom and saved many lives. Contagion bore it everywhere; the clothes, the breath, everything the patient touched, the very air that surrounded him, were poisoned with it; even a glance of his eye, men fancied, might strike down the onlooker. Its career in England on this visitation lasted for about a year; but its destructive energy would seem to have been at its height between May, 1349, and the following Michaelmas, the summer heats doubtless stimulating its fury. The havoc it made in the population far exceeded that made by any similar scourge recorded in history; the exaggerations of a contemporary annalist, gross as they are, help us to realise its extent. "Towns, once close packed with men, were stripped of their inhabitants; and to so pernicious a power did the plague rise that the living were scarce able to bury the dead. In certain religious houses, out of twenty inmates there hardly survived two. By several it was reckoned that barely a tenth part of the population had been left alive." It is stated that it slew 100,000 human beings in London—50,000 of whom were buried in a plot of ground which Sir Walter Manny had bought for the purpose, a space now covered by Smithfield—nearly 60,000 in Norwich, and proportionate numbers in Bristol and other leading cities. These numbers are thought incredible; but one scrupulously careful living writer has found evidence which satisfies him that at least half the population died by this outbreak, whilst another, of equal industry, admits that the full sum of the victims cannot have been less than a third. And the leaning of historians is generally towards the higher reckoning, by which the actual carnage would amount, at highest, to 2,500,000, at lowest, to 1,500,000, for the estimates of the population at the time range from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. For obvious reasons, the mortality was greatest among the clergy and the humbler classes; yet the contagion reached even the highest. A newly-elected Primate, Bradwardine, and Edward III's daughter, Joan, caught it and perished. For a time its progress seemed arrested by the Scottish border, and "the foul death of the English" is said to have been a favourite oath with the Scots, who felt a malicious pleasure in their enemies' misfortunes; but the scoffers soon involved themselves in the same disasters by making a foolish raid into England, and the work of death went forward in Scotland also. The disease passed over to Ireland, where, if report can be trusted, it discriminated between the intruding English and the natives; the former were taken and the latter left. Its immediate effects on society were of the kind usual in such frightful calamities. Humanity showed itself at its worst and its best: there was much reckless profligacy and revolting selfishness, but not a few examples of self-sacrificing devotion. The terror-stricken rushed to religion for comfort and help; many gave up lands and goods, and sought a haven in monasteries; an earlier and fierce fanaticism—that of the Flagellants—was reorganised, and fascinated or horrified men by its ghastly ritual. The permanent impression that the Black Death made on the human memory is shown in several ways—in this conspicuously, that it was set up as a fixed mark to reckon time from; it was long a practice to date charters and legal instruments from it. Far more important were its economic and remoter historical consequences. The great social movement of the fourteenth century gained by it an impetus, if not an originating force, and found in it the most favourable conditions of success; it led, by regular stages, to the rising of the commons under Wat Tyler; and the whole system of farming was revolutionised by it. It has even been surmised that England owes to it the picturesque hedge-rows that divide her fields. It is certain that the wages of labour at once more than doubled through the scarcity of labourers; that proclamations were issued and statutes were passed fixing the price of labour at its former rate, and imposing penalties on all who demanded or gave more; that, these proving ineffective, others, and again others, were passed with the same aim and a like result; that ill feeling arose between those who lived by and those who lived on manual labour, which at last drove the working classes into rebellion. And the difficulty of getting their lands tilled by the old method of vassal services and hired labour forced the lords and religious houses to break up their estates, hitherto managed for them by bailiffs, into farms, which they let on leases to the actual tillers of the soil. But this was the issue of a long and complicated process, the details of which are too abundant to be given here. The visitations of 1361—2 and 1369 were also formidable in the extent of their ravages, yet mild as compared with their terrible predecessor. They may be regarded as stages in the gradual settling down of the "great mortality" into the endemic state that it remained in for centuries.

Black Dog of Arden, THE, was the nickname applied by Piers Gaveston to Guy, Earl of Warwick. "Does he call me dog?" said Warwick. "Let him beware lest I bite him."

Walsingham, Hist. Angliæ (Rolls Series), vol. i. 115, 138.

Black Friday was the name given to the 11th of May, 1866, when a commercial panic was at its height.

Black Hole of Calcutta, THE (June 20, 1756). Suraj-ud-Dowlah, the Nawab of Bengal, a young man, cruel, effeminate, and debauched, who succeeded Alivardi Khan early in 1756, was greatly enraged with the English at Calcutta for concealing a fugitive from him. He marched down on Calcutta on June 18 on the pretence that the English had erected some new fortifications without consulting him. The town was ill-prepared to resist an assault, and was moreover weakened by the disgraceful desertion of Mr. Drake, the governor, with the military commandant, who slipped off unperceived, and rowed down to the ships. Mr. Holwell was thereupon placed in command by common consent, and the fort was gallantly held for forty-eight hours, when it became necessary to surrender. The Nawab gave Mr. Holwell every assurance of protection, and retired about dusk to his encampment. In spite of this the prisoners, 146 in number, were thrust into a narrow chamber, some twenty feet square, which had been used as the prison of the garrison, and, however suited for the confinement of a few turbulent soldiers, meant simply death to the crowd thrust into it at the sword's point in one of the hottest nights of the most sultry season of the year.

The agonies endured during this terrible night were horrible beyond expression. The night was intensely hot, and as the torments of thirst and suffocation came upon them, the prisoners struggled with one another for a mouthful of fresh air at the windows. They insulted the guards to induce them to fire on them. The majority died in raving madness; and the few who survived owed their lives to the freer ventilation obtained by standing on the bodies of their dead or dying companions. Twenty-three ghastly survivors alone were dragged out the next morning. Mr. Holwell was so broken that he had to be carried before the Nawab, who manifested no compunction at the results of his infamous cruelty.

Black Mail was the compulsory payment exacted by the border chieftains from the dwellers in the more civilised districts on the English side in return for the protection of their cattle and goods. The levy of black mail was made a felony by 43 Eliz., c. 13 (1601). The name was also given to the payment made to the chiefs of some of the Highland clans by those who lived in their neighbourhood in return for the immunity of their cattle from capture. It did not entirely cease till 1745.

Black Mountain War, THE (1868). The Hussunzye tribe of Afghans, inhabiting the Agor Valley in the Black Mountain range, broke out into hostilities and attacked a police station. As they showed no disposition to submit, General Wyld was sent against them, Sept. 26th, and after various operations, which lasted till the 7th of Nov., reduced the insurgents, who submitted, and the force was withdrawn on the 10th. Black Sea Conference, THE. In 1871, in consequence of a declaration by Russia that she would no longer be bound by the Treaty of Paris of 1856 with regard to the navigation of the Black Sea, a Conference of the Powers was invited to meet at London to settle the questions. In assuming a right to abolish her own treaty engagements, there can be no doubt that Russia counted upon some general understanding she had arrived at with Prussia, to the effect that the latter power would assist her in effecting her wishes. Some delay arose in the assembling of the Conference owing to the anomalous position of France, but on Dec. 18th, Lord Granville received a formal intimation that a French plenipotentiary would present himself at the Conference. The emergency at Paris, however, prevented this, and the representatives of the other powers proceeded to deliberate without France; but the Duke de Broglie, the French plenipotentiary, eventually appeared on March 13th. As the result of the Conference the Treaty of London was concluded. Its provisions were that articles XI., XIII., and XIV. of the Treaty of Paris, 1856, are abrogated; that the principle of closing the Dardanelles and Bosphorus is maintained with power to the Sultan to open the said straits to the fleets of friendly and allied powers, in the event that the execution of the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris should require it; that the commission for managing the navigation of the Danube should be continued in its present form for a further period of twelve years. The result of this treaty was to open the Black Sea to Russian ships of war, and to allow the Sultan to open the Dardanelles to foreign ships of war if the defence of his throne required it.

Black Watch, THE, was the name originally given to the semi-independent bodies of Highlanders who were entrusted by the English government with the duty of keeping order in the Highlands. They were embodied as a regiment of the regular army (the 43rd, afterwards the 42nd) in 1740. Three years afterwards they were removed to London. In May, 1743, the greater part of the regiment mutinied, and set out northwards. They were pursued, surrounded, and compelled to surrender. Three ringleaders were put to death, and the remainder of the regiment sent to the West Indies and to Flanders. As a regiment of the regular army the Black Watch has since borne a distinguished part in nearly all the wars in which England has been engaged.

Blackheath, THE BATTLE OF (June 22, 1497), was fought between the troops of Henry VII. and the Cornish rebels. The rebels had taken up a strong position on a hill at Blackheath, within sight of London. The king had recalled the troops destined for service against Scotland, and had collected together at London a large army composed of all the fighting men in the neighbouring counties. He stationed one portion of his army (under his personal command) in St. George's fields. A second detachment, under the command of the Earls of Oxford and Suffolk, was ordered to make a circuitous march round the hill occupied by the rebels, and take up as strong a position as possible in their rear. The remainder of his forces, under Lord Daubeney, he sent forward to attack the rebels in front. The Cornishmen fought bravely; but ill-armed, ill-led, without horse or artillery, they were unable to offer any long resistance to the disciplined, well-equipped troops who attacked them in front and rear simultaneously. Two thousand of their number were slain, and the remainder surrendered. Among the large number of prisoners were the rebel leaders Lord Audley, Michael Joseph, and Thomas Flammock, who were put to death.

Blacklow Hill, an eminence between Warwick and Coventry, was the scene of the execution of Piers Gaveston by the revolted barons under the Earls of Lancaster and Warwick in 1312.

Blackstone, SIR WILLIAM (b. 1723, d. 1780), was the posthumous son of a Cheapside silk-mercator, and was educated at the Charterhouse and Pembroke College, Oxford. He obtained a fellowship at All Souls, and was called to the bar by the Middle Temple in 1746. His practice was never large, and after a few years he devoted his attention mainly to collegiate matters. As bursar of All Souls he showed administrative skill and zeal for reform; and the building of the Codrington Library was mainly due to his exertions. In 1757 he was elected to a fellowship at Queen's College, where his architectural activities again displayed themselves. A year later he was elected to the newly founded Vinerian Professorship of Law, and delivered from that chair the lectures which were subsequently (1765) embodied in the "Commentaries." The fame of his lectures caused him to return to a more active professional life. In 1761 he was appointed Principal of New Inn Hall, a post which he held for five years in the vain hope of establishing at Oxford a college for legal education. He also during this period sat in Parliament for Hendon and Westbury. From 1770 until his death he was one of the Judges of the Common Pleas. As a writer upon law his faults are mainly those of his age—an unsystematic arrangement and a loose terminology. Bentham has exposed these faults with great vehemence, but at the same time does full justice to Blackstone's merits as an expounder. "He it is," he says, "who, first of all institutional writers, has taught jurisprudence to speak the language of the scholar and the gentleman." This sentence accurately represents Blackstone's claim to be remembered, and will explain why laymen regard his work with reverence and lawyers with indifference.

Besides the Commentaries on the Laws of England, of which numerous editions have appeared, Blackstone wrote several tracts on questions of constitutional law, that on the Middlesex Election, and on the Extent of the Powers of Parliament, being the two best known. The Commentaries have been rearranged with doubtful advantage by R. M. Kerr and Mr. Serjeant Stephen. A Life by J. C. Clitheroe is prefaced to Blackstone's Reports (folio, 1781). A biography and list of works published, and in manuscript, by a "Gentleman of Lincoln's Inn" (Dr. Douglass), appeared in 1782. See also Montague Burrows, Worthies of All Souls, and Junius, Letter xviii.

Blackwater, THE BATTLE OF (1598), was fought near the fort of that name in Tyrone. Hugh O'Neil, called the "arch rebel," here defeated the English Marshal, Sir Henry Bagnall, who had marched to the relief of the fort. O'Neil killed the English leader with his own hands. One thousand five hundred of the English fell, and all their stores and ammunition were captured by the Irish, as well as the fort itself. The forces engaged on each side amounted to something like 5,000 men. This victory led at the time to an almost general revolt of the natives.

Bladensburg, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 24, 1814), fought during the American War, took its name from a small village on the left bank of the eastern branch of the Potomac. This position commanded the only bridge over the river; and here the American general, Winder, prepared to oppose the advance of the British, under General Ross, upon Washington. To effect their object it was necessary for the British to carry the bridge and the commanding position of the Americans. Ross accordingly formed his forces into two columns, one under Thornton, the other commanded by Brooke. The attack was entrusted to the former; and so fierce an onslaught did his column make upon the defenders of the bridge that it was carried immediately, together with a fortified house at the farther end. On the other side of the river, Thornton's column was joined by Brooke's men, and a general attack was made upon the American position. One impetuous charge carried it, and the whole American army broke in confusion, and, flying through Washington, never stopped till they had taken up a position on the heights of Georgetown. After a short rest, the British advanced, and on the same evening entered Washington without encountering any further opposition.

Blake, ROBERT (b. 1597, d. 1657), was born at Bridgewater and educated at Oxford. He sat in the Long Parliament as member for Bridgewater. At the outbreak of the Civil War he raised a regiment, took part in the defence of Bristol, and successfully held Taunton against the Royalists. In 1649 Colonel Blake was appointed one of the commanders of the navy, and shortly afterwards Warden of the Cinque Ports. He was eminently successful as a naval commander. He drove Prince Rupert from the British seas, and compelled him to take refuge in the Tagus, and, in January, 1651, destroyed almost the entire Royalist fleet in Malaga Harbour. Later in the year he recovered the Channel Islands from the Royalists, and was made a member of the Council of State. In May, 1652, he fought a sharp but indecisive action with the Dutch in the Straits of Dover; and on September 18 defeated them in the Downs. In November he fought a terrible engagement against the Dutch under Van Tromp, whose forces were greatly superior. The English were defeated and compelled to take refuge in the Thames. Blake was present in the bloody and obstinate engagements in February and June, 1653, but, owing to ill-health, took no part in the great English victory of July 29, in which Van Tromp was killed. When war broke out between England and Spain in 1656, Blake was appointed to command the English fleet in the Mediterranean. In April he performed the daring feat of sailing into the harbour of Teneriffe in spite of the fire from the forts, and captured a large fleet of galleons which lay at anchor there. He died the year following, just as he was entering Plymouth Sound. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, but after the Restoration his remains were disinterred and hung at Tyburn. Clarendon speaks in very high terms of his ability as a naval commander. "He was the first man that declined the old track, and made it manifest that the science might be attained in less time than was imagined; and despised those rules which had been long in practice, to keep his ship and his men out of danger, which had been held in former times a point of great ability and circumspection; as if the principal art requisite in the captain of a ship had been to be sure to come safe home again."

Blanche, DAUGHTER OF HENRY IV. (b. 1392, d. 1409), was married in 1403 to Louis of Bavaria, eldest son of the Emperor Rupert.

Blanche of Lancaster. [LANCASTER.]

Blanche of Navarre, wife of Edward Crouchback (second son of Henry III.), and mother of Thomas of Lancaster (executed after the battle of Boroughbridge, 1320), was the daughter of Robert of Artois, brother of St. Louis, and the widow of Henry, King of Navarre.

Bland, JOHN (July, 1555), the rector of Adisham in Kent, was one of the martyrs of the Protestant persecution of Mary's reign. Being convicted of heresy by a commission composed of Thornton, Bishop of Dover, Collins, the deputy of Cardinal Pole, and Nicholas Harpsfeld, the archdeacon, he was burnt at Canterbury.

Bland's Case (1586). John Bland, a currier of London, was brought to the bar of the House of Commons for using slanderous language, saying that the carriers could get no justice in the House, and that the shoemakers were unjustly favoured. On account of his poverty he was dismissed upon making his submission on his knees, and paying twenty shillings to the sergeant. This is an important precedent for the power of the House of Commons to punish even persons who are not members for offences against its privileges.

D'Ewes, Journals of the Parliaments of Queen Elizabeth (1682), p. 366.

Blanketeers. The name given to a body of Manchester workmen who met at St. Peter's Field, March 10, 1817, each man carrying a blanket or great coat with him. It was intended to join the Derby rioters, and march on London; but the attempt proved completely abortive.

Blasphemy. Before the Reformation, offences against religion, of which blasphemy was one, were almost exclusively dealt with in the ecclesiastical courts, and several statutes, passed in the fifteenth century, gave the bishops power to deal with the offences. These powers were not finally dropped till the temporary suppression of the ecclesiastical courts in 1640, and their revival after the Restoration without the ex-officio oath. In 1677 the common law writ, de hæretico comburendo, was abolished by Parliament; but the judges henceforward treated blasphemy as an offence at common law. It has been held to consist of denial of the being and providence of God, or uttering contumelious reproaches against Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost, or denying the truth of Christianity. According to the celebrated judgment of Lord Hales in the case of Rez v. Taylor, "Christianity being parcel of the law of England, to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law;" but in a later case (1883) it has been held that a person may attack the fundamentals of religion without being guilty of a blasphemous libel "if the decencies of controversy are observed." Penalties against blasphemy were enacted by 9 and 11 Will. III., cap. 32, and by 53 Geo. III., c. 160. In Scotland a statute of 1661 prescribed the penalty of death for blasphemy, which was mitigated to fines and imprisonment by 6 Geo. IV., and 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vict., c. 5.

Blenheim, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 13, 1704), was fought during the third campaign in the War of the Spanish Succession. Louis XIV. had determined to menace Vienna, hoping to strike at the heart of the Austrian power, and at the same time to make full use of the assistance of his Bavarian ally. Marlborough, however, perceived his object and effected a junction with Prince Eugene, who commanded the Imperial forces in Würtemberg. They were hampered by their colleague, Prince Louis of Baden, a general of the old formal school. The Schellenberg, a hill above Donauwörth, was stormed, and the Bavarians driven from it. Next day Marshal Tallard effected a junction with the armies of Marshal Marsin and the Elector of Bavaria. Marlborough and Eugene got rid of Louis of Baden by persuading him to attack the fortress of Ingolstadt, and prepared for a decisive battle near Blindheim or Blenheim. This village was situated on the northern bank of the Danube, near the place where it is joined by a little brook, the Nebel. About two miles away, and nearly parallel to the river, is a range of low wooded hills. The small stream of the Nebel runs from these hills. The Nebel divided the two armies. Marlborough commanded the left of the allied forces, Eugene the right. Tallard was opposed to Marlborough, the Elector of Bavaria and Marsin to Eugene. Tallard committed the great error of throwing all his best troops into Blenheim, thereby weakening the centre. The attack of Lord Cutts on the village was repulsed. Marlborough, seeing the weakness of the French centre, threw his cavalry across the Nebel, and after a terrific struggle cut the French line in two. Meanwhile, on the right, Eugene only saved the battle by the steadiness of his Prussian infantry. He had been greatly hampered by the difficulties of the ground. Marlborough's cavalry charge on the French centre had won the day. The French cavalry fled; Tallard was taken prisoner. The French troops in Blenheim were surrounded, and surrendered after a gallant resistance; but the forces opposed to Eugene retreated in good order. The allies are computed to have lost 11,000 men out of an army of 52,000, the French altogether 40,000 out of 60,000, including 14,000 prisoners. The broken army of the enemy retreated with extreme rapidity, and withdrew beyond the Rhine.

Bligh, CAPTAIN WILLIAM, well known in connection with the mutiny on the Bounty, in April, 1789, which was caused by his tyrannical conduct, was in 1806 appointed Governor of New South Wales, but his appointment was so unpopular, and his conduct so harsh and despotic, that in January, 1808, he was deposed by the colonists, and the other civil and military officers of the colony, and sent back to England. Blockade. [NEUTRALITY; ARMED NEUTRALITY; PARIS, DECLARATION OF.]

Blockade, THE AMERICAN. It is a principle of international law that a State cannot blockade its own ports. When, therefore, the American Civil War broke out in 1861, President Lincoln had to choose between the blockade or the declaration that the Confederate ships were pirates. The American government chose the former, and on the 19th of April declared the ports of the revolted provinces to be blockaded. This practically recognised the existence of war with the Confederates, and the English government were therefore justified in recognising the Southern States as belligerents, which was done May 14, 1861. The Federal government protested that the recognition by England was an unfriendly act, but subsequent writers on international law, both American and English, are agreed that England was acting strictly according to the recognised principles of the law of nations.

Bloet, ROBERT, BISHOP OF LINCOLN (d. 1123), though born of obscure parentage, was Chancellor in 1090, which office he held till his appointment to the see of Lincoln in 1093. He became one of Henry I.'s chief ministers, and is the first man to whom is given the title of Justiciar, indicating a definite office. He held this office from 1100 to 1107, when he probably fell out of favour with the king, and retired into private life. Henry of Huntingdon, who was brought up by the bishop, gives an interesting picture of his household, and says that Bloet "excelled all other men in grace of person, in serenity of temper, and in courtesy of speech."

Henry of Huntingdon, Hist. Anglor., p. 300 (Rolls Series).

Blois, PETER OF (d. 1200), was descended from a noble family of Brittany, and studied at Paris and Bologna. Subsequently he opened a school at Paris, and was invited to England by Henry II. He became Chancellor of Canterbury Cathedral, and afterwards Archdeacon of Bath, but was deprived of it for his attachment to William Longchamp. Afterwards, however, he was made Archdeacon of London and prebendary of St. Paul's. He was the author of numerous letters, more than 200 of which are extant. Many of them are very valuable for their notices of the politics and manners of the writer's age. The Continuation of Ingulf's History of Crowland from 1089 to 1117 professes to have been written by Peter of Blois; but it is probable that it was composed at a later date.

Hardy, Descriptive Catalogue, II. 128. Peter of Blois' Epistles were printed by Dr. Giles in the Patres Ecclesie Anglicane, Oxford, 1847; and they will be found in Migne, Patrologia, vol. 207.

Blondel, or Blondian, DE NESLE, was a celebrated French troubadour who became attached to the court of Richard I. He is said to have discovered the place of the king's imprisonment in Germany by singing the king's own favourite lays before each keep and fortress till the unfinished song was at length taken up and answered from the windows of the castle of Loewenstein, where Richard was imprisoned. The story, however, does not appear to be older than the fifteenth century.

Blondel, ROBERT (b. 1390? d. 1460?), was a member of the court of Charles VII. of France, and was chaplain to Queen Mary of Anjou. He wrote several works designed to excite his countrymen to shake off the English yoke, and was the author of a work called De Reductione Normannie, which is a highly valuable contemporary narrative of the expulsion of the English from Northern France.

Blondel's De Red. Norm. is printed in Mr. Stevenson's Expulsion of the English from Normandy (Rolls Series), 1863.

Blood, COLONEL THOMAS (d. 1681), was an Irish soldier of fortune remarkable for his reckless audacity. In 1663 he joined a conspiracy to seize Dublin Castle, but the plot being discovered, he fled. In 1670 he seized the Duke of Ormond in the streets of London with the intention of hanging him at Tyburn, but the duke fortunately escaped. In the next year Blood distinguished himself by attempting to carry off the Regalia from the Tower, and very nearly succeeded in his object. Charles II., however, pardoned him, and gave him an estate worth £500 a year.

Blore Heath, THE BATTLE OF (1459), was fought, during the Wars of the Roses, between the Lancastrians, under Lord Audley, and the Yorkists, who were commanded by the Earl of Salisbury. The latter was marching southwards with the intention of effecting a junction with the Duke of York, and Lord Audley was despatched to intercept him. They met on Blore Heath, about two miles and a half from Market Drayton, in Staffordshire. The Yorkists, though inferior in numbers, were completely victorious. Lord Audley, and many other leading men on the same side, were killed, and a large number of prisoners were taken. Salisbury's further march was uninterrupted, and he effected a junction with the Duke of York at Ludlow.

Boadicea, Buddig, or Boudicca (the ordinary form of the name has been stigmatised as "the gibberish of editors") (d. 62), was the widow of Prasutagus, chief of the Iceni, and was the leader of the great revolt against the Romans in the time of Suetonius Paulinus. The tyranny and oppression of the conquerors had been brought to a climax by the atrocious treatment to which Boadicea and her daughters were subjected, and the revolt she headed was a national one, and included most of the peoples of Central and Eastern Britain. Her success at first was very great. The Romans were slaughtered in great numbers, and many of their important towns taken, including the colonies of Camulodunum, Londinium, and Verulamium. But the return of Suetonius and his veterans turned the tide, and the British were signally defeated in a great battle outside London. According to Tacitus, Boadicea committed suicide, but Dio Cassius asserts that she died a natural death. Her revolt taught the Romans that the Britons were still capable of resistance to oppression, and the recall of Suetonius in the next year was the inauguration of a milder and more conciliatory policy.

Booher, JOAN (Joan of Kent), was an Anabaptist who was condemned by the commissioners appointed to inquire into heresy in 1549. Their report being that she held heretical and erroneous opinions on the nature of the incarnation, she was burnt to death May 2nd, 1550. "She died," says Mr. Froude (Hist. of Eng., v. 291), "being one of the very few victims of the ancient hatred of heresy with which the Reformed Church of England has to charge itself."

Bocland, in Anglo-Saxon legal phraseology, was that land which was held by book or charter. Originally, it was distinguished both from the "folcland," or public domain, and from the "ethel," or estate, which was held by an individual by prescriptive right. But in later times the characteristics of ethel land were lost, and bocland was equivalent to "alod," or land which was held in full ownership by an individual, whether it had been inherited as part of an original allotment, or whether it had been separated from the public land and allotted to an individual by the king and the Witan, by charter or legal process. Bocland might be alienated inter vivos, or devised by will, and it might be entailed or otherwise limited in descent. The owner was not liable to any public burdens on his land, except the trinoda necessitas. [LAND, TENURE OF.]

Boece, or Boetius, HECTOR (b. 1465? d. 1536), Scottish historian, was born at Dundee, studied at Aberdeen and Paris, and became first Principal of the King's College at Aberdeen. He was the author of a History of Scotland, first published in Latin in 1526, and translated into English by Bellenden ten years later. It is composed with a good deal of literary skill, but is altogether valueless as an authority, the narrative being full of legends and romantic tales of all kinds. Boece's History was very popular, and through it, as Mr. Burton says, "the wondrous tale of the annals of Scotland got a hold on the European mind."

A metrical version of the Bulk of the Chronicles of Scotland of Hector Boece was executed by William Stewart at the command of Margaret, wife of James IV. It has been edited by Mr. W. B. Turnbull in the Rolls Series (1858).

Bohemia, RELATIONS WITH. Dealings between England and Bohemia begin with the grant of the Emperor Henry VII. to his son John, which established a German line of kings in Bohemia, and involved it in Western politics. John constantly resided in France, and, as the opponent of Louis of Bavaria and the friend of Philip of Valois, was led by his restless chivalry to take part in the war against England, which ended by his death at Crecy (1346). His son, Charles IV., was of a more practical temperament; and the same Diet at Metz which accepted the Golden Bull witnessed his attempted mediation between France and England. In time more intimate relations grew up on the marriage of Anne of Bohemia, his daughter, with Richard II. Under Wenzel, her brother, still more than under Charles, the Luxemburg house had become national Kings of Bohemia at the expense of the Imperial dignity, which degenerated into a mere title. Hence close dealings between Bohemia and England; and as Catholicism and the Papacy were associated with the hated German influence, the Bohemian national party greedily listened to the doctrines of Wiclif, which all the Bohemians at Richard's court had ample opportunities of learning. What in England was mere abstract dialectic, and at best the expression of inarticulate discontent, was turned by Bohemian patriotism into the watchwords of a national party of religious Puritanism. Prague became a more popular Oxford. Jerome of Prague actually brought Wiclif's teaching from the Thames to the Moldau. The direction taken by Huss was entirely the result of English influence. In one library there are still five treatises of Wiclif copied out in his own hand, with copious notes. Henry V. had already become intimately allied to Sigismund, by their common efforts to restore the unity of Christendom. A fresh link of orthodox antagonism to heresy united the sovereigns if it separated the peoples. The Council of Constance marks the time of their closest approximation. With the suppression of the national movement, Bohemia sinks into insignificance or dependence. Ferdinand I. unites its crown with the Austrian house. Only on the last attempt at the assertion of Bohemian nationality, which in 1618 led to the endeavour to set aside Ferdinand of Styria for Frederick of the Palatinate, the son-in-law of James I., were direct relations between the two States renewed. But though the cause of the Protestant Pfalzgraf, was exceedingly popular in England, James refused to support him until it was too late. The battle on the Weissberg (1620) destroyed at once the fortunes of Frederick and Elizabeth, and the nationality and independence of the Czech kingdom.

Palacky, Geschichte von Böhmen, is perhaps the best general authority on Bohemian history.

Mr. Creighton's History of the Papacy (Bk. II., ch. iii. and iv.) brings out very clearly the connection between Huss and Wiclif. Cf. Milman, Latin Christianity (vol. viii.), and Lenz, König Sigismund und Heinrich V. For the history of the Palgrave's relations with England, see S. B. Gardner, Hist. of Eng., 1603—1648.

Bohun, THE FAMILY OF, was founded by a certain Humphrey de Bohun, said to have been a kinsman of William I. In 1199 Henry de Bohun was created Earl of Hereford by John (apparently inheriting the office of Constable from his father Humphrey, whose mother was the daughter of Miles, Earl of Hereford and Lord High Constable). He married the daughter of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, Earl of Essex, and upon the death of his brother-in-law, the last Earl of Essex of the house of Mandeville, succeeded to his estates. His son Humphrey, second Earl of Hereford, was created Earl of Essex about 1236. William de Bohun—who fought at Crecy—fourth son of the fourth Earl of Hereford, was created Earl of Northampton 1337. His son succeeded to the earldoms of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton, and died 1372, leaving two daughters, Eleanor—who married Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester—and Mary—who married Henry of Bolingbroke (afterwards Henry IV.), who thus gained the earldoms of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton.

Bois-le-Duc, THE BATTLE OF (Nov. 12, 1794), was fought during the campaign of the allies with the English contingent under the Duke of York, in Flanders. For some time past great preparations had been pushed forward by Moreau in obedience to the instructions of the Committee of Public Safety at Paris, who were resolved on subjugating Holland while the severity of the winter had neutralised the defensive advantages of the country. To carry out this project, the first step was to cross the Meuse, and, with this object in view, boats for a bridge had been collected at Fort Crèvecoeur on that river. When all preparations had been completed, the passage was attempted at day-break on the 12th. But the firm resistance of the allies, under the Duke of York, prevented all the attempts of the French, though Moreau omitted no pains or skill; and at length, seeing that it was impossible to carry the passage, that able engineer desisted from the attempt, and placed his troops in winter quarters between the Meuse and the Rhine.

Boleyn, ANNE. [ANNE BOLEYN.]

Boleyn, MARY. An elder sister of Anne Boleyn, second queen of Henry VIII., and at one time herself an object of the king's passionate admiration. This, however, was one of Henry's earlier attachments, and took place at a period when his affection for Catherine of Arragon was still sufficiently strong to prevent his seriously entertaining any idea of a second marriage by means of a divorce. Mary Boleyn married, in July, 1521, Sir William Pavay, a descendant of the Beaufort family, and, disappearing for awhile from the vicinity of the court, was spared any renewal of the fickle king's dangerous attentions.

Boleyn, SIR THOMAS. [WILTSHIRE, EARL OF.]

Bolingbroke, HENRY. [HENRY IV.]

Bolingbroke, HENRY ST. JOHN, VISCOUNT (b. 1678, d. 1751), the son of Sir Henry St. John, was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In the year 1700 he married, and in the following year entered Parliament for Wootton Bassett, and attached himself to Harley and the Tories. When Harley was appointed Secretary of State in 1706, St. John was made Secretary for War. He retired with the ministry in 1708, and returned, when the Tories came in again after the Sacheverell episode, in 1710, as one of the Secretaries of State. The position of that party was a doubtful and dangerous one. Peace was loudly called for by a section of the people, and was in itself a desirable enough object. But there is little to be urged in excuse of the steps by which it was brought about. Under St. John's conduct, England deserted her allies, and, in violation of all her agreements, proceeded to enter into private negotiations with France. [UTRECHT, TREATY OF.] At home the Tory leaders were engaged in a course of intrigues, with the object of counteracting the predominance the Whigs were sure to gain under the house of Hanover. The army and the civil service were being gradually filled with men who were really Jacobites, and the design seems to have been entertained of changing the succession. The struggle for power between Harley, now Earl of Oxford, and Bolingbroke (called to the Upper House as Viscount Bolingbroke in 1712) interfered with this project, and very greatly weakened the party. Through the influence of Lady Masham with the queen, Oxford was dismissed in July 2, 1714. But Bolingbroke's tenure of undivided power was very short. On the 30th of July the queen was seized with the attack of apoplexy which was to prove fatal to her. At the council which was summoned on the emergency, the Whig Dukes Argyll, Somerset, and Shrewsbury succeeded in carrying the resolution by which the last-named became Lord Treasurer. On the death of the queen (Aug. 1) Bolingbroke deliberated, and was lost. The Whig dukes seized the reins of government, proclaimed the Elector king, and sent special messengers summoning him to England. The new Parliament was violently Whig. Bolingbroke, knowing that he would be impeached, fled to France (March 25, 1715). On the 10th of June he was impeached, and on the 16th of September his name was struck off the list of peers and sentence of banishment was passed upon him. He now entered the service of the Pretender, and was nominated by that prince his Secretary of State; but in 1716 he was dismissed from the prince's employment, and a breach took place between him and the extreme Jacobites. For some years he remained in France, devoting himself chiefly to study and to the society of the Marquise de Villette, a niece of Madame de Maintenon, whom he ultimately married. In 1723 he was permitted to return to England, and an Act of Parliament was passed allowing him to enjoy his property; but he was still excluded from the House of Lords. He joined the opposition against Walpole, and for many years carried on relentless hostilities with that minister by means of intrigue and political journalism. He contributed largely to the Craftsman, a periodical which had a large circulation, and a reputation very damaging to Walpole's cause. In 1735, however, he found it prudent once more to withdraw to France, where he remained till 1742. On the fall of Walpole, he found that his allies in opposition were not disposed to admit him to any share of power. He withdrew altogether from politics, and spent the remaining nine years of his life in philosophical retirement at Battersea. Bolingbroke's writings produced more effect on the thought of the eighteenth century than their intrinsic merits seem to warrant. His political and historical works, of which the chief are Letters on the Study of History, Remarks on the History of England, A Dissertation upon Parties, The Idea of a Patriot King, and A Letter to Sir William Windham, are evidently composed in great part to justify his own action in public life; but they contain a good deal of suggestive disquisition, and some fine passages of declamatory eloquence.

Bolingbroke's Works were published by Mallet in 1754 in 5 vols. His Correspondence appeared in 1793, edited by Gilbert Fiske. See also the essay on Bolingbroke in Résumé de l'Angleterre au Dix-huitième Siècle; G. W. Bolingbroke, ROGER (d. 1441), a chaplain of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, was executed for having conspired with Eleanor Cobham, Duchess of Gloucester, to destroy King Henry VI. by magical incantations.

Bolton Castle, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, was the scene of Mary Stuart's imprisonment, 1568. The intrigues of the Queen of Scots caused her to be removed in the following year to the "straiter custody" of the Earl of Shrewsbury at Tutbury.

Bombay. A presidency and governorship of British India. The town and island of Bombay were ceded to England in 1661, as part of the dowry of Catherine of Braganza on her marriage with Charles II. A few years afterwards it was handed over to the East India Company in return for a nominal annual payment. In 1687 Bombay was constituted a separate presidency; but in 1753 it was under the authority of the Calcutta government. The dominions of the presidency were very limited in extent until the wars with the Mahrattas, comprehending only the town and island of Bombay, with Salsette and Bassein; but by the end of the administration of the Marquis of Hastings it included Surat, Broach, Ahmednuggur, Belgaum, Sholapoor, and the whole dominions which had belonged to the Poonah state, with the exception of Sattara, which was annexed in 1848. In 1843, on the conquest of Scinde, that province was also placed under the Governor of Bombay.

Bond of Association (1584). [ASSOCIATION.]

Boniface of Savoy (d. 1270), Archbishop of Canterbury (1245—1270), was the son of Thomas, Count of Savoy, and consequently uncle to Eleanor of Provence, wife of Henry III. To this connection he owed his appointment to the archbishopric. He was one of the most unclerical and most unpopular of our archbishops; his sympathies were with the foreigners at Henry III.'s court, and his tastes were military. At times when his interests seemed to be opposed by the Poitevins he sided with the Barons, but his policy was a purely selfish one, and seen through by all parties. During the Barons' War he was absent from England, but returned after the battle of Evesham, and is said to have accompanied Prince Edward on his Crusade.

Boniface, SAINT (b. 680, d. 755), born at Crediton, was a monk of the Exeter monastery. His original name was Winfrith. In 715 he set out for Rome, and received a commission to preach to the heathen nations of Germany. His earnest missionary labours met with the greatest success in Friesland, Thuringia, and Franconia, and immense numbers were converted. He laboured in Central Germany for more than thirty years, and established the bishoprics of Salzburg, Passau, Freisingen, Ratisbon, Wurzburg, and Erfurt, and a very large number of monasteries. His influence in civilising and evangelising the wilder parts of Germany was very great. Besides his labours as a missionary, and organiser of the newly converted districts, Boniface was equally great as the restorer of the older Churches on the Rhine and Danube. He became Archbishop of Mainz, and his efforts made that see the Canterbury of Germany. He was assisted by numerous missionaries, whom he sent for from Britain, and was high in favour with the Carolingian princes. Pepin was crowned king by Boniface at Soissons. In 755 he made his last missionary journey into Friesland; but near Dokkeim he was attacked and slain by a band of the Pagans. His remains were buried in one of the most famous of his abbeys—that of Fulda.

The Works of St. Boniface were published by Dr. Giles (London, 1842). See also Vita S. Bonifacii in Mabillon, vol. iv.; Seitter, Bonifacius, 1845; Neander, Church History.

Bonlagh Common, in County Tipperary, was the place where, on July 29, 1848, Smith O'Brien appeared before the house of a widow named Cormac, which had been taken possession of by fifty constabulary, and took up a position in front of it with his followers. The constables fired, and, another party coming up at the same moment, under the command of Mr. Cox and of Mr. French, a magistrate, the rebels fled, leaving eighteen dead and many wounded behind them; none of the constabulary were wounded. This action, such as it was, put an end to the Irish "insurrection" of 1848.

Bonner, EDMUND (b. 1496, d. 1569), successively Bishop of Hereford and of London, said to have been the natural son of a priest named Savage, studied at Broadgates Hall, Oxford, and became one of Wolsey's chaplains. He subsequently attached himself to Cromwell, and in 1533 was sent on a mission to the Pope about the Divorce question. According to Burnet, his demeanour greatly enraged Clement, "who talked of throwing him into a cauldron of melted lead, or of burning him alive." In 1538 he was made Bishop of Hereford, and in 1539 translated to London. During Henry VIII.'s reign Bonner was a leading member of the Anglican Conservative party led by Gardiner and Norfolk, but on the accession of Edward VI. he declined to follow the advanced Reformers, and protested against Cranmer's homilies and injunctions. For this Bonner was committed to the Fleet, but soon released; but in 1549 he was tried by a special commission, deprived of his bishopric, and imprisoned in the Marshalsea. He was restored by Queen Mary, and was one of the most active agents in carrying out her reactionary policy. He restored the Mass in St. Paul's even before the publication of the royal ordinance which commanded it, accepted the restoration of the papal authority, despite his former policy, and his diocese was distinguished by the number of persons burnt in it, and the vindictive energy with which the bishop pushed on the work of persecution. At the accession of Queen Elizabeth, when he appeared before the queen to tender his allegiance, she shrank from him with undisguised aversion. In May, 1559, refusing to take the oath of supremacy, he was deprived and indicted for præmunire. He was committed to the Marshalsea, where he passed the rest of his life.

Booth, LAWRENCE (d. 1480), ARCHBISHOP OF YORK (1476—1480), after holding several minor preferments, was in 1457 appointed Bishop of Durham. He sided with the Lancastrians, and his temporalities were seized by Edward IV., but he subsequently reconciled himself with the king, and in 1473 was made Lord Chancellor, and held the Great Seal for eighteen months. He was appointed to the archbishopric of York in 1476.

Borders, THE. The English invasion established in the north-east of Britain the kingdom of Northumberland, which extended from the Humber to the Forth. West of this the Celtic kingdom of Strathclyde extended from the Dee to the Clyde. North were the Celtic kingdoms of the Picts and Scots. In 827 Northumberland submitted to the supremacy of Egbert, King of Wessex, and after the repulse of the Danes that supremacy was still further extended. In 924 the princes of Northumberland, Strathclyde, and Scotland submitted to Edward the Elder. In 945 the kingdom of Strathclyde was conquered, but Galloway and Cumberland were granted to the Scottish king. Similarly, Lothian was granted to the Scottish king, either by Edgar or Canute. In 1092 William II. took Cumberland, and from that time the boundaries between England and Scotland were the Solway, the Cheviot Hills, and the River Tweed. At the time of the Norman Conquest, Scotland became the refuge of many of the English, and Lothian remained the most purely English part of the two kingdoms. William I., finding it difficult to keep his hold on the northern part of England, resorted in 1069 to the savage measure of ravaging Northumberland. The northern counties were laid waste, and the subsequent inroads of the Scottish king completed the work of devastation. The northern counties are omitted in the Domesday Survey, probably because they were not considered worth the trouble of examining. The disputes between England and Scotland exposed the Borders to perpetual ravages. But attempts were made to introduce order, and the thirteenth century saw Cumberland and Northumberland tolerably prosperous in agricultural pursuits. It is probable that the necessities of constant defence enabled the men of the Borders to retain many of the old English customs more definitely than was the case elsewhere. The township organisation was not superseded by the manor, and traces of its existence till recent times are frequent. In 1249 an attempt was made to promote peace on the Borders by the issue of Border laws, which were determined by an inquest of twelve English and twelve Scottish knights. They related to the trial of malefactors who fled across the Borders, and the redress of grievances amongst the Borderers themselves. They recognised courts to be held on the marches, at which English and Scots were to meet and try their respective criminals. Peace and prosperity were, however, destroyed by the Scottish wars of Edward I. From that time England and Scotland stood in avowed hostility, and a perpetual warfare was waged on the Borders of the two kingdoms. The land was divided into three marches, the Eastern, the Western, and the Middle, and over each was set a Warden to provide for its defence. The chief military road was along the east coast, from Newcastle through Berwick or Coldstream, and along this the chief battles between English and Scots were fought. But the passes by the valley which runs from the Cheviots were mostly used for the incessant plundering raids that marked Border life. Along the valleys of the Jed, the Teviot, the Coquet, the Tyne, and the Rede freebooters from both countries were perpetually ravaging. The state of life along the Borders is sufficiently seen in the aspect of the country. It is rich in ruined castles, vast fortified piles in strong positions, dating in their main parts from the fourteenth century. Besides these are ruins of monastic buildings (those along the Tweed being especially famous) which were the sole abodes of peace, yet even they bear traces of careful fortification, and were generally under the shelter of a neighbouring castle. The only other buildings of any antiquity are low square towers, called peil towers, which sufficed as shelter against a sudden raid of robbers. They probably stood in an enclosure, which contained the cattle hastily driven away. Some of the older churches have towers of the same kind, which were used for defence. The dwellings of the people were mere hovels, and their possessions were nothing but arms and cattle. Of Border frays, the battle of Otterburn (1388) is the most famous, and has passed into legend under the name of "Chevy Chase." The great families on the Borders grew to be important men. The Percies, Greys, Dacres, and Umphravilles are famous in English history; and the Douglasses, Hepburns, Lindsays, and Durbans are no less famous in the history of Scotland. Moreover, families of freebooters formed themselves into powerful clans, and waged hereditary feuds amongst themselves—the Armstrongs, Elliots, Charltons, and the like. After the battle of Flodden Field (1513) Scotland was greatly weakened, and Henry VIII. made use of the robber warfare along the Borders as a means of still further reducing the Scottish power. The records of plunder and bloodshed which have been preserved show almost incredible barbarity. The result of this long-continued warfare was an entire lawlessness among the Borderers: they regarded plunder as their trade, and bloodshed as an episode in their life. When peace was made between England and Scotland in 1549, it became an object of importance for both countries to bring their borders into order. Regulations were made for that purpose; but they could not be enforced. A watch was set along the English borders; each hamlet sent its men to keep guard by night, and the news of a Scottish inroad was flashed by beacon light from place to place. The Wardens' Courts were regularly held, and the balance of bloodshed and rapine was adjusted between the two countries. But how difficult it was to keep the peace was shown in 1575, when, at a Wardens' Court held at Redeguisse, some disagreement led to an appeal to arms, and the English Warden was carried away prisoner. This occurrence threatened to lead to a breach between the two countries, and gave rise to long negotiations. The carefulness of Elizabeth's government is nowhere seen more clearly than in the steady attempt to introduce order into the English Border. The union of the crowns of England and Scotland in the person of James I. increased the general desire to pacify the Border. There was no longer war between England and Scotland; but theft and murder had become hereditary. The dwellers of one valley were the immortal foes of those in another. It was necessary to root out bloodfeuds and robbery by strict justice, and Lord William Howard, known as "Belted Will," did much to make the law respected. The rudiments of civilisation had to be introduced, and the bad habits of the past were slow in dying away. Redesdale, Tynedale, Liddesdale, and Teviotdale were wild and lawless places, and retained traces of their old characteristics up to the beginning of the present century. Now there are no more orderly people than those of the Borders, and nowhere is agricultural enterprise and prosperity more marked.

Borh. [FRANKLEDGE.]

Born, BERTRAND DE (d. 1200), one of the most famous troubadours, played an important part in the quarrels between Henry II. and his sons. He took up the cause of Eleanor of Guienne, and subsequently joined the Poitevin rebellion against Richard, inciting by his verses the young Prince Henry against his father. Taken prisoner at Limoges, he was set at liberty by Henry II., and eventually ended his days in the monastery of Cîteaux.

Boroughbridge, THE BATTLE OF (1322), during the barons' revolt in Edward II.'s reign, was fought between the royalists under the command of the king and Sir Andrew Harclay, and the baronial forces headed by the Earls of Lancaster and Hereford. The barons were totally routed, the Earl of Hereford slain, and the Earl of Lancaster taken prisoner and subsequently executed at Pontefract.

Borough-English was the name given in England to a not unusual custom in certain manors "that lands shall descend to the youngest son, or, in default of issue, to the younger brother of the owner." Certain analogous extensions of the custom which, for example, gives rights of succession to the youngest daughter or sister, though not strictly included in the recognised custom of borough-English, may be roughly grouped with it under such a term as "ultimogeniture" (suggested by the Real Property Commissioners), "junior-right," or "juniority" (Elton). The foreign "Droit de Maineté," "Juveigneurie," and "Jüngsten Recht," are closely analogous to borough-English. Concerning its origin we can only guess. The theory of the old lawyers that the youngest was naturally the weakest and wanted most attention, is obviously inadequate to explain it. Neither does Sir Henry Maine's view—that it sprang from the "patria potestas," and the youngest son inherited because the least likely to have forfeited his rights by emancipation—wholly cover the ground. Mr. Elton, while admitting that the problem is difficult, perhaps insoluble, suggests the theory that the custom is a survival of very early times, perhaps pre-Aryan, certainly before Celt, Teuton, and Slav had branched off from their common parent stock. Just as primogeniture sprang from the Aryan domestic worship which it was the special function of the eldest to conduct, so "ultimogeniture" may be a survival of ancestor-worship in a race that saw no pre-eminence in the eldest. The widespread nature of the custom—and some more direct evidence—supports this view. We read of it in England so far back as Glanvil's time, and by its modern name in the Year-book of the First of Edward I. It occurs especially in the south-east of England, Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, and the environs of London, and less so in the eastern counties. It is also very common in Somerset, but rare in the Midlands, and unknown north of the Humber. A very early form of the custom appears in the Welsh laws of the tenth century, and also in Brittany and other Celtic districts. It was also very common in North France, Friesland, Westphalia, and, recently, in South Russia.

Boscawen, EDWARD (b. 1711, d. 1761), first distinguished himself at the attack on Porto Bello in 1740. He was appointed commander-in-chief of an expedition to the East Indies (1747). In 1755 Boscawen received the thanks of Parliament for the capture of two French ships, and became vice-admiral, and in the following year admiral. In that year he commanded the expedition to Cape Breton Island, and took the town of Louisburg. In the following year he defeated the French fleet in Lagos Bay, and received the thanks of Parliament. In 1760 he was sworn of the Privy Council. Boscawen's career was brief, but he was not the least remarkable of the naval heroes who won such triumphs on the sea during the closing period of George II.'s reign. His personal courage was brilliantly displayed in every engagement.

Boscobel, in Shropshire, the house of Mr. John Giffard, was the hiding-place of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester in 1651. The fugitive king was committed by Lord Derby to the charge of some woodcutters named Penderell. Here he remained in concealment for some days, and at one time it was even thought necessary that he should pass some time in an oak-tree in the Boscobel woods, so hot had the pursuit become. The king eventually effected his escape. From his hiding in the oak, the fashion of wearing oak-leaves on the day of the Restoration (May 29) originated.

Boston, in Lincolnshire, is said in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to have been founded by St. Botolph. It rose to great importance in the twelfth century, and was one of the chief ports in the kingdom. Edward III. made it one of the wool staples, and its prosperity continued till the early part of the sixteenth century, from which time it gradually declined.

Boston, in Massachusetts, was settled in 1630 by John Winthrop, most of the earliest colonists coming from Lincolnshire. During the Great Rebellion the settlers sided with the Parliament, and even received two of the regicides with rejoicing in 1660. The town was on bad terms with the royal government all through the latter half of the seventeenth century, and in 1689 a rebellion broke out, and the governor, Sir Edmund Andros, was compelled to quit the country. The Boston people warmly supported the revolution of 1688. The town increased greatly in wealth and consequence, and was noted for the stern Puritanism of its inhabitants, and their sturdy spirit of independence. Boston took the lead in resisting the attempt of the English government to apply its revenue system to the Colonies. On March 5th, 1770, the riot known as "the Boston Massacre" took place, and in Dec., 1773, the attack on the tea ships was made in Boston harbour. For a time the trade of the town was nearly ruined by the Boston Port Bill (q.v.), and a large number of English troops were sent to garrison the port. The town was surrounded (1775) by an American force, between whom and the British the battle of Bunker Hill was fought, June 17. The British abandoned the place in March, 1776. After the war Boston became one of the chief cities in the United States, and the centre of art, literature, and education. During the quarter of a century preceding 1860, Boston was the head-quarters of the movement for the abolition of negro slavery.

Boston Port Bill, THE (1774), is important as being one of the immediate causes of the outbreak of the American War of Independence. In the year 1773, in order to find a market for the accumulated stores of the East India Company, Lord North withdrew the whole of the duty payable in England on any teas exported to America by the Company. The teas, however, were still subject to a colonial tax of threepence on the pound. On Dec. 16, 1773, the people of Boston, excited by the speeches of Samuel Adams and others, proceeded to the wharf where three tea ships lay, and threw their cargoes, valued at £18,000, into the water. Popular indignation was aroused throughout England by this act, and it was resolved to make an example of the little port. On March 14, 1774, Lord North brought in the Boston Port Bill. The preamble set forth that in the present condition of Boston, the commerce of his Majesty's subjects could not be safely carried on, nor the customs be duly collected there; and it was therefore proposed that from and after the 1st of June it should not be lawful for any person to land or unlade, to ship or unship, any goods within the harbour. The king in Council was to have the power, when peace and order should be established at Boston, and full compensation paid for the teas destroyed, to restore the town to its former position. Some opposition was offered to the measure by Dowdeswell, Burke, and Charles Fox, but on the whole it was approved both by Parliament and the country. The Bill, accompanied as it was by the Massachusetts Government Bill, was received with great indignation in America.

The 1st of June—the day appointed for the Boston Port Bill to come into force—was set apart as a solemn fast. On the meeting of the Massachusetts Assembly, General Gage found the spirit of resistance so unanimous among the delegates that he felt compelled to dissolve it immediately.

Bosworth Field, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 21, 1485), was fought between Richard III. and Henry, Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. On August 1, Henry landed at Milford Haven and passed on without opposition to Shrewsbury, being joined by a large number of Welshmen. He then marched on to Tamworth, where he arrived on the 18th. On the 20th he was at Atherstone, where he was met by Lord Stanley and his uncle, Sir William Stanley, who promised to desert Richard during the battle. Meanwhile Richard, having mustered his forces at Nottingham, marched to Leicester and encamped at Bosworth on the 21st. On the next morning the two armies met between Bosworth and Atherstone at a place known as White-moors, near the village of Sutton Cheney. The battle was mainly a hand-to-hand encounter, the Stanleys for some time keeping aloof from the fight till, at a critical moment, they joined Richmond. Richard, perceiving that he was betrayed, and crying out, "Treason, treason!" endeavoured only to sell his life as dearly as possible, and refused to leave the field till, overpowered by numbers, he fell dead in the midst of his enemies. The crown was picked up on the field of battle and placed by Sir William Stanley on the head of Richmond, who was at once saluted king by the whole army. Among those that perished on Richard's side were the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Ferrers, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brackenbury, while the only person of note in Henry's army who was slain was his standard-bearer, Sir William Brandon, who is said to have been killed by Richard himself.

Bot was a word which signified amends, reparation, either in the simple sense, as burh bôt—i.e., repair of fortresses—or more often in the sense of money compensation for wrongdoing. In the earlier laws of the various Teutonic tribes, most offences are regarded as involving a breach of the general peace, and as putting the offender in outlawry and at feud with the community, till at any rate he has come to terms with the injured party; some less grave offences regarded as merely wrongs to the individual have a fixed composition attached to them; while in some cases is seen the idea of crime as demanding punishment. It is indisputable that these conceptions belong to very different stages of thought, and respectively succeed each other. Any offence, it is clear, originally put the offender at feud with all, and exposed him to his victim's vengeance. The right of vengeance then became limited by the growth of fixed compositions. And lastly, in the most developed codes, the idea of punishment has intruded upon the region of composition payments. In the code of Alfred, a discrimination is made, and in ordinary cases homicides paid for according to the wergild of the slain, while in extraordinary cases, such as wilful murder of a lord, the crime is to be punished by death. The bót, then, or money payment, represents the view of a misdeed which regards it as so much damage to the individual, reparable by payment at a fixed tariff. For less grave offences the amends must, by Anglo-Saxon law, be accepted. In graver offences only, if the amends be not paid or be unsatisfactory to the party injured, does he re-enter on his right of feud, under certain legal limitations. These two are the "bót-worthy" class of offences. And even in the "bót-less" offences, the king can at pleasure accept an amends in money for them; for instance, the perjurer is to have his hand cut off, but the king can allow him to redeem it at half his wergild. In case of treason against a lord, Alfred says "the king and his witan dare not grant mercy." The relation of the "bót" to the "wite" is very irregular, and indeed inexplicable. The amount of the bót itself is equally perplexing; 6s. is the amends for knocking out a front tooth, only 3s. for breaking a rib; 6s. for breaking the arm, but 11s. for destroying the little finger, and 20s. for cutting off the beard. On the whole it appears that the payment was on an estimate of the part affected, and its value or appearance, the degree of the affront, and the social position of the injured party, or even that of the offender. The chief peculiarities of this Anglo-Saxon system compared with that of other Teutonic tribes are—(i.) the strict maintenance of rights of private property by severe treatment of theft and stringent enactments to secure bail; (ii.) the great attention paid to the privileges of the Church and the enforcement of its precepts; (iii.) the rapid growth of the kingly power and its recognition as the source of justice. There are many minute variations between West-Saxon and Anglian law as to the ratios of the payments of bót.

Bothwell, FRANCIS STEWART, 2ND EARL OF, the son of John Stewart, Prior of Coldingham (an illegitimate son of James V.), and Lady Jane Hepburn, sister of the first Earl of Bothwell, was a favourite of James VI., by whom he was created Earl of Bothwell, 1587. His life was a series of rebellions against the king, whom he attempted to seize at Holyrood, 1592—an attempt which was frustrated by the citizens of Edinburgh. The same year he made another unsuccessful attack on the king at Falkland; and in 1593 suddenly appeared at Holyrood, at the head of an armed band, to ask pardon, as he said, for his treason. In 1594 he again attacked Edinburgh, being only beaten off by the citizens; but from this time his power was broken, and he was forced to quit the country.

Bothwell, JAMES HEPBURN, 4TH EARL OF (b. 1536, d. 1578), was Lord Warden of the Scotch Marches, as well as Lord High Admiral of Scotland, in which capacities he is said to have acted more as a marauder and a pirate than as an officer of state. In 1558 he was one of the Lords of the Articles; and in the following year distinguished himself as a partisan of the queen regent, and an opponent of Arran and the reforming lords. He was one of the nobles sent to Mary in France after the death of her husband; and in 1561 was made a member of the Privy Council. He was, however, in constant difficulties, owing to his turbulence and violence. In 1562 he was impeached for having plotted to carry off the queen, and outlawed; but in a few months he returned, and married Lady Jane Gordon, a sister of Lord Huntley, and about the same time began to find favour in the eyes of Queen Mary. From this time his life becomes closely associated with that of the queen. After Rizzio's murder, Mary fled to Dunbar Castle, of which Bothwell had the custody; and subsequently he returned with her to Edinburgh. In October, 1566, he received a visit from her when lying wounded in his castle of Hermitage; and after he had compassed the murder of Darnley, 1567, he was in constant attendance on Mary at Seton. An attempt on the part of Lennox to bring the murderer of his son to justice ended in Bothwell's acquittal, owing to the non-appearance of the accuser, and brought him fresh proofs of the queen's regard in the shape of large grants of land. In 1567 he carried off Mary as she was going from Stirling to Edinburgh, probably with her own connivance, and, having obtained a divorce from his wife, married the queen, May 16, 1567. Shortly afterwards a combination of the leading barons of Scotland forced Bothwell, who previous to his marriage had been made Duke of Orkney and Shetland, to fly to Borthwick Castle, and thence to Dunbar. On the queen's surrender to Kirkcaldy, after the conference at Carberry Hill, Bothwell had to escape as best he could.

to the Orkneys. Pursued thither, and driven to sea, he was arrested by a Danish war-ship off the coast of Norway, on suspicion of piracy, and conveyed to Denmark. There he was imprisoned by Christian IX., first at Malmö (1567—1573), then at Dragaholm (1573—1578); but the king refused the demands of the Scottish government for his extradition or execution. The so-called "Testament" he is said to have drawn up during this period, is probably a forgery. Bothwell was, as Randolph said of him, "despiteful out of measure, false and untrue as a devil;" and it is not the least extraordinary feature in Mary's career that she should have conceived any affection for this brutal, ferocious, and unscrupulous border chief.

Bothwell Bridge, THE BATTLE OF (June 22, 1679), was fought between the Royalist troops, commanded by the Duke of Monmouth, and the forces of the revolted Covenanters, or Covenanters. The insurgents occupied a strong position, with the Clyde between them and the enemy; but, as they attempted to defend instead of destroying a bridge, Monmouth cleared the passage of the river by his artillery. The insurgents were forced to retire to a hill near by, known as Hamilton Heath, where they were attacked by the Royal troops and completely routed. Bothwell Bridge is in Lanarkshire, near Hamilton.

Bottle Plot, THE (1823). This name was given by Canning to a riot in a Dublin theatre, got up by the Orangemen, when a rattle and a bottle were thrown into the box of Lord Wellesley, the then Lord-Lieutenant, who was supposed to favour the Catholics. The grand jury threw out the bill for conspiracy with intent to murder which was brought in against those arrested.

Boulogne, CAPTURE OF (1544). This event, the one important result of the combination of Henry VIII. and Charles V. for the subjugation of France in 1544, took place September 14, 1544, after a protracted siege of nearly two months. According to the original plan of the campaign, Charles was to strike across France by Champagne, Henry by Picardy, and neither was to stop till he reached Paris, where, in their united might, they were to dispose of the French monarchy. The first thing, however, that Henry did was to sit down with the bulk of his army before Boulogne; and when Charles reproached him for not adhering to the method of invasion determined upon between them, Henry retaliated by accusing Charles of a similar breach of their contract. The siege of Boulogne is principally memorable for the length of the resistance made by the garrison under the disadvantageous circumstances of weak fortifications, and besiegers strong in numbers and offensive engines. So great, indeed, was the gallantry displayed on this occasion by the men of Boulogne, that when the fall of the town was clearly an event of a few days only, they were allowed, on the capitulation of the town, to march out with their arms and property; whereupon, according to Hall's Chronicle, "the king's highness, having the sword borne naked before him by the Lord Marquis Dorset, like a noble and valiant conqueror, rode into the town, and all the trumpeters, standing on the walls of the town, sounded their trumpets at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of all the king's true subjects." The town remained in the hands of the English till 1560, and was restored to the French on the conclusion of peace.

Boulter, HUGH (b. 1671, d. 1742), Archbishop of Armagh, studied at Merchant Taylors' School, and was elected a demy of Magdalen at the same time as Addison. He was subsequently chaplain to Sir Charles Hedges, and rector of St. Olave's, Southwark. In 1719 he was consecrated Bishop of Bristol, and in 1724 elevated to the archbishopric of Armagh and the Irish primacy. He took an active share in the political affairs of Ireland, was strongly opposed to Swift on the policy of diminishing the gold coin, though he concurred with him on the question of Wood's patent, and was one of the chief promoters of the system of Protestant Charter Schools. He founded many charities in Armagh, Drogheda, and elsewhere, and was no less than thirteen times appointed one of the Lords Justices of Ireland.

Bounty, QUEEN ANNE'S. [QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.]

Bourchier, FAMILY OF. The founder of this family was Sir John de Bourchier, Justice of the King's Bench in the reign of Edward II. His son Robert became Lord Chancellor in 1340 (the first layman who held the office), was summoned to Parliament as a baron in 1342, and died 1349. The barony devolved on Henry Bourchier, Count of Eu, grandson of his younger son. He was created Earl of Essex 1461, and was succeeded by his grandson Henry, upon whose death the peerage became extinct.

Bourchier, THOMAS (d. 1486), Archbishop of Canterbury (1454—1486), was the son of William Bourchier, Count of Eu, by Anne, daughter of Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester. After holding minor preferments, he was elected Bishop of Worcester in 1435, and was translated to Ely in 1443. On the death of Archbishop Kempe, the Council, at the request of the Commons prayed that the Pope would confer the primacy on Bouchier. Accordingly, he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury in 1454. In 1455 he was made Chancellor, and held the Great Seal for eighteen months, both Yorkists and Lancastrians being anxious to conciliate a member of so powerful a family. Bouchier was at first inclined to act as a mediator between the contending factions, but subsequently became a distinct partisan of the Duke of York. He welcomed the return of the Yorkist leaders in 1460, and crowned Edward IV. in the next year. In 1464 he was made a cardinal. He crowned Richard III., and two years after performed the same office for Henry VII. He was a patron of learning, and instrumental in introducing printing into England, and left a reputation for personal generosity and kindness.

Bouvines, THE BATTLE OF (July, 1214), was fought at a small town between Lille and Tournay, between Philip Augustus of France and the forces of the Emperor Otto IV., with the Flemings and some English auxiliaries, under William, Earl of Salisbury. John had joined the alliance for the purpose of gaining the assistance of the Germans and Flanders in the war he was carrying on with Philip for the recovery of his French territories. The battle (in which the forces engaged on both sides would appear to have been very large) terminated in a signal victory for the French. The defeat consummated the separation of Normandy from England, and by depriving John of further hopes of being able to rely on his Continental dominions, as well as by the loss of prestige it occasioned him, had some effect in compelling him to submit to the demands of the barons. The battle is memorable as being one of the few occasions in which men of English, High-German, and Low-German race have fought side by side against the French and have been completely defeated.

Roger of Wendover, iii. 287 (Eng. Hist. Soc.). See Freeman, Norm. Conq., v. 706, who speaks of it as "that day of darkness and gloom when three branches of the Teutonic race, the German, the Fleming, and the Englishman, sank before the arms of men of the hostile blood and speech." In Sismondi, Hist. des Français, vi. 424, a somewhat different view is taken.

Bowes, SIR ROBERT, was a distinguished soldier, diplomatist, and lawyer in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary. In the great Northern rebellion of 1536, he was among the prisoners captured at the surrender of Hull to the rebel forces. In 1542, whilst in command of a body of 3,000 cavalry, he was defeated and taken prisoner at Halydonrigg by a Scottish force under the Earl of Huntley; and on the termination of hostilities between the two countries, became Warden of the East and Middle Marches.

During the exercise of this office he compiled his Informations on the state of the Marches, and their laws and customs—a work full of curious and interesting details. In June, 1552, he was made Master of the Rolls, a position which just then was envied with dangers. As Master of the Rolls, Sir Robert Bowes was one of the witnesses to the will of King Edward VI., which fixed the succession to the crown on Lady Jane Grey. He retired from his office two months after Mary's accession to the throne, and during the remainder of his life he occupied himself with his old duties on the Scottish border. The precise year of his death is uncertain.

Boycotting was the name applied to the system of social and commercial ostracism which was extensively resorted to in Ireland during the land agitation of 1880 and 1881. Landlords who were disliked by their tenants, tenants who had paid rents to unpopular landlords, and other persons who incurred the hostility of the local branches of the Land League, were rigidly isolated. No intercourse was held with them, and no one could be got to work for them, or even to supply them with the necessities of life.

The name was derived from Captain Boycott, of Lough Mask House, a Mayo landlord and agent, one of the first against whom the process was put in force. Capt. Boycott was "relieved" by a number of Orangemen, escorted by a large military and police force, Nov. 11, 1880.

Boyle, CHARLES, 1ST LORD (b. 1676, d. 1731), second son of Roger, Earl of Orrery, while an undergraduate at Oxford, took part in the controversy with Bentley on the letters of Phalaris. In 1700 he entered Parliament as member for Huntingdon, and in 1703 succeeded to the Irish peerage of Orrery. In 1709 he fought at Malplaquet, and in 1713 was Envoy Extraordinary to the States of Brabant and Flanders, and on his return received an English peerage. He was a favourite of George I., but in 1722 was committed to the Tower on a charge of being concerned in Laver's Plot, of which, however, he was acquitted. His later years were devoted to philosophical studies.

Boyne, THE BATTLE OF THE (July 1, 1690), was fought between the troops of William III. and the Irish under James II. James, marching from Dublin, had taken up a position behind the river Boyne, and there waited for the invading army. His position was strong, and Schomberg endeavoured to dissuade William from the attack. Early in the morning, however, the English right, under young Schomberg, was sent to cross the river by the bridge of Slane, some miles higher up, and thus turn the Irish right. The bridge was captured. Four miles to the south of the Boyne the road to Dublin runs through the passage of Duleek. If Schomberg secured this pass the Irish retreat would be cut off. Langon, commander of the French allies, marched to oppose him. Thus the Irish alone were left to withstand William. At the head of his left wing, consisting entirely of cavalry, he forced the passage of the river not far above Drogheda. The centre of his army was commanded by the elder Schomberg. The Irish infantry fled without a blow; the cavalry under Richard Hamilton fought bravely on. The gallant Schomberg fell while rallying his troops. But at this moment William came up with his left wing, and the battle was won. The Irish cavalry retreated slowly, fighting to the last; their leader, Hamilton, was taken prisoner. James fled early in the day towards Dublin. The fugitives poured through the passage of Duleek, where the French had steadily resisted Meinhart Schomberg's attack. Considering the great importance of the victory, the loss on either side was not great. About 500 English had fallen, and 1,500 Irish.

A striking and detailed account of the battle is given in Macaulay's History.

Boy-Patriots was a name given by their enemies to a body of young and rising men who formed part of the Opposition to Sir Robert Walpole's administration, but who coalesced neither with the Tories nor with the malcontent Whigs. The chief members of this party were Lyttleton, George Grenville, Lord Cobham, and, above all, William Pitt.

Bracton, HENRY (d. 1268), the writer of a valuable commentary on the laws of England, was educated at Oxford, and devoted himself to the study of law. In 1245 he was appointed one of the judges errant, and later on was one of the king's clerks or secretaries. He is supposed to have become an ecclesiastic towards the close of his life, and to have been Archdeacon of Barnstaple. His work, entitled De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ, is our great authority for mediæval English law. An excellent edition is published in the Rolls Series (1878, &c.), with a Translation, Notes, References to Glanville, &c., and Introductions by Sir Travers Twiss. The editor suggests that "the immediate object which Bracton had in view in composing his work, was to draw up a manual of the common law of England for the use and instruction of the Justiciaries of the Eyre."

Braddock Down, situated between Liskeard and Bodmin, in Cornwall, was the scene of a battle during the Civil War. Here, on Jan. 19, 1643, the Royalist officers, Sir Ralph Hopton and Sir Bevil Grenville, coming from Bodmin, encountered and defeated the commander of the garrison of Plymouth, Ruthven, who, without waiting for the support of his superior officer, the Earl of Stamford, had crossed the Tamar and occupied Liskeard. The result of the battle was that the Cornishmen resumed the offensive, drove back Stamford and his forces, and carried by assault Saltash and Okehampton.

There is a full account of the battle in a letter of Sir Bevil Grenville, printed in Forster's Life of Pym. See also Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, vi. 248.

Braddock, GENERAL. [DUQUESNE, FORT.]

Bradshaw, JOHN (b. 1602, d. 1659), was a barrister, but was very little known, either as a lawyer or a politician, when, in 1648, he was made President of the High Court of Justice, instituted to try Charles I. The reason for his appointment seems to have been the refusal of all the leading lawyers to serve on the trial, and the necessity of having some one possessed of legal knowledge as the president. For his services he was given the house of the Dean of Westminster, the sum of £5,000, and large grants of land, and made Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. He subsequently presided at the trials of the Duke of Hamilton and other Royalists, and was President of the Councils of State from 1649 to 1651. He was a member of the Parliament of 1654, and was probably one of those excluded for refusing to sign the engagement recognising Cromwell's authority. In 1659 he was made one of the Council of State, and shortly afterwards a commissioner of the Great Seal; but he died before the end of the year. He was one of those who were styled "stiff Republicans," or "Commonwealth's men," and was sincerely opposed to the government of one person, whether king or protector; but he does not appear to have been a man of any marked ability. After the Restoration his body was disinterred and hung in chains at Tyburn.

Bradwardine, THOMAS (b. circa 1290, d. 1349), a native of Chichester, educated at Merton College, Oxford, was one of the most celebrated of the scholastic philosophers, and was known by the title of Doctor Profundus. He became Chancellor of the university, Professor of Divinity, and subsequently chaplain to Edward III. In 1349 he was appointed to the archbishopric of Canterbury, but within a few weeks of his consecration he was carried off by the Black Death.

Bradwardine's great work, De Causa Dei, was printed in 1618 (Lond., folio). His other works were chiefly mathematical.

Braemar Gathering, THE (Aug. 26, 1715), was the name given to the great assembly of disaffected nobles and Highland chiefs which met ostensibly for the purpose of a hunting in the Earl of Mar's forest of Braemar, but in reality to organise measures for raising the standard of insurrection in favour of the Pretender, which was done soon afterwards (Sept. 6). Among those at the Braemar gathering were the Earl of Mar, the Marquis of Tullibardine, Lords Southesk, Errol, Kilsyth, Kenmure, Strathallan, Seaforth, and Glengary.

Braintree Case, THE. In 1837 the majority of the vestry of Braintree postponed a Church rate for twelve months; the churchwardens, however, proceeded to levy it on their own authority. A prohibition of the Court of Queen's Bench restrained them. It was suggested, however, that the churchwardens and the minority of the vestry might legally levy a rate, as it might be argued that the votes of the majority who refused to perform their duty were not valid. The churchwardens and the minority of the vestry voted a rate accordingly (July, 1841). On the matter being once more brought before the Court of Queen's Bench, that tribunal now declared the rate valid. The decision was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but upset on appeal by the House of Lords, which pronounced the rate invalid, and altogether denied the right of the minority of the parishioners to levy it. It was such cases as this that led to the Act 31 & 32 Vict., cap. 109, which abolished compulsory Church rates, because "the levying thereof has given rise to litigation and ill-feeling."

Bramham Moor, THE BATTLE OF (1408), was fought between the Earl of Northumberland, and the other nobles who had revolted against Henry IV., and the royal troops, under Sir Thomas Rokeby. The latter were completely victorious, Northumberland being killed on the field, and his chief associate, Lord Bardolf, mortally wounded. Bramham Moor is in Yorkshire, between Leeds and Tadcaster.

Brandywine, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 11, 1777), in the American War of Independence, was fought on the shores of Brandywine Creek, about fifty miles from Philadelphia, and ended in the defeat of the Americans, under Washington. General Howe had landed 18,000 men near the Brandywine. Washington had only 8,000 troops fit for action. For some days he baffled General Howe's attempts to drive him back. At length the two armies encountered one another. While Howe and Cornwallis made a flank movement with the greater part of their forces, Washington resolved on a bold attack on the British in his front. To render such an attack successful, the co-operation of Sullivan was necessary. But that general, using his own discretion instead of obeying orders, laid himself open to an attack while his troops were in confusion. The rout of Sullivan's troops threw the rest of the American army into confusion, and soon they were everywhere in retreat. The American loss was set down by Howe at 300 killed, 600 wounded, and 400 prisoners, as against 90 killed and 500 wounded and missing on the English side. Washington made good his retreat; but he had to abandon the idea of saving Philadelphia when he found that Cornwallis had forced his way between his camp and that town.

Brantingham Roll is the name given to the Issue Roll of the Exchequer for the forty-fourth year of Edward III., when Thomas of Brantingham, Bishop of Exeter, was Treasurer, containing an account of the various payments made during the year. It was discovered in the office of Pells, and published in 1835, with a general introduction on the character of the Exchequer Records by Mr. Frederick Devon.

Braose, WILLIAM DE (d. circa 1212), was one of the most powerful barons in England, and received from Henry II., in 1177, the grant of the whole kingdom of Limerick. He was one of the itinerant justices in Richard I.'s reign, but fell out of favour with John, who in 1210 stripped him of all his possessions, and, it is said, starved his wife and son to death in Windsor Castle. De Braose himself escaped to France, where he died shortly afterwards. His youngest son Reginald received back a great part of his father's possessions, but, dying without heirs in 1229, the family became extinct.

Foss, Judges of Eng.

Bray, SIR REGINALD (d. 1603), was one of Henry VII.'s most trusted counsellors. Together with the Lord Treasurer he was the king's messenger in 1485 to the city of London to ask the citizens for a loan of 6,000 marks, obtaining, after much negotiation, the considerably smaller sum of £2,000. He was the object of special hatred to the Cornish rebels of 1497 as being the instrument of Henry's extortion.

Bread Riots (1816). The cessation of the great war, which caused many farms to be thrown out of cultivation, and the failure of the harvest, occasioned severe distress and riots in all parts of England, especially in the eastern counties. Declaring that the farmers had conspired to raise the price of bread, the mob set farm buildings on fire, demanded that wheat should be sold cheap, and in several places broke into the bakers' shops. The riots were suppressed by military force, and the rioters tried by a special commission. There were also occasional riots caused by famine during the Chartist movement. The most dangerous were those of 1842, in Yorkshire and Lancashire.

Breauté, FALKES DE, was a Norman of mean birth, who had served King John with unscrupulous fidelity as a mercenary captain, and was in 1208 rewarded by him with the sheriffdoms of Glamorgan and Oxfordshire, the castles of Chilham, Northampton, Cambridge, Oxford, and Bedford, and the hand of Margaret Redvers, widow of Baldwin, son of the Earl of Devon. On John's death, it was judged advisable to conciliate this soldier, who had taken Bedford Castle, burnt the suburbs of London, and terrorised over John's enemies in the neighbouring counties. In return for his aid to the royal cause against Louis and the rebel barons, he obtained the sheriffdoms of Rutland, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Buckingham, Bedford, Oxford, Northampton, for seven years. But from 1220 onwards the vigorous work of Hubert de Burgh was putting an end to the state of things in which such a man could move freely. Convicted at the Dunstable Assizes in 1224 of thirty-five acts of violence, he audaciously captured one of the justices, and imprisoned him in Bedford Castle, under the care of his brother, William de Breauté, who refused to surrender it, saying "he was no liegeman of the King of England." The siege took two months, "with great slaughter of the king's nobles;" and it required an elaborate siege-train. The castle was taken and the garrison at once hanged. Falkes, now under excommunication, had fled to North Wales, the prince of which district married his daughter Eva; but he soon returned and submitted himself to the king's mercy. The judgment of the barons was that he should surrender all his goods and abjure the realm. His wife, too, obtained a divorce on the ground of constraint; and on his first setting foot in Normandy, only his crusading vow protected him from being hanged by the French king. He prevailed with Honorius III. to send a strong letter of intercession to the king. While on his way back to England, however, he died in Normandy. Falkes de Breauté was a typical example of the unscrupulous foreign adventurers whom the early Angevin kings introduced into England as able tools of royal misgovernment.

Breda, THE DECLARATION OF (April 14, 1660), was the manifesto sent by Charles II. to both houses of the Convention Parliament. By this the king granted a free and general pardon to all "who within forty days after the publishing hereof shall lay hold upon this our grace and favour, and shall by any public act declare their doing so," except such as Parliament should except. It also granted amnesty for all political offences committed during the Civil War, and the subsequent interregnum; promised that the king would rely on the advice and assistance of a free parliament; and declared a liberty to tender consciences, so "that no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matter of religion." The king also undertook that no inquiry should be made into the titles of lands acquired under the Commonwealth, and that the arrears of Monk's officers and soldiers should be paid.

Breda, THE TREATY OF (July 31, 1667), was concluded between England on the one side, and France, Holland, and Denmark on the other. It was entered into after a naval war between England and Holland, in which the victories had been pretty evenly distributed. France had joined the Dutch, fearing that England would make herself supreme on the seas, but she had not taken much share in the war, her policy being to use the two great naval powers as checks one upon the other. The following were the terms of the Treaty of Breda:—1. The islands of St. Christopher, Antigua, and Montserrat were restored to England, and the province of Acadia (Nova Scotia) to France. 2. England and Holland made peace on the principle of uti possidetis; thus England retained New York and New Jersey, and Holland retained Surinam. 3. The Navigation Act was modified in favour of the Dutch. 4. Friendly relations were restored between England and Denmark.

Brehon, or, more correctly, BRETHOM, in Erse signifies a judge. From the earliest days of Irish history of which we have any trace, this class seems to have been a distinctly recognised one, and previous to the conversion of the Irish to Christianity we have proof that the office had become hereditary. In fact, there seems strong reason for connecting the Brehons with the ancient Celtic priesthood in Ireland, whether or no we choose to give to that priesthood the name of Druid. [DRUIDS.] Some of the chief Brehons, whose names have been handed down to us, especially a very celebrated one, Dubhthach mac na Lugair, chief author of the Senchus Mór, is by later writers often called a Druid. Cæsar tells us that the Druids had acquired the office of judges in both civil and criminal cases, and that they were likewise bards who preserved the historical traditions of the people. The Brehons as they are known to history—that is to say, the Brehons of Christian time—seem to have united these two offices. "The Brehons and feast poets of the men of Erin," says an opening paragraph of the Senchus Mór. We can easily understand that when a change of religion came, and the priestly functions passed to the men ordained by Patrick and his successors, the more secular offices would be retained by the Brehons. The preaching of St. Patrick began about the year 432, and was crowned with a rapid success. One of the most important among his early conversions was that of the Brehon Dubhthach above spoken of. We may suppose there were some mutual concessions between the two. Dubhthach, who was probably a Druid, renounced his magical and idolatrous practices, and Patrick in his turn "blessed his mouth" (as we are expressly told in the Senchus Mor) when he uttered secular judgments. It was probably with St. Patrick that the idea arose of writing down the Brehon laws, or, as we should say, of codifying them. We must remember that at this time Theodosius had just codified the Roman law, a precedent which would be present in the mind of St. Patrick. In fact, from this time forward we nearly always find that the conversion of any barbarous people to Christianity is immediately followed by some sort of codifying of their ancient traditional law. The first Saxon code is that of Ethelbert, King of Kent, which was undertaken by St. Augustine. Whatever of the traditional law is not inconsistent with the Christian doctrine or the crown law, is in all cases retained, but what is opposed to these is expunged. Thus, in the introduction to the first great code of Brehon laws, the Senchus Mor (A.D. 438—441), we find a distinction made between the "law of nature" and the "law of God." The latter refers to the laws which came with the revealed religion; the former term bears reference to the words of St. Paul where he speaks of the Gentiles "doing by nature the works of the law," and therefore means all in the ancient code which was not inconsistent with the revealed commandments. The Senchus Mor is said to have had nine authors, or co-operators, in its construction, who are spoken of as "the nine pillars of the Senchus Mor." Three were kings, viz., Laeghaire, Over-King of Ireland; Corc, King of Cashel; and Dairi, King of Ulster. Three were bishops or saints, namely, Patrick, Benen (Benignus), and Cairnech: these we may suppose looked after the Christian portion of the code. Finally, we have three Brehons, who were, of course, the chief authors of the law, viz., Dubhthach before mentioned, assisted by Rossa and Ferghus. These last two are sometimes spoken of simply as "bards;" but as we have before said, it is not probable that there was any distinct line of demarcation between the Brehon and the bard.

Brember, SIR NICOLAS (d. 1388), was Lord Mayor of London in 1377, and again from 1383 to 1385. He was the head of the royalist party in the city, and in 1387 was one of those who were appealed of treason by the Lords Appellant. In 1388 he was impeached by Parliament, sentenced to be beheaded, and shortly afterwards executed. [APPELLANT, LORDS.]

Brenneville, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 20, 1119), was a cavalry skirmish fought during the campaign in Normandy between Louis II. of France and Henry I., and arose out of the support given by the former to William Clito. The French were united, and shortly afterwards Louis made peace and abandoned William. There were only about 900 men engaged in this combat, and not more than three were killed. Both kings were present on the field.

Brentford, PATRICK RUTHVEN, EARL OF (d. 1657), after having served in many foreign armies, joined the Royalist troops, and was at once made a field-marshal by Charles I. He had an important command at the battle of Edgehill, and on the death of the Earl of Lindsey was made Commander-in-chief of the Forces. He was created Earl of Forth, and subsequently Earl of Brentford, by the king, who had a high opinion of his military ability. He was severely wounded in the second battle of Newbury, and obliged to resign his command, being succeeded by Prince Rupert. Clarendon remarks that, "both by reason of his age and his extreme deafness he was not a man of counsel or words; hardly conceived what was proposed, and as confusedly and obscurely delivered his opinion."

Clarendon, Hist. of the Rebellion, viii. 29, &c.

Brentford, THE BATTLE OF (Nov. 12, 1642), was fought between the Royalists under Prince Rupert and the Parliamentarians under Denzil Holles. After the battle of Edgehill Charles marched towards London, touching Reading and other places on the way. At Brentford Rupert encountered three regiments which were stationed there, and after a sharp skirmish forced the barricades they had erected, and occupied the town of Brentford, taking fifteen hundred prisoners and eleven cannons. The Parliamentary army being subsequently reinforced, the king was obliged to fall back from Brentford, and retired into winter quarters at Oxford.

Brest, THE EXPEDITION AGAINST (1694), was a disastrous failure. The English government had attempted to keep the destination of the expedition secret, but it had become well known to the French government. Information had been treacherously conveyed to them by various persons in England, among others by Marlborough, who wrote a letter to James II. on the subject. Thus forewarned, the French government sent Vauban to put the defences in order. On the 6th of June the fleet, under Berkeley, with Talmash in command of the land forces, was off Cape Finisterre. It was proposed to land in Camaret Bay. The Marquis of Caermarthen, the eldest son of the Duke of Leeds, entered the basin to reconnoitre, and reported the defences formidable. But Berkeley and Talmash thought that he overrated the danger. Next day Caermarthen, with eight ships, was followed by Talmash with a hundred boats full of soldiers. A murderous fire from the batteries swept away the men. Talmash, however, imagining that he was confronted by peasants, refused to retire, and fell mortally wounded as he attempted to land. Ships and boats hastily retired from the bay, but not without the loss of four hundred sailors and seven hundred soldiers. The expedition returned ingloriously, after attempting to blow up the pier at Dunkirk, and bombarding Dieppe, Havre, and Calais.

Bretigny, THE TREATY OF (May 8, 1360), was concluded between England and France after the continued successes of Edward III., while the French king, John, who had been taken prisoner at Poitiers, remained in captivity in England. The protracted negotiations were brought to a close by a dreadful storm, recorded in history, which was interpreted to be a manifestation of Divine wrath at the continuance of hostilities. The English renounced their pretensions to the crown of France, as well as to Normandy, Touraine, Maine, and Anjou. France consented to cede Gascony, Guienne, Poitou, and their dependencies and outlying districts; and in northern France, Calais, Guines, and the county of Ponthieu. King John was to pay a ransom of 3,000,000 gold crowns. The question of Brittany was left open. The French were to break off their alliance with the Scots, and to abstain from assisting them against the English, and the English were to give no further aid to the Flemings. By a separate treaty, the Kings of France and Navarre were to be reconciled.

Bretwalda. A title of supremacy among the early Anglo-Saxon kings. Bede (Hist. Eccles., ii. 5) gives a list of seven kings who had ruled over the English south of the Humber. The first four—Ella of Sussex, Cæawlin of Wessex, Redwald of East Anglia, and Ethelbert of Kent—could have had no power over the Northumbrians, even if they all really possessed the influence Bede assigns to them. But the last three—Edwin, Oswald, and Oswy—were Northumbrian kings, and therefore their “imperium” or “ducatu,” according to Bede, must have extended over all South Britain. Oswald is, in fact, called by Adamnan (Vit. S. Columbae), “Totius Britanniae Imperator ordinatus a Deo,” and history proves the reality of their power. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (s. a. 827), when enlarging on the exploits of Egbert, quotes Bede’s list, and adds to them Egbert, saying, “And he was the eighth king that was Bretwalda.” West-Saxon prejudice probably caused the chronicler to pass over the great Mercians of the eighth century, of whom Ethelbald claimed to be “King of the South English,” and Offa “Rex Anglorum” (Cod. Dip., i. 96, 162, &c.), while Charles the Great called the latter the “greatest of the kings of the West.” Besides this passage, the remarkable word Bretwalda occurs elsewhere only in a bilingual charter of Athelstan in 934 (Cod. Dip., v. 218), which describes him as “King of the Anglo-Saxons and Brytaenwalda of all the island”—in Latin, “Anglo-Saxonum nec non totius Britanniae Rex.” In seeking the meaning of this rare title we must first distinguish between the name Bretwalda and the fact of overlordship. Every one admits the successive hegemony of Northumbria, Mercia, and Wessex over English and British alike. But the nature of this supremacy, and the relation of the Bretwaldadom to it, have been much debated. Rapin started a theory of an elective sovereignty, which Turner and Lingard at least tacitly accept, and which Palgrave worked out to new consequences in his English Commonwealth. Palgrave connects the title with the imperial position of the kings, as inheritors of the remains of Roman imperialism that still survived the withdrawal of the legions. The Bretwalda was the successor of Carausius, the predecessor of Edgar. He illustrates the continuity of Roman and British influence after the English Conquest, and the all-pervading fascination of Rome. “Heptarchic” England was a federal monarchy under an elective Bretwalda, the “wielder of Britain.” Out of this office grew the later English kingship. Athelstan, the last Bretwalda, the first “King of the English,” marks the contact of the two titles. Against this brilliant but unsupported theory Kemble (Saxons in England) does his best to minimise both fact and title. The word is not “ruler of Britain,” but “wide ruler” (from bryton, broad; cf. brytencynig). The idea of election among the “kites and crows,” of continuity between rival races, of a meeting of Welsh princes to transfer to Ella the “Empire of Britain,” is quite untenable. How could the feeble princes of the south-east make their influence felt up to the Humber? Hallam (Middle Ages, ii. 352-9, and Archæologia, vol. xxxii.) inclines, though with more moderation, to a similar view. Mr. Freeman (Norm. Cong., vol. i., note B) leans to “an intermediate position between Kemble and Palgrave.” He accepts the title as significant of a substantial hegemony, but rejects Palgrave's doctrine of Roman influence and continuity. The Bretwaldom is of "purely English growth." Dr. Stubbs (Const. Hist., i. 162) seems to agree with Mr. Freeman in a view that certainly best accounts for the facts. If we could get rid of Ella and the earlier Bretwaldas, there would be some reason for connecting the triumph of the Northumbrians over Cadwallon, and the final catastrophe of the Britons, with Edwin's assumption of imperial style and emblems. (See Rhys's Celtic Britain, p. 134, for an ingenious recent development of Palgrave's theory.) But there is no evidence for a consistent theory, and there is always the danger of making too much of a name that occurs only twice in the authorities.

Besides the authorities referred to in the text, see Freeman, Norman Conquest, i. 542, note B, where there is an exhaustive statement of all that can be said on both sides of the question, and a complete list of the various imperial titles assumed by early English kings.

Brewer, WILLIAM (d. 1226), was employed as a minister, a judge, and an ambassador by Henry II., Richard I., John, and Henry III. He was a strong supporter of the royal prerogative under the two latter monarchs, and received valuable rewards for his services. His generosity and piety are celebrated by most of the chroniclers of these reigns.

Brian Boru (or Бороиуме) is said to have been the son of Kennedy, King of Munster. His first warlike exploits were performed under the banner of his brother, the King of Cashel. After his brother's assassination, he became King of Munster, and as such compelled the Danes of Dublin to pay tribute. He was engaged in a long and finally successful war against Malachy, the King of Tara, and his nominal overlord. In the end he was acknowledged as lord even by the O'Neils, and Malachy, their chief, followed in his train as an under-king. The whole island had now submitted to him, but the Danes made an effort to re-establish their supremacy. Leinster joined the Ostmen, but they were overthrown by Brian in twenty-five battles and finally at Clontarf (1014). Brian, who is said to have been eighty-three years of age, did not command in person, but remained in his tent, where, after the victory had been won, he was killed. Tradition makes Armagh his burial-place. Brian Boru must be regarded as the popular hero of early Irish history, and the stories told about his reign led to its being regarded as a sort of golden age. The O'Briens and many other distinguished Irish families claim him as their ancestor.

Bribery. (1) INDIRECT BRIBERY, by the bestowal of titles and offices and the like, has at some periods of our history been frequently employed by the crown and by its ministers. The practice became very common under the later Stuarts, and under William III. the abuse had become so great that by the Act of Settlement, 1701, it was enacted that no person holding an office under, or receiving a pension from, the crown, should be eligible for election as a member of Parliament. This Act was speedily repealed in favour of one which rendered the holders of any new office created after Oct. the 25th, 1705, incapable of sitting in the House, as well as persons who were in receipt of a pension from the crown during pleasure, and which further obliged members to vacate their seats on accepting any of the existing offices, though they might be immediately re-elected. In 1742 another Act was passed against placemen; and in 1782 government contractors were prohibited from sitting in the House. After the beginning of Mr. Pitt's administration, the practice of bestowing places as a bribe to members gradually became much less common, and almost ceased after the Reform Bill; though a certain amount of this indirect form of bribery is perhaps a necessary accompaniment of our parliamentary system, which places offices at the disposal of the leaders of the successful party. [PENSIONS.]

(2) DIRECT BRIBERY by sums of money may be divided into three classes:—

(i.) Bribery of Members of Parliament by the Crown or its Ministers was largely employed during the age of Charles II., when the king himself took the money of France, and partly employed it in bribing members. Instances had, however, occurred under James I., and we are told that Richard II. occasionally used "gifts" to secure the passing of unpopular measures through the House of Commons. William III. found it necessary to have recourse to the same means of propitiating obstinate members; and under George II. (especially during the administration of Sir Robert Walpole) bribery was "reduced to an organised system." Under George III., Lord Bute frequently bribed those whose votes he wished to secure. In regard to the peace of 1762, Horace Walpole says: "A shop was publicly opened at the Pay Office, whither the members flocked, and received the wages of their venality in bank-bills, even to so low a sum as £200 for their votes on the treaty. £25,000, as Martin, Secretary to the Treasury, afterwards owned, were issued in one morning, and in a single fortnight a vast majority was purchased to approve the peace." In 1763 Lord Saye and Sele returned Mr. Grenville a bribe of £300, saying that "a free horse wanted no spur." The practice continued under Lord North, but gradually died out under the powerful and popular administration of Mr. Pitt. The union with England in 1800 was, however, passed through the Irish Parliament by the systematic bribery of the Opposition members, carried out on an enormous scale.

(ii.) Bribery of Judges and Ministers was, even in early times, of very frequent occurrence; and it was no uncommon thing to find one or more of the judges corrupt. In 1401 a statute was passed, to the effect that all judges, officers, and ministers of the king convicted of bribery shall forfeit treble the bribe, be punished at the king's will, and be discharged from the king's service, whilst the person who offered the bribe was held guilty of a misdemeanour. Under the Tudors and Stuarts judicial bribery was common, the best-known instance being that of Lord Chancellor Bacon, who, in 1621, was found guilty on his own confession of having received extensive bribes, and was heavily fined, sent to the Tower, and degraded. There are, however, many other instances of judges being removed for corruption. Judicial and ministerial bribery has, however, been practically unknown since the Revolution of 1688.

(iii.) Bribery connected with Elections. The first instance of a penalty inflicted for bribery in elections was in 1571, when a fine was imposed on the borough of Westbury for receiving a bribe of four pounds for the election of Thomas Long as their member, "being a very simple man, and of small capacity to serve in that place," though Long himself was not expelled from the House. Under the Stuarts the practice of purchasing votes continued, and had become quite common by the reign of Charles II. In 1696 an attempt was made to pass a statute, which subsequently became law in the reign of Anne, to impose a property qualification of £600 a year from land on county members, and £300 a year on borough members, in order to check the system by which men who had made money in trade or otherwise, used to buy seats in places with which they had absolutely no connection. Ten years before this, however, the first Bribery Act had been passed, though bribery had even then been recognised as an offence by the common law, and had been condemned by resolutions of the House of Commons. The increase of corruption under George II. led to an Act in 1729 inflicting severe penalties on persons receiving bribes; but it seems to have had little effect, and in 1762 another Act was passed inflicting pecuniary penalties for bribery. There were two methods by which candidates might purchase a seat: they could either buy the borough outright from the corporation or proprietor, or, if the electors happened to be independent, they could buy individual votes. Examples of the first method are by no means uncommon. In 1767 the mayor and corporation of Oxford offered to return their sitting members, Sir Thomas Stapylton and Mr. Lee, at the next election for £567. The offer was refused, and some of the aldermen were sent to Newgate, but subsequently discharged, after having been reprimanded on their knees by the Speaker. The borough of Ludgershall was sold for £9,000; and, says Sir Erskine May, "it was notorious at the time that agents, or 'borough-brokers,' were commissioned by some of the smaller boroughs to offer them to the highest bidder." Bribery of individual electors also prevailed to a large extent, prices generally ranging from twenty guineas to one guinea a vote; though it is said that the electors of Grampound on one occasion received £300 a-piece. In 1768, 1782, and 1786 attempts were ineffectually made to secure the acceptance of bills to restrain corruption; and it was not until 1809 that a Bill was brought in by Mr. Curwen to prevent the obtaining of seats by bribery, and actually passed. Heavy penalties were imposed by it on corrupt agreements for the return of members; and in the case of persons returned by bribery or corruption, it enjoined the forfeiture of their seats, but does not seem to have been very effectual. The Reform Act of 1832 made no distinct provision for the restraint of bribery, which continued to be practised more or less openly, in many cases leading to the disfranchisement of boroughs. In 1841 a new Bribery Act was passed extending the powers of election committees. In 1852 an Act provided for the appointment of royal commissioners to inquire into cases of corruption; and two years later the offer or acceptance of a bribe was rendered a misdemeanour, which might be punished by fine, imprisonment, and forfeiture of franchise; by this Act also the accounts of election expenses were to be published. In 1858 another Act permitted the conveyance of voters to the poll, though no money was to be given to the voters themselves for the purpose. In 1883 an Act, called the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, was passed to prevent bribery, and limit the expenses of elections. Stringent penalties against corruption are enacted in it. A candidate found guilty of bribery is incapacitated for sitting in the House of Commons, or voting at an election for seven years. Persons convicted of bribery, or "undue influence," are liable to imprisonment for a year, and a fine of £200. The practice of conveying voters to the poll is rendered illegal. Since the year 1868, when the House of Commons resigned its privilege of exclusive jurisdiction in cases of controverted elections, the mode of questioning the validity of an election is to present a petition against it. This petition is tried before one of the judges of the superior courts of common law. The judge certifies the result of the trial to the Speaker, and at the same time reports any violations of the law relating to corrupt practices which have been proved before him. The House thereupon takes the requisite action on his certificate and report. [ELECTIONS.]

Bridgeman, SIR ORLANDO (b. 1609, d. 1674), was the son of a Bishop of Chester, and was returned as member for Wigan to the Long Parliament in 1650. He took part with the king, and in 1644 was one of the members of the Oxford Parliament. In 1645 he was one of the king's commissioners at the Treaty of Uxbridge. During the Commonwealth he lived in retirement, and devoted himself to conveyancing. Bridgeman and Sir Geoffrey Palmer are credited with the invention of an important legal expedient during this period. "This was the notable contrivance of 'trustees to preserve contingent remainders,' of which it is enough to say that it protected the interests of tenants in tail against the risk of being defeated by the wrongful act of preceding life tenants. From this epoch must be dated the modern type of settlement." On the Restoration he was appointed Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and very shortly afterwards Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. He presided at the trial of the regicides. In 1667 he was made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and held it till 1672. His eldest son, Sir Henry, was created Lord Bradford.

Bridge of Dee, THE AFFAIR OF (1639), is the name given to the forcing of the bridge over the Dee by Montrose and the Covenanters. The bridge was gained by its defenders being drawn off by a stratagem, and access was thus obtained to the city of Aberdeen. In Sept., 1644, Montrose, this time on the Royalist side, again fought a successful engagement at the bridge of Dee.

Bridge Street Gang (1820). A nickname bestowed on the "Constitutional Association" formed for the suppression of seditious, libellous, and blasphemous literature, which made itself very unpopular by its activity in instituting prosecutions against newspapers and other publications.

Bridgewater. An ancient town in Somersetshire on the River Parret, and said to derive its name (Burgh-Walter) from a Walter of Douay, to whom the manor was granted at the Conquest. A fine castle was built here in Henry II.'s reign by William de Briwere. The town was taken by the Royalists in 1643, but in July, 1645, it was captured by Fairfax. By this capture the Parliamentarians secured a line of forts extending from sea to sea which blocked up and practically isolated Devonshire and Cornwall. Bridgewater was one of the places that declared for Monmouth, and it was within a few miles of this town that he met with his overthrow at Sedgemoor. The borough of Bridgewater was disfranchised in 1870.

Bridlington, JOHN OF (d. 1379), a regular canon living in the diocese of York, was the author of a curious poetical retrospect of the reign of Edward III., "compiled," says Mr. Wright, "in a form which is by no means unknown in modern literature—namely, that of a supposed old text, and of a recent commentary." It has been printed in vol. i. of Mr. Wright's Political Poems and Songs (Rolls Series, 1859).

Bridport, ALEXANDER HOOD, 1ST VISCOUNT (b. 1726, d. 1814), entered the navy, became a lieutenant in 1746, and post-captain in 1756. In 1758 he served under Admiral Saunders in the Mediterranean, and under Sir Edward Hawke in the Channel. In 1766 he was appointed Treasurer of Greenwich Hospital. In 1778, he took an active share in the engagement off Ushant. In Sept., 1780, he was appointed Rear-Admiral of the White, and in 1782 commanded the centre squadron of the fleet sent out under Lord Howe to relieve Gibraltar. On Feb. 1, 1793, he became Vice-Admiral of the Red; and on the very next day France declared war. On the 1st of June, 1794, the division of the Channel fleet commanded by Lord Howe attacked and utterly defeated the French fleet off the Hyères Islands. In this action Hood played a conspicuous part, and in the following August he was created Baron Bridport, in the Irish Peerage. In the following June, having succeeded Lord Howe in the command of the Channel fleet, he sailed with fourteen ships from Spithead to cruise off the French coast, and chased a French fleet into Port L'Orient. During his tenure of command in the Channel occurred the mutiny of the fleet, which cannot, however, be in any way attributed to his conduct. On the contrary, the men disavowed all intention of giving personal offence to the admiral, and called him their father and friend. At length, through the combined efforts of Lord Bridport and Lord Howe, and the tact and prudence displayed by both, the men were brought back to their allegiance, and again sailed, in 1799, under Lord Bridport in pursuit of the French fleet, which this time eluded them and escaped to the Mediterranean. On resigning his command he became general of marines, and in 1801 was raised to the rank of viscount. He lived on for thirteen years, chiefly in retirement.

Briefs, CHURCH, were letters addressed by the sovereign to the archbishops, bishops, and clergy, empowering them to raise voluntary contributions for building churches, and for charitable purposes generally. They do not appear to have been issued before the Reformation, and may possibly be derived from the briefs given by the papal court to mendicant friars, empowering them to collect contributions. The granting of briefs appears to have led to great abuses. It was regulated by Anne, cap. 14, and practically abolished by 9 Geo. IV., cap. 42, though briefs have been issued for special purposes since the date of the latter statute.

Brigantes, THE, were a powerful tribe, or confederacy of tribes, of ancient Britain. They occupied the whole of the northern and north-western part of Southern Britain, as far as the Firth of Forth and Clyde, and appear to have been driven northward from their original southern possessions by later colonists. According to the view of some authorities, they were descendants of the earlier [non-Celtic] inhabitants of the island. They were, at any rate, among the rudest and fiercest of the British tribes. Cartimandua, the queen of one of the Brigantian tribes, was an ally of the Romans, and delivered Caractacus to them when he sought refuge in her kingdom. But the nation was weakened by a civil war, which broke out between Cartimandua and her husband, Venutius; and after being defeated by Cerealis in 69, was subdued, after some difficult campaigns, by Agricola. There was a tribe of Brigantes (possibly a colony from Britain) which occupied the present county of Wexford, in Ireland.

Brigham, THE CONFERENCE OF (July, 1290), was a meeting held by the Scotch estates, near Berwick, to decide about the marriage of the Maid of Norway and Prince Edward of England. A treaty was made, and accepted by Edward, providing that the rights and liberties of Scotland should continue unviolated: that the kingdom of Scotland should remain separate from England, divided by its proper boundaries; and that no parliament was to be held beyond the frontiers of Scotland to discuss matters respecting that kingdom, and other points favourable to Scotland. On Baliol obtaining the crown of Scotland from Edward, the English king required as a condition of its bestowal the renunciation of the Treaty of Brigham.

Bright, JOHN (b. 1811), the son of Jacob Bright, of Greenbank, near Rochdale, took an active part in the Reform agitation of 1831—2, and became, in 1839, one of the earliest members of the Anti-Corn Law League. In April, 1843, he unsuccessfully contested the city of Durham, for which, however, he was returned in July following; and he continued to sit for Durham till 1847, when he was returned for Manchester. He made his maiden speech in Parliament on Mr. Ewart's motion for extending the principles of Free Trade, Aug. 7, 1843. During the interval between his election for Manchester and the accession of the first Derby ministry to power, Mr. Bright's activity in Parliament and on the platform was varied and continuous. In the House of Commons he proposed to apply the remedy of Free Trade in land to the state of things which produced the Irish famine. He appealed unsuccessfully for the despatch of a royal commission to investigate the state of India; and in 1849 he was appointed one of the members of the celebrated select committee of the House of Commons on official salaries. In the Legislature and in the provinces, especially at Manchester, he co-operated earnestly with Mr. Cobden in his attempts to obtain financial reform, with a view to the reduction of the naval and military establishments. He also denounced the Russian War with great energy, and at the general election that ensued, he was rejected by Manchester, but in a few months was invited to fill a vacancy at Birmingham. In 1868 he accepted office under Mr. Gladstone, as President of the Board of Trade, but was compelled by ill-health to retire from office in Dec., 1870. On his recovery, he became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which office he continued to hold till the downfall of the Liberal Government in 1874. On the return of the Liberals to power, under Mr. Gladstone, in 1880, Mr. Bright became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. He resigned in July 17, 1882, owing to a difference of opinion with his colleagues as to their Egyptian policy.

Brihtwald (b. circa 650, d. 731), Archbishop of Canterbury (692—731), belonged to the royal house of Mercia. During his archbishopric, the much-vexed question of the celebration of Easter was settled by almost all the British bishops adopting the Roman practice. This period also saw the beginning of missionary enterprise abroad, and the English engaged in preaching the Gospel to their heathen kinsmen in Germany.

Brihuega, THE BATTLE OF (1710), was a great defeat sustained by the English arms during the War of the Succession in Spain. General Stanhope, with Staremberg, his Austrian colleague, had occupied Madrid, but it was found impossible to hold the city. They therefore retreated into Catalonia, marching in two parallel armies. The French commander, the Duke of Vendôme, pursued with remarkable rapidity. Stanhope was surprised and surrounded at Brihuega. The walls of the town were battered with cannon, and a mine sprung under one of the gates. The English kept up a deadly fire until their powder was consumed, and then fought on with the bayonet against terrible odds. At length the British general saw that further resistance could produce only a useless slaughter of his troops. He concluded a capitulation by which the remnant of his army, 500 in number, surrendered themselves as prisoners of war. Scarcely was it signed when Staremburg appeared. His slowness had ruined his cause; but the battle that ensued, called that of Villa Viciosa, was admirably contested, when night put an end to it. Staremburg remained master of the field, but all the fruits of the battle remained with Vendôme. The Austrian general spiked his cannon, and, with a sorry remnant of his army, consisting of 7,000, took refuge in Barcelona.

Brisbane, the capital of Queensland, was founded as a penal settlement in 1825, and named after Sir Thomas Brisbane, Governor of New South Wales, 1822--26. It formed part of New South Wales till 1859. The penal establishment was abolished in 1842.

Bristol has from an early period ranked as one of the most important of English towns. Until the rise of Liverpool and the manufacturing towns of the North, it was the second city in the kingdom. The castle was granted by the Conqueror to Robert Fitzhamon, from whom it passed by marriage to Robert of Gloucester, natural son of Henry I. Robert of Normandy was for a time imprisoned here. In Bristol Castle Stephen was imprisoned by the partisans of Matilda in 1141, and sixty years later the ill-fated Eleanor of Brittany was incarcerated at Bristol by her uncle John, who was afraid that her claims to the throne might be put forward by his opponents. In 1399 Henry of Lancaster took the town, and put to death many of the adherents of Richard II. Sebastian Cabot was born at Bristol, and sailed from that port on his famous voyage, and in 1609 a colony of settlers from Bristol were the first to establish themselves in Newfoundland. Bristol was made the seat of one of Henry VIII.'s new bishoprics. The town played a very prominent part in the civil war of the seventeenth century. At the beginning of the Great Rebellion Bristol declared for the Parliament, and received a garrison under the command of Nathaniel Fiennes. In July, 1643, the Royalist successes in the west made the possession of Bristol still more important, as commanding the valley of the Severn, and Prince Rupert was sent to besiege it. After a very brief attack, Fiennes determined to capitulate, and Rupert offered such good terms that a large number of the Parliamentary troops took service in his army. Bristol remained in the possession of the Royalists till September, 1645, when Rupert, who was in command of the town, surrendered it in almost as unaccountable a manner as Fiennes had done two years before. In 1656 Bristol Castle was destroyed by the government. In 1685 it was the one town in Somerset that refused to receive Monmouth. In 1715 serious riots broke out here on the occasion of the accession of George I. Violent riots also occurred in 1793 in opposition to an unpopular bridge-toll, and many persons lost their lives before they were suppressed; and great rioting took place in 1831 [Bristol Riots] in connection with the Reform Bill. The church of St. Mary Redcliffe, one of the finest in England, was in great part built by William Cannynge, a wealthy merchant of Bristol, in the later part of the fourteenth century.

Bristol, JOHN DIGBY, 1ST EARL OF (b. 1580, d. 1653). He was born at Colehill, in Warwickshire, was the youngest son of Sir George Digby, knight, and of Abigail, daughter of Sir A. Hevengham of Norfolk. In March, 1606, he was knighted by James I. In 1611, and again in 1614, he went as ambassador to Spain. In 1616 James conferred on him the manor of Sherborne, in Dorset. In 1617 Digby went for the third time to Madrid with the special mission of reviving negotiations, commenced during his former embassies, for a marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta Maria. On his return in 1618 he was made a peer with the title of Baron Digby of Sherborne. In 1621 Digby went first to Brussels and afterwards to Vienna, in order to prevail on the Emperor Ferdinand to restore the Palatinate to James's son-in-law, Frederic. Digby strove to negotiate peace on the basis that the Emperor should restore the Palatinate, and that Frederic in return should renounce the title of King of Bohemia and abandon the right of private war within the Empire. But his efforts were unavailing. If Digby's policy was to succeed, it was necessary that James should be able, in case of need, to draw the sword. James, by his angry dissolution of Parliament in 1621, shattered the policy of his ambassador. In 1622 Digby again went to Spain in order to conclude the marriage treaty and obtain the restoration of the Palatinate through the influence of Philip IV. He thought that, in return for some modification in the treatment of English Catholics, Spain would support a compromise in Germany. But in this he was mistaken, since the Spaniards were aiming at no less than the conversion of the English nation to the Catholic faith. In 1622 he was created Earl of Bristol. The visit of Charles and Buckingham to Spain in 1623 resulted in the breaking off of the negotiation and the recall of Bristol. On his return Bristol was ordered to remain in confinement at his own house, because he refused to admit that he had been at fault and to make apologies to Buckingham. In 1626 he appealed to the House of Lords and brought accusations against the Duke of Buckingham. Charles, to defend his favourite, retaliated by accusing Bristol of high treason. In 1628 Bristol opposed the king's first answer to the Petition of Right. When Strafford was impeached, Bristol sought to save his life while incapacitating him from holding office. On the breaking out of the civil war, he took the king's side. At its close he went to Paris, where he died Jan. 16, 1653.

A few of Bristol's Despatches are printed in the Appendix to the Clarendon State Papers, vol. i. For his defence of his conduct in Spain, see the Comden Miscellany, vol. vi.; for his own impeachment, and the charges that he made against Buckingham, Parliamentary History, vol. vii.; for a general account of his political career, S. Bristol, GEORGE DIGBY, 2ND EARL OF (b. 1612, d. 1677), was the eldest son of the preceding. He was educated at Oxford, and sat for Dorsetshire both in the Short and the Long Parliaments. He at first joined the Opposition, and was one of the managers of Strafford's impeachment, but soon went over to the king, and voted against the Bill of Attainder which the Parliamentary leaders had brought in against Strafford. He received a writ of summons to the House of Lords as Baron Digby, and became one of the king's confidential advisers. He was one of the chief promoters of the scheme for the arrest of the Five Members, after the failure of which he was impeached by the Commons and fled to Holland. On his return he was captured and imprisoned at Hull, under the care of Sir John Hotham, who connived at his escape. He joined the king, and took part in most of the important battles of the Civil War, till, quarrelling with Prince Rupert, he threw up his command. At the conclusion of the war he fled to France, where he distinguished himself in the war of the Fronde; but, having formed a foolish idea of supplanting Mazarin and becoming Prime Minister of France, he was obliged to escape to the Netherlands. On the Restoration he returned to England, but his flighty and untrustworthy character prevented his being appointed to any office. In 1663 he brought a charge of high treason against Clarendon, which was, however, rejected by the House of Lords, and after that he took no part in public affairs. He was a man of undoubted ability, and one of the foremost orators of his time, but unstable and headstrong to the last degree.

Clarendon, Hist. of the Rebellion, and Life; Lodge, Portraits.

Bristol, FREDERICK AUGUSTUS HERVY, EARL OF (d. 1803), and Bishop of Derry, was an eccentric nobleman who affected to adopt the character of a prelate of the Middle Ages. He raised three regiments of Volunteers, which were commanded by his nephew. At the second Dungannon Convention he was one of the leaders. In 1784 he entered Dublin in almost royal state, and expected to be chosen president of the Convention there, but he had identified himself too much with the more extreme party, and was disappointed. When the Convention dispersed, he went to Ulster and made inflammatory speeches, so that at one time his arrest was contemplated. The earl was in favour of Catholic Emancipation, Reform, and separation from England.

Bristol Riots (Oct. 29, 1831) were a series of outbreaks produced by the popular indignation which resulted from the rejection of the Reform Bill by the House of Lords. On the occasion of the public entry into Bristol of the recorder, Sir Charles Wetherell, a bitter opponent of the Bill, a mob which seems never to have greatly exceeded a few hundred persons, took possession of the principal streets, broke into the town-hall, and set fire to several houses. For two days, the weakness of the magistrates allowed the disorders to continue unchecked; at length they instructed the military to re-establish order, which was done without much difficulty, though with some loss of life. The blame for the long continuance of the riots was laid on Colonel Brereton, the commander of the military, who might have used the discretion with which the magistrates had armed him (probably in order to avoid the responsibility themselves) to suppress the disturbances at an earlier period. He was tried by court-martial, and, unable to face the consequences, committed suicide. Four of the ringleaders were hanged, and the town was compelled to pay £68,000 damages.

Britain. [BRITANNIA; ROMANS IN BRITAIN; BRITONS; and GREAT BRITAIN.]

Britain, COUNT OF (Comes Britannie), was a Roman officer who in Constantine's scheme of governing the Empire, was the supreme general of the military forces in Britain. His jurisdiction was, however, subject to that of the Masters of the Cavalry and Infantry in the West. His power was not localised within Britain, but under him were the Dux Britanniarum, who seems to have commanded the forces massed along the northern wall, and the Comes Litoris Saxonici, who was in command of the coast-line between the Wash and Wight, which was most exposed to piratical Saxon assaults. The "Gwledig" is thought by some to have inherited the power of the Dux Britanniarum.

Rhys, Celtic Britain, pp. 98, 99; Skene, Ancient Books of Wales, i. seq.; Hübnar in Corpus Inscript. Lat., vii. 8.

Britannia, or Brittania (the latter very rare form is the "theoretically correct" spelling), a name constructed by the Romans from the tribe-name Brittones, known to them as Britanni, and used by them to denote the larger of the "British Islands," originally styled Albion. After Caesar's time this is the general usage, but in an earlier form "ai Bperavikal rīsoi" are said to have included Ierne (Ireland) as well as Albion. [BRITONS.]

Rhys, Celtic Britain, pp. 208–211.

Britannia, THE ROMAN DIVISIONS OF. Originally only one Province of Britain was constituted, but it is possible that Severus divided it into Upper and Lower Britain; though whether this statement rests on a misconception of Dio Cassius, a merely popular use of the words, or a regular legal subdivision of the province, it is hard to determine. In Diocletian and Constantine's reorganisation of the Empire, the "diocese" of Britain was divided into four "provinces," Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Flavia Cæsariensis, and Maxima Cæsariensis. To these Valentia was added in 369. It consisted of the district between the two walls of Hadrian and Antoninus. The situation of the rest is absolutely unknown, for it is now acknowledged that the chronicle of "Richard of Cirencester," from which the ordinary identification comes, is an eighteenth-century forgery.

Hübner, Preface to vol. vii. of Corpus Inscript. Let., gives a well-digested summary of all that is known on this subject. Cf. Rhys, Celtic Britain, and Elton, Origins of Eng. History.

Britanny, RELATIONS WITH. There is no sufficient evidence to warrant the belief that Britanny received its present population from Britons who fled from the Saxon invaders. Individual cases of emigration, settlements from the days of the soldiers of Maximus downwards, there may well have been. Intimate relations certainly existed between Welshmen and Britons in the earliest times. Similarity of language, place-names, institutions, and traditions point to the racial unity of Gaul and Briton. In their western sea-girt highlands, each alike struggled against the ever-flowing tide of Roman and Teutonic influences, yet preserved unimpaired their tongue and nationality. But the colonisation theory is rather a popular attempt to explain these phenomena than a proved fact. If the Britons did conquer Armorica, whom did they expel, and how did fugitives, disorganised by defeat, manage to win so large and fair a territory? The popular legends, moreover, speak as much of migrations from Armorica to Britain (e.g., the legend of St. Padarn in Rees' Welsh Saints) as from Britain to Armorica. With the establishment of the English monarchy over Britain, the early relations of Wales and Britanny became fewer. But even in England Alfred sends gifts to Breton Abbays, and Athelstan gives a shelter to Alan when the Breton revolt against William Longsword of Normandy had been put down. The superiority which Rolf had previously established over Britanny thus continues, and accounts for the number of Bretons in the Conqueror's army, and their large grants of land in the west of England. Alan of Britanny received that Honour of Richmond which so long remained a link between England and Britanny. It was from Britanny that Walter Map brought the old Welsh Book of Legends of Arthur that is professedly the basis of Geoffrey of Monmouth's history, and Rhys Ap Tewdwr's return from his exile in Armorica marks a new era in Welsh literature. Like the Welsh, the Bretons were constantly harassed by war and faction; and, in 1148, when the Count of Porhoet defeated Hoel VI., the defeated party invoked the aid of Henry of Anjou as Rolf's successor. Henry granted the duchy to his brother Geoffrey, whose death was succeeded by the triumph of the native prince, Conon IV. But Henry, since 1164 King of England, compels Conon to abdicate and marry his daughter Constance to his son Geoffrey. Thus Henry II. practically adds Britanny to the Angevin Dominions. Geoffrey died in 1186, and the rivalry of John and Philip Augustus for his territory ultimately led to his son Arthur's murder, the French triumph, and a new line of Breton princes sprung from Geoffrey's daughter. In 1342 Edward III. found another opportunity of intervention in favour of John of Montfort, the native claimant, against Charles of Blois, the friend of Philip VI. For many years the Breton succession war was an episode in the great hundred years' struggle of France and England. Left unsettled at the Treaty of Bretigny, the question was at last decided, at the battle of Auray, in favour of the house of Montfort. In the early stages of England's second struggle for France, Britanny, though less energetically than Burgundy, sided with the English. But Arthur of Richmond, brother of the duke, and inheritor of the old Honour of Alan, broke with the English, and became the great supporter of Charles VII. In 1488 the death of Francis II. produced a European contest for the hand of his daughter Anne which, despite the exertions of Henry VII., resulted in her marriage with Charles VIII., and the ultimate annexation of Britanny to France. Thus the old ally of England became a province of her hereditary enemy.

Bede, Nennius, the Anglo-Saxon Chron. and the Brut y Tywysogion, contain the earliest references to the colonisation. Cf. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 365, note, which refers to the Historics of Britanny, by Halitgwen and De Courson. Freeman's Norman Conquest (vol. i. 199, 206; vol. iii. 313; vol. iv. 172, 296) gives an account of later dealings. For Henry II.'s relations, see Lytton, History of Henry II.

British Legion, THE. On the outbreak of the war between Isabella of Spain and Don Carlos, in 1835, an Order in Council was issued, on Lord Palmerston's suggestion, authorising "any persons to engage during the next two years in the military and naval service of her Majesty Isabella II., Queen of Spain." De Lacy Evans, a colonel in the British army, was selected for the command. Recruits to the number of 10,000 were rapidly enlisted, and despatched under his orders to the Peninsula. They did not effect much. In 1837 Evans returned to England; and in 1838 the Ministry withdrew the Order in Council, and the corps was dissolved.

Briton, THE NORTH. [WILKES.]

Britons. The general name given by the Romans to the inhabitants of South Britain. Its etymology has generally been traced to the Welsh brith (spotted or tattooed), but it is more probably kindred with brethyn, the Welsh for cloth. Thus, the Britons were the clothed people, as opposed to the pre-Celtic occupants, who probably wore but little clothing. The classical form "Britanni" passed away with the Romans, and was superseded by the more correct form, "Brittones." Modern inquirers have sought a remedy for the vague use of the word Briton by limiting it (in its Welsh form, Brython) to that branch of the Celtic stock otherwise called the Cymric; and it has been pointed out that large Gaelic survivals prevented South Britain from being exclusively the property of either group of tribes. [CELT.] But as these vestiges of the Gael had almost passed away before regular history begins, we cannot do much harm in treating of the Britons in the more general sense of the ancient writers. But, politically and socially, we have not sufficient information to draw a clear line between Brython and Goidel (Gael); especially if, with Mr. Elton, we reject the accounts in Bede and his school. The absence of heroic kingship, the nearer approximation (especially in the South-East) to the higher culture and civilisation of Gaul, the predominance of Druidism [DRAUIDS] over the ordinary Aryan polytheism are, perhaps, the chief marks of the "Brythonic" tribes. Linguistically, they are distinguished from the Gael by the use of "p" instead of the older "qu" or "qv." The tribes of the south were, from their neighbourhood or their affinity to the Gauls, the most advanced in culture, and the Cantii were, according to Cæsar, the most civilised nation. Besides these, the chief tribes of the Britons were the Belgæ, Atrebatii, the Regni, the Durotriges, and the Dumnonii (Goidelic) of the South; the Dobuni, Catuvellauni, Coritani, and Cornarii of Middle England; the Icenii, Cenimagni, and Trinobantes of the Eastern Counties; the Silures, Demetæ, and Ordovices of South-Eastern, South-Western, and Northern Wales; the Brigantes, and some less important tribes—such as the Parisi, Segantii, Otadini, Selgovæ, and Damnonii—of the district between the Humber and the Northern Wall. Beyond this latter the Britons, in any precise sense, hardly extended.

Elton, Origins of English History (especially chap. ix.), with Rhys's later Celtic Britain; Skene, Celtic Scotland, gives a rather different view; Camden, Britannia, has the fullest local and archaeological details.

For the ethnology and general characteristics of the Britons, see CELTS. The chief tribes are mentioned under their various names. For the political history of Britain, see ROMANS IN BRITAIN. [T. F. T.]

Britton is the title of an early summary or abstract ("Summa de legibus Angliæ quæ vocatur Bretones") of English law purporting to have been written by command of Edward I. Nothing is known with certainty as to the authorship of the work. The theory that it was the work of John le Breton, Bishop of Hereford, is untenable, because there are allusions in the work to events which occurred after the death of that prelate in 1275. Selden and others have thought that the book was written by Henry de Bracton, and is an abridgment of his great work. [BRACTON] Britton is a very useful guide to the English legal system of the thirteenth century. It has been printed, in 1640, by Edward Wingate, and by Mr. F. M. Nichols, with an English translation, Oxford, 1865.

Broad Bottom Administration, THE (1744—1754), was a cant name given to the ministry formed by the Pelhams, after they had contrived to rid themselves of Carteret by threatening to resign, because its supposed policy was to admit to office the heads of Opposition, both Whig and Tory, except Carteret and Bath. Chesterfield and Pitt were persuaded to relinquish their opposition (the former becoming Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland), the Privy Seal was given to the Tory Lord Gower, and Sir John Hinde Cotton, an undoubted Jacobite, was given a place about the court; while other posts were given to the Dukes of Devonshire and Bedford, Lords Cobham and Hobart, and Bubb Dodington. In 1746 the Pelhams, finding themselves in danger of being once more supplanted by Granville (Carteret), demanded the admission of Pitt to office, and on the king's refusal resigned; but on Granville's failure to form a ministry they returned to office.

Broken Men was the name applied by the Scottish government, in the fifteenth century and subsequently, to such persons in the Highlands as had no chief to be responsible for them. The government had so far recognised the tribal institutions that, by an Act of Council of the reign of James IV., the chiefs were held responsible for the execution of writs against their followers.

Bromley, Sir Thomas (b. 1530, d. 1587), was in 1566 made Recorder of London, and in 1570 Solicitor-General, in which capacity he took a leading part in the trial of the Duke of Norfolk, 1572; he was subsequently employed in the attempt to extort concessions from the Queen of Scots; and, on the death of Sir Nicholas Bacon, was made Lord Chancellor, 1579. In 1586 he took an active part in the prosecution of the conspirators in Babington's plot, and was President of the Commission for the trial of Mary Stuart, whilst he shared with Burleigh and Davison the responsibility of despatching the warrant. He died shortly afterwards, having never got over the anxiety of the presidency.

Brompton, John, Abbot of Jervaulx, compiled a chronicle about the middle of the fifteenth century, consisting of selections carefully made from older chroniclers. This work, which embraces the period from 597 to 1199, possesses little authority, but curiously enough is constantly quoted by historians. It was printed by Twysden in his Scriptores Decem, 1652.

Brooke, Sir James (b. 1803, d. 1868), after serving with credit in the Bengal army, visited Borneo in his yacht in 1838, and assisted the Sultan against the revolted Dyak tribe. In return he received a grant of the district of Sarawak from the Sultan of Borneo with the title of Rajah. He did much to ameliorate the condition of the natives, to develop the resources of the island, and to suppress piracy, and earned on several occasions the thanks of the British government, to whom he more than once offered to surrender Sarawak. The island of Labuan having been acquired by the British, Brooke was appointed its governor, 1847; but in 1851 serious charges of cruelty were brought against him by Joseph Hume. A Royal Commission was appointed to investigate the matter, but came to no definite conclusion. Sir James Brooke was, however, deprived of his governorship. His later years were spent in England; but he made frequent visits to Sarawak.

Parl. Debates (3rd ser.), vol. 118, p. 439, seq. A collection of Sir J. Brooke's Letters was issued in 1863.

Brougham and Vaux, Henry, Lord (b. 1778, d. 1868), the eldest son of Henry Brougham, of Brougham Hall, Westmoreland, educated at the High School and University of Edinburgh, was admitted to the Scottish bar in 1800. When the Edinburgh Review was established in 1802, Mr. Brougham became one of its most active contributors, and exhibited an extraordinary variety and extent of knowledge. In 1807 he resolved to qualify himself for the English bar, and in 1808 he began to practise in the Court of King's Bench, and on the northern circuit. In 1809 he was returned to Parliament for the borough of Camelford. His powers of debate were soon recognised, and he became the rival of George Canning, and his most formidable opponent. In the election of 1811, Mr. Brougham was beaten at Liverpool by Mr. Canning, and was excluded from Parliament till 1816, when he was returned for Winchelsea. In 1820 he undertook, with Denman, the defence of Queen Caroline. During the whole of the trial his popularity was as unbounded as the queen's. On Feb. 11, 1822, he moved a resolution in the House of Commons for the consideration of the public burdens, particularly those pressing on the agricultural interest. This motion was, however, negatived. In the same year he moved a resolution condemnatory of the unconstitutional influence of the crown in the government, which was also lost. In 1823 he delivered a powerful speech exposing the designs of the Holy Alliance. On April 17th of the same year, he exchanged abuse of such an insulting nature with Canning, that the Speaker was compelled to order both into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and they only escaped this by retractions. In the same year he was engaged with Mr. Birkbeck in founding the first Mechanics' Institute. In 1825 he took a large share in the foundation of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and also of the London University. In 1828 he delivered his famous six hours' speech on Law Reform. In 1830 he came prominently forward as the champion of Parliamentary Reform, and the House of Commons had no sooner met than he announced his intention to bring in a Bill embracing a comprehensive measure of reform. A ministerial crisis, however, supervened. The Duke of Wellington, having been defeated on a government measure, resigned; and the formation of a new government under Earl Grey, including Brougham, who with some difficulty was induced to accept the Chancellorship, placed in the hands of the ministry the great question of Parliamentary Reform. But though no longer a representative of the people, and personally relieved from the charge of the Reform Bill, his best powers were called forth in support of it; and his speech on the 7th Oct., 1831, when the Bill was read a second time in the House of Lords, was a display of eloquence of the highest order. As Lord Chancellor, Brougham's success was not very great. He was unacquainted with the details of English equity, jurisprudence, and with the practice of his court, and his manners gave great offence to the distinguished advocates who practised before him. His extraordinary energy, however, atoned for many defects, and he had the distinction of getting through the arrears in his court with unexampled rapidity. In 1834 Brougham resigned with the Whig government. In 1835 they returned to power under Lord Melbourne, but Lord Brougham, who had never acted cordially with the leaders of his party, did not return with them, and Cottenham, greatly to Brougham's anger and chagrin, was made Lord Chancellor. Released from party ties he now acted independently, and even showed a disposition to court the Tories, and especially the Duke of Wellington. But for the remainder of his long life the part he played in politics was unimportant, though his restless vanity still kept him before the public eye. As a law reformer, and a member of the Privy Council, he continued to do useful work; and many of his judgments in House of Lords appeals are of great importance. Lord Brougham's powers of mind, his remarkable activity, his ardent love of liberty and justice, his versatility and his eloquence, made him one of the most conspicuous figures in English politics for many years; and had these great qualities not been neutralised by defects almost as striking—an unbounded recklessness, an extraordinary want of self-control, and an eccentricity which sometimes bordered on insanity—he could hardly have failed to rank among the most illustrious of English statesmen.

Lord Brougham's Autobiography, which was written during the closing years of his life when his memory was failing, is often untrustworthy. The same must be said of Lord Campbell's Life of Brougham, the work of a not too generous rival. Lord Brougham wrote largely on a great variety of topics, but his writings are now little read. The best of his historical works are the History of England under the House of Lancaster, and Sketches of the Statesmen of the Time of George III. His Speeches were collected in four volumes, 1838. [S. J. L.]

Broughton, JOHN CAM HOBHOUSE, LORD (b. 1786, d. 1869), the eldest son of Sir Benjamin Hobhouse, was educated at Westminster School and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was the intimate friend of Lord Byron, accompanied him on his travels in 1809, and was with him during his first visit to Turkey and Greece. He adopted advanced Liberal views in politics, and was a zealous advocate of Parliamentary Reform. In 1816 he wrote a work called Letters written by an English Gentleman resident at Paris, which gave great offence to the English government. In December, 1819, in consequence of one of these letters, which contained some severe remarks on certain members of the House of Commons, and which was therefore declared a breach of privilege by that assembly, he was arrested and imprisoned in Newgate, but was liberated a few weeks after, when Parliament was dissolved by the death of George IV., in 1820. The same year he was elected with Sir F. Burdett member for Westminster. In 1832 he joined Earl Grey's government as Secretary for War. In 1833 he was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland; and in 1834 Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests. He was President of the Board of Control from 1836 to 1841; and again from 1846 to 1852. He succeeded to the baronetcy in 1831; and was raised to the peerage as Baron Broughton in 1851.

Brownists, THs, were a religious sect founded in the reign of Queen Elizabeth by Robert Brown, a clergyman of the Church of England, who began to preach his doctrines about 1580. They were ultra-Puritans, regarded the Church of England as impure, and, assuming the character of Separatists, refused to hold any communication with her. They were violent opposers of episcopacy, and, in consequence, suffered much persecution at the hands of the bishops. In 1593 a statute was passed enacting the penalty of imprisonment against any person above the age of sixteen who should forbear, for the space of a month, to repair to some church until he should make such open submission and declaration of conformity as the Act appointed. In consequence of the rigorous enforcement of this Act, a large proportion of the Brownists sought an asylum in Holland, whence subsequently, in 1670, many of them sailed from Amsterdam to found a new home in America. The members of the sect who remained in England endured considerable persecution, until the principle of Toleration was recognised. During the Civil Wars of Charles I.'s reign they became merged in the sect of the Independents. The Brownists objected alike to Episcopacy and to the Presbyterian form of Church government, and favoured a purely congregational system, without convocation or synod, and without any separate order of priests. Bruce, THE FAMILY OF (OR DE BRUS), was of Norman descent. The founder of the English branch came over with William the Conqueror and obtained large grants of land in Northumberland, where the family quickly assumed a powerful baronial position, being frequently involved in border warfare with the Scotch. David I. of Scotland made over to the house of Bruce the lands of Annandale about 1130, and thus it obtained its recognition as a power in the south of Scotland. Isabella, second daughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon, the brother of Malcolm IV., married Robert de Brus, Lord of Annandale, and their son became a competitor for the crown of Scotland, 1291. Their grandson was the great Robert Bruce, King of Scotland 1306—1329.

Bruce, EDWARD (d. 1318), was the brother of Robert Bruce. He commanded the reserve at Bannockburn, and dispersed the English archers. His restless spirit gave much trouble to his brother, who gladly let him go to Ireland, to assist the native rebels against England. On May 25th, 1315, he landed from a fleet of 300 sail at Lorne, on the coast of Antrim. With some 600 men he took Dundalk, and was joined by a large native force. The O'Neil resigning his claims, he was crowned king. At the River Boyne he defeated the O'Connors and the Red Earl of Ulster, and proceeded to besiege Carrickfergus. In Meath the Lord Justice Mortimer succumbed to him, and the flight of another English force before him led to a rising in Munster and Leinster. In 1316, however, want of provisions compelled the Scots to retire into Ulster and leave the Wicklow septa to their fate. The De Burghs and Geraldines also agreed to a truce in face of a common foe. But Robert's arrival counteracted all this, and was at once followed by the capture of Carrickfergus, though the English victory at Athenry restored the balance somewhat. The Bruces, however, followed by 20,000 men, now marched straight on Dublin, and the De Lacys openly joined them. Dublin was not taken, but the country was wasted as far as Limerick; and so completely was this done that the Scots themselves suffered severely, on their retreat, from want, and it was only the supineness of the English which enabled them to regain their old position. In 1317, Robert Bruce's good sense induced him to give up the contest and leave Ireland; all his forces, however, remained with his brother. The Anglo-Irish, still fighting among themselves, were unable to gain any advantage. In 1318, however, Edward Bruce and the De Lacys, joining their forces, marched to Dundalk, but were met near that place, on Oct. 5th, by the now united English, were routed, and Bruce himself killed. His body was quartered, and the head sent to Edward II.

Walsingham, Hist. Angliæ; Moore, Hist. of Ireland.

BRUCE, ROBERT, KING OF SCOTLAND (b. 1274, s. 1306, d. 1329), was the grandson of Robert de Bruce, the rival of John Baliol. In 1297 he fought for Edward I. against Wallace, then joined the Scottish army, and, in the same year, returned to his allegiance to the English king until 1298, when he again joined the national party in Scotland, and was chosen one of the guardians of that kingdom. In 1304 he entered into an alliance of mutual support with Lamberton, Bishop of St. Andrews, and about the same time became reconciled to Edward, at whose court he resided until Feb., 1306, when—hearing that the king, owing to some information that he had obtained from Comyn, intended to put him to death—he fled to Scotland. Having stabbed Comyn at Dumfries in a quarrel, he determined to assert his right to reign over Scotland as the representative of David of Huntingdon. He was accordingly crowned at Scone (March 27th, 1306) by the Countess of Buchan, of the house of Macduff.

Edward I. at once procured from the Pope the excommunication of Bruce, and was on his way to revenge the death of Comyn when he died at Burgh-on-the-Sands, in 1307. Before this, however, Bruce had been twice defeated (at Methven and Dulay), though he had somewhat retrieved his fortunes at Loudoun Hill. It is to this period of his life that the marvellous stories told by the chroniclers about him mainly refer. There is no doubt that Bruce had to conceal himself in the fastnesses of the mountains, and to support himself as best he could. In 1308 he routed his old enemy, the Earl of Buchan, at Inverury, harried Lorne, and received additional support by a declaration of allegiance on the part of the clergy. A feeble incursion into Scotland, undertaken by Edward II., 1310, was revenged by Bruce in the two following years, when he invaded England and laid Durham waste. In 1313 Bruce ravaged Cumberland, and laid violent siege to the castle of Stirling, the attempted relief of which by the English led to the Scotch victory of Bannockburn in 1314, a battle in which Bruce displayed as much generalship and valour as he afterwards did moderation in the use he made of his victory. His attempts to bring about peace were, however, unsuccessful. In 1316, when he left Scotland for a time to aid his brother Edward in Ireland, his absence was made the occasion of many unsuccessful inroads by the English. An attempt at mediation on the part of the Pope (John XXII.) having failed, Bruce, in 1318, took Berwick, and harried Northumberland and Yorkshire. The next year Edward II. tried unsuccessfully to recover Berwick, only drawing down on his kingdom retaliatory raids on the part of Bruce, who, in 1322, entered into negotiations with the rebel Earl of Carlisle. At length, on March 30th, 1323, a truce was concluded at Thorpe, in Yorkshire, for thirteen years, and was ratified by Robert Bruce at Berwick. The peace was, however, soon broken, and in 1326 Bruce again ravaged the north of England, evading the English army, which he reduced to great straits by destroying all their provisions. In 1328, another treaty very favourable to Scotland was made at Northampton, by which Robert's son David married Joanna, daughter of Edward II. "The good King Robert" died at Cardross, June 7, 1329, and by his patriotism, wisdom, and courage left behind him the character of a good man. He married, first, Isabella, daughter of the Earl of Mar, and, secondly, Elizabeth de Burgh, daughter of the Earl of Ulster.

Bruce, ROBERT DE (d. 1295), and Lord of Annandale, was of Norman origin, and the son of Robert de Bruce and Isabella, daughter of David of Huntingdon. He was one of the Scotch Commissioners who went to Salisbury to confer about the marriage of Prince Edward and the Maid of Norway (1286). On the dispute for the succession to the Scotch crown, after the death of the Maid of Norway (1290), Bruce put in a claim as the descendant, in the nearest degree, of David of Huntingdon. He also declared that in 1240 Alexander II. had, in an Assembly of the Estates, recognised him as his heir in the event of his dying childless (since that time, however, other male descendants had been born). The only other competitor whom Bruce had to fear was John Baliol, in whose favour Edward finally decided (Nov., 1292). On the resignation of Baliol in 1295, Bruce tried ineffectually to persuade Edward to bestow the kingdom on him. He died shortly afterwards.

Brude, SON OF MARLIN, was a powerful Pictish monarch (b. 556, d. 583) who had his capital at Inverness. In 560 he defeated the Scots of Dalriada, slaying their king, Gabran, and driving them back to Kintyre. This defeat was important, as it led to the mission of St. Columba, by whom Brude was baptised in 563. [Picts].

Brunanburh, THE BATTLE OF (937), was fought by Athelstan against the combined forces of Anlaf the Dane, who came over from Ireland, Constantine of Scotland, and Owen of Cumberland. This powerful combination was thoroughly routed by Athelstan, and in commemoration of the great Saxon victory over this great Danish and Celtic league a noble war-song was composed, which is preserved in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. The site of the battle is very doubtful; it has been placed in the Lothians, in Northumberland, in Yorkshire, and it has been identified, with some plausibility, with Brumby, in Lincolnshire.

Brutus (or Brute) was the name assigned to the fabulous hero who was supposed to have given his name to the island of Britain. According to the account given by Geoffrey of Monmouth, and universally believed in the Middle Ages, Brutus was the great-grandson of Æneas. Having been banished from Italy, he retired to Greece, where he became the champion of the oppressed Trojans. After many difficulties, he succeeded in reaching Albion, which at that time was inhabited by giants. Having destroyed these monsters, the Trojans occupied the country, which, in honour of their leader, they called Britain. Brutus died in the twenty-fourth year after his arrival in the island.

Brut y Tywysogion, or THE CHRONICLE OF THE PRINCES OF WALES, is the name of a most important Welsh chronicle which extends from the abdication of Cadwal at Rome in the year 681 to the conquest of Wales in 1282. It is printed with an English translation in the Rolls Series (1860).

Buccaneers (the name is derived from a word used by the Caribbean Indians denoting dried or cured meat) were associations of piratical adventurers which flourished in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The buccaneers were chiefly English and French, and owed their origin to the attempts made by other European nations, in the early part of the sixteenth century, to acquire a share in the rich American trade which the Spaniards attempted to engross. The buccaneers, though in later times they carried on general piracy, directed their chief efforts against the Spaniards, whom they regarded as their natural enemies. In 1625 they took St. Christopher, and in 1630 Tortuga, which they made their head-quarters. In 1670, under Henry Morgan, they captured Panama with immense booty; and in 1683 and 1684 made the expeditions to the South Seas which are described in Dampier's famous Voyages. In 1670 a treaty, called "The Treaty of America," was concluded between England and Spain for the suppression of the buccaneer associations, but it was quite ineffectual. The wars between England and France, by making the English and French buccaneers enemies, did much to weaken them, and after the Treaty of Ryswick they gradually disappeared. The most noted buccaneer chiefs were Montbars, François L'Olornais, Mansvelt, and especially Henry Morgan, who was knighted by Charles II., and made deputy-governor of Jamaica.

Buch, JEAN DE GRAILLY, CAPTAL DE (d. 1377), was one of the most famous of the English commanders in the French wars of Edward III.'s reign. He was a native of Aquitaine, and attached himself to the Black Prince, with whom he fought at Poitiers and Navarrete. In 1372 he was taken prisoner by the French, and died in captivity five years later.

Buchan, JOHN COMYN, EARL OF, was a staunch adherent of Edward I. He was defeated by Bruce at Inverury, and had his territory harried by the victorious troops. His wife, Isabella Macduff, sister of the Earl of Fife, was a supporter of Robert Bruce, and crowned that king at Scone, March 27, 1306. For this, she was imprisoned by Edward I. in a cage at Berwick, as a warning to those who dared to support Bruce.

Buchan, JOHN STEWART, EARL OF (d. 1424), the second son of Robert, Duke of Albany, led a Scotch army of about 6,000 men to France, to aid Charles V. against the English. After winning the battle of Beaugé, he was created Constable of France and Count of Aubigny, and was slain at Verneuil, 1424.

Buchanan, GEORGE (b. 1506, d. 1582), studied at Paris and at St. Andrews, and became tutor to the Earl of Cassilis in 1532, and subsequently to a son of James V. He bitterly assailed the friars in his Franciscanus, which subjected him to much persecution from Cardinal Beaton. He found it unsafe to reside in Scotland, and retired to Bordeaux. In 1544 he went to Paris and taught at the College of Bourbon. Three years later he went to Coimbra in Portugal. Here he was seized as a heretic, and imprisoned in a monastery, where he began his version of the Psalms. On his release he remained for some years in France, and in 1560 came to Scotland as Latin tutor to Queen Mary. He received a pension from the queen, and in 1567 was made Moderator of the General Assembly. He accompanied the Regent Murray to England, and took a considerable share in political affairs, being among the most violent opponents of the Queen of Scots. He was present at the Commission of Inquiry at York in 1568 as the representative of the Scottish lords, and has been charged with the forgery of the "Casket Letters" (q.v.). In 1571 he printed his tract De Maria Scotorum Regina, a very bitter attack on Mary. Meanwhile, in 1570 he had become tutor to the young prince James, and soon afterwards was made Director of the Chancery and Lord Privy Seal, and sat in Parliament for some years. He was a voluminous writer of Latin verse, and is among the first, if not the very first, of non-classical poets. He was the author of two important prose works. The famous treatise, De Jure Regni apud Scotos, published in 1579, is a political dialogue on the source and origin of kingly power. It is filled with the principles of liberal and constitutional monarchy, and its author has been not inaptly styled "the first Whig." The Rerum Scoticarum Historia, published in 1582, is an authoritative record of Scotch affairs in the sixteenth century.

Buckingham was an ancient borough at the time of the Domesday Survey. It had been fortified by Edward the Elder in the early part of the tenth century, and captured by the Danes in 1016. It was a place of considerable trade in the Middle Ages, and Edward III. fixed one of the wool staples there. It received a charter from Mary in 1564, which was surrendered and restored in 1684. The borough formerly returned two members to Parliament; but it was deprived of one of its representatives in 1688.

Buckingham, PEERAGE OF. (i.) William Giffard is said to have received the earldom of Buckingham from William I. His son died without issue, 1164. (ii.) Thomas of Woodstock, youngest son of Edward III., was created Earl of Buckingham 1377, died 1397. His son Humphrey died without issue, 1399. (iii.) Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, who inherited the earldom of Buckingham from his mother, sister of the last earl, was created Duke of Buckingham, 1444. His great-grandson, third duke, was beheaded, 1521, and his honours forfeited. (iv.) George Villiers, created Earl of Buckingham 1616, marquis 1618 (his mother, being later in the year created Countess of Buckingham for life, died 1632), and duke 1623. George Villiers, second duke of this line, died without issue, 1687. (v.) John Sheffield, Marquis of Normanby, created Duke of Buckinghamshire, 1703. His son Edmund, second duke, died without issue, 1735. (vi.) George Grenville, Earl Temple (son of George Grenville, Premier 1763—65, and brother of Lord Grenville, Premier 1806—7), created Marquis of the town of Buckingham, county Bucks, 1784. His son was created duke in 1822.

Buckingham, HENRY STAFFORD, DUKE OF (d. 1483), was the eldest son of Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham, by Margaret Beaufort, daughter and heiress of Edmund, Duke of Somerset. He was doubly connected with the royal family, and his marriage with Catherine Woodville, daughter of Earl Rivers, made him brother-in-law to Edward IV. He was one of Richard III.'s great supporters, and was the chief agent in obtaining the crown for him. But before Richard had been on the throne many months Buckingham became alienated from him, the chief reason being apparently Richard's refusal to give him any portion of the inheritance of the Bohuns, to which Buckingham had a claim. Influenced by Morton, Bishop of Ely, he entered into a project for calling over Henry, Earl of Richmond. This scheme was supported by the Woodville party, and Buckingham arranged that he should head a rising in the west of England, while Richmond was to land in the south. But the insurrection ended in failure. Buckingham had raised a small force in Wales, but all the bridges over the Severn were broken down, while unusually heavy rains had so swelled the rivers as to make them impassable. Being unable to get provisions, most of his men deserted, and Buckingham himself took refuge in Shropshire, but was betrayed by one of his retainers, taken to Salisbury, and executed there.

Buckingham, EDWARD STAFFORD, DUKE OF (d. 1521), the eldest son of Henry, Duke of Buckingham, was restored by Henry VII. to all his father's dignities and possessions. In 1521 he was tried and executed for high treason, the chief evidence for the charge being that he had unguardedly let fall some expressions to the effect that he would be entitled to succeed to the throne should the king chance to die without issue. No doubt his connection with the royal line was his real offence in the eyes of the king. The office of Constable, which the Duke of Buckingham inherited from the Bohuns, Earls of Hereford, was forfeited by his presumed offence, and was never afterwards revived in England.

Buckingham, GEORGE VILLIERS, DUKE OF, born Aug. 20, 1592, was a younger son of Sir George Villiers of Brookley. In 1614 he was first brought before the notice of James I., and, being an active, handsome, and intelligent youth, his companionship served to amuse the leisure hours of the king. In 1615, after the fall of the former favourite, Carr, Earl of Somerset, Villiers was left without a rival in the king's favour. In 1616, he was created Viscount Villiers; in 1617 he became Earl; in 1618, Marquis of Buckingham. By the royal bounty he was made one of the richest noblemen in England, and all the patronage of the court was placed in his hands. Few men could endure such rapid and unmerited advancement without detriment to their character. Buckingham was a vain and arrogant man, not ready to take advice, and not content that any should hold office who did not owe their promotion to his good-will. Charges of malversation were brought against various officials, and several noblemen of high birth deprived of their offices. But although some reforms were effected in the public service, and although Buckingham was not personally avaricious, the atmosphere of the court remained venal. Those who sought promotion, if they had not directly to purchase office, were expected to requite the service in one form or another, to win the favour of Buckingham's dependants, or possibly marry one of his needy relations. Over the direction of James's foreign policy Buckingham, during the first part of his career, exercised no appreciable influence. In 1619 the Protestants of Bohemia had risen in rebellion against their king, the Emperor Ferdinand, and had bestowed the crown on James's Protestant son-in-law, the Elector Palatine. The Palatinate had been in consequence invaded by a Spanish army. James hoped to get it restored to the Elector by negotiating a treaty of marriage between Prince Charles and the Spanish Infanta. Buckingham, as personal motives prompted him, joined those who approved of a Spanish alliance or those who desired to render assistance to the Protestant party in Germany. In 1620 he had married a Catholic, Lady Catherine Manners, and in 1622 his attitude became more decided. He entered into a close friendship with the Spanish ambassador, Gondomar, and the following year prevailed on James to let him and the prince go to Spain, under the belief that once there they could readily prevail on Philip IV. to restore his lands to the Elector. Arrived at Madrid Buckingham soon discovered his delusion. The Spaniards wanted toleration for the English Catholics, but refused in return to bind themselves in any way about the Palatinate. During his absence James conferred on Buckingham the title of duke. The new duke and Charles both returned home, irate with the Spaniards and eager to declare war. A Parliament was summoned and its support asked (1624). For a time the duke was immensely popular, but his popularity was short-lived. He had many schemes in his head for the recovery of the Palatinate, but he had not the qualities of a statesman, and did not understand the first conditions of success. A treaty was agreed on for the marriage of Charles with Henrietta Maria, the sister of Louis XIII., in which concessions were made in favour of the English Catholics, although a distinct promise had been given to the Parliament that nothing of the sort should be done. James and Buckingham expected that in return Louis would aid them to recover the Palatinate, but they were soon undeceived. Dire misery and misfortune befell an isolated body of 12,000 men sent to pass through Holland and fight their way into the heart of Germany. In March, 1625, James died, and Charles, who was deeply attached to the duke, came to the throne. A Parliament was summoned from which Charles parted in displeasure because it expressed distrust of the duke's capacity. A fleet despatched to Cadiz to seize Spanish treasures returned without effecting its object. Want of money led to the summoning of a second Parliament, which impeached the duke and was angrily dissolved by the king (1626). Buckingham, always buoyant and sanguine, believed that if he could achieve success he should recover popularity. Anger against the French king led to a declaration of war with France, and Buckingham sailed in command of a fleet to succour the Protestant town of La Rochelle, which had rebelled against Louis (1627). He effected a landing on the Isle of Rhé, but was subsequently driven off by the French with heavy loss. The king summoned a third Parliament, which passed the Petition of Right and afterwards drew up a Remonstrance asking that Buckingham should be removed from office (1628). In consequence, the Parliament was dissolved, and popular feeling became more excited than ever against the duke. He was at Portsmouth, preparing a second expedition for the relief of Rochelle, when as he left the room where he had breakfasted he was stabbed to the heart by a discontented officer, John Felton, who had served under him, and who thought with one blow to avenge his private wrongs and rid his country of a public enemy (Aug. 22, 1628).

The fullest account of Buckingham is to be found in John Forster's Life of Eliot, and S. E. Gardiner, Hist. of England, 1603—1642.

Buckingham, GEORGE VILLIERS, 2ND DUKE OF (b. 1627, d. 1688), was the son of the first duke. He served in the Royalist army, and was present at the battle of Worcester, after which he retired to the Continent. He returned to England in 1657, and married the daughter of Lord Fairfax, through whose influence he was able to recover a portion of his large estates. At the Restoration he was made Master of the Horse and a Privy Councillor. In 1666 he took part with the Opposition in Parliament, and on a charge of having endeavoured to excite a mutiny in the fleet he was committed to the Tower, but in less than a year he was pardoned. On the formation of the Cabal ministry in 1668, he became one of its chief members, and when it fell in 1673 he, like Shaftesbury, joined the Opposition. But his health was so bad that he took little further part in public affairs, and spent the rest of his life at his seat in Yorkshire. In his private character he ranks as the most profligate member of the most profligate court England has ever seen. He was strongly suspected of having hired Colonel Blood to assassinate the Duke of Ormond, while his seduction of the Countess of Shrewsbury and the death of the earl in a duel with Buckingham created a fearful sensation even in those days. He is thus described by Dryden, under the name of Zimri, in some famous lines of "Abealom and Achitophel"—

"A man so various that he seemed to be,
Not one, but all mankind's epitome;
Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong,
Was everything by starts, and nothing long . . .
Railing and praising were his usual themes;
And both, to show his judgment, in extremes . . .
He laughed himself from court; then sought relief,
By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief."

"Buckingham," says Ranke, "is a forecast of the Regent [Orleans] and Dubois. In natures of this kind everything works together, amusement and labour, distraction and exertion, good and bad; the most refined culture can go with intolerable insolence; for such men have every kind of ambition, they must be first in everything and remain first. Social considerations and sympathies caused by hatred of predecessors determine their political action or inaction." Macaulay describes him as "a sated man of pleasure, who turned to ambition as to a pastime."

Buckinghamshire, JOHN SHEFFIELD, DUKE OF (b. 1649, d. 1721), was the son of Edmund, Lord Mulgrave. On his father's death (1658), he became Earl of Mulgrave. In 1666 he served against the Dutch and returned home to take command of a troop of horse. Again, in 1672, he was appointed captain of a ship of eighty-four guns, and as soon as he came back from sea was made colonel of a regiment of foot. Subsequently he passed over to France to learn the art of war under Turenne. On his return Mulgrave engaged in a professional quarrel with the Duke of Monmouth, and bitterly offended the royal family by entertaining hopes of the hand of Princess, afterwards Queen, Anne. In 1680 he was sent to destroy Moorish pirates who were attacking Tangiers. On the accession of James II. he was created Privy Councillor and Lord Chamberlain. After the Revolution Mulgrave readily took the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. William created him Marquis of Normanby, and named him a Cabinet Councillor. In 1703 he was created Duke of Normanby, and soon afterwards Duke of Buckinghamshire, and in this year built Buckingham House. He was compelled to resign office for caballing with Nottingham and Rochester against Godolphin and Marlborough. Forthwith he became a violent member of the Opposition, and was struck off the list of the Privy Council (1707). In 1710, however, when the Tories were restored to power, he was made Steward of the Household, and on the death of Rochester, Lord President. He entered eagerly into the plots for the restoration of the Stuarts, and is said by Swift to have been the only man he knew who was sincere in his intentions. The death of Anne destroyed his hopes. The remainder of his life was spent in political disgrace. Buckingham wrote some poems, the best known of which are the Essay on Satire and the Essay on Poetry.

Buenos Ayres, EXPEDITIONS AGAINST (1806—1807). In the spring of 1806, Sir Home Popham, who was in command of the naval forces at the Cape of Good Hope, without any authority from the home government sailed from the Cape, taking with him all the naval force, and 1,500 troops. The armament arrived off Buenos Ayres on the 24th June. No time was wasted, and on the 28th the land forces surprised and captured Buenos Ayres, while a feint was made by the fleet against Monte Video. But the inhabitants secretly organised an insurrection which broke out on August 4th, and was assisted from without by the militia of the surrounding districts. The British garrison, after a stout resistance, was overpowered; and the survivors were made prisoners of war, though Sir Home Popham escaped with the squadron, and anchored for a while at the mouth of the river. A fresh force of 3,000 troops was despatched, under Sir Samuel Auchmuty, who, on the 2nd February, 1807, assaulted Monte Video, and carried it by storm after a most stubborn conflict, in which the British loss was 600. In June, Auchmuty was joined by General Craufurd with reinforcements, which brought up the total of the British forces to 9,000 men; and General Whitelocke was sent out to take command of the whole force. On the 5th July, an attack was made, without due preparation or design, on Buenos Ayres. The town had no regular fortifications, and the inhabitants trusted solely to their advantageous position on the roofs and towers. From these points of vantage the attacking troops were met by a destructive fire. On the right, Auchmuty seized the Plaza de Toros, with its large stores of all sorts; but this advantage was more than counterbalanced by the defeat of the English at all other quarters. Next morning the Spanish general offered to restore all British prisoners on condition of the evacuation of Monte Video, and all the rest of the region of the La Plata; and the situation was so hopeless that the English general was glad to obtain such easy terms.

Bulls, PAPAL, are the letters issued by the Popes in their official capacity, addressed to individuals or communities usually on matters of doctrine. Papal letters may be either BRIEFS or BULLS. The latter are considered the more authoritative and important. They are invariably written in Latin on thick parchment, in angular archaic characters, and sealed with the bullo or globular seal of lead attached to the document by threads of silk or hemp. The brief is written in cursive characters, on paper or thin parchment, and sealed in wax with the seal of the Fisherman (sub annulo Piscatoris). It generally refers to matters of discipline. By an ordinance of the Conqueror, ecclesiastics in England were forbidden to receive letters from the Pope, unless they had previously obtained the royal permission. Royal letters, forbidding the introduction of papal bulls without licence, were issued by Edward II. in 1307, and by Edward III. in 1327 and 1376. To procure or publish them was declared high treason by 13 Eliz., cap. 2. [For the various bulls of importance, see under their titles, e.g., CLERICS LAICOS; and for the whole subject see PAPACY.]

The various bulls relating to England, as well as to other countries, are to be found in the Bullarium Magnum Romanum, Luxemburg, 1727, &c.

Bundelkhund. The name of the district between Oude, Malwa, Berar, and Bengal. It was conquered by Rajput tribes in the fourteenth century, and, though exposed to frequent attacks from the Mohammedans, it always managed to resist them successfully. In the middle of the eighteenth century, however, large portions passed into the possession of the Peishwa, and towards the end of the century the whole province was in Mahatta hands. The Treaty of Bassein ceded a portion of the territory to England, and soon afterwards the Rajah Bahadur was induced to part with his large territories in Bundelkhund, receiving compensation elsewhere. On the extinction of the Peishwa's independence in 1818, all his sovereign rights in Bundelkhund were finally ceded to the British.

Bunker Hill, THE BATTLE OF (June 17, 1775), is noticeable as the first important battle of the War of American Independence. Boston is separated by a narrow channel or arm of the sea from the suburb of Charleston. On June 12th General Gage had declared martial law, and was in possession of Charleston and Boston. To secure his position in the former, it was necessary for him to occupy two hills which commanded it—Breed Hill and Bunker Hill. The latter was further from Charleston, but was the higher of the two, and dominated Breed Hill and Charleston. On the night of the 16th a body of American militia were sent to seize it. When on the next morning they were descried on the top of Breed Hill, which they had occupied by mistake, Gage determined to attack them. Three thousand regulars, under Howe and Pigot, assaulted the position in front, unsupported by any movement from the rear. Twice they were driven back, but in the third attempt they were joined by Clinton, and succeeded in dislodging the defenders, who, however, made good their retreat to Prospect Hill, where they encamped. The loss of the assailants in so fierce an assault was 226 killed and 828 wounded and missing. In the course of the assault, Charleston had been set on fire by the British troops under Howe, and the exasperation caused by this act far more than counterbalanced any gain resulting to them from the battle, especially as they remained idly watching Washington, who was in the greatest difficulties, and quite unable to offer any serious resistance to vigorous measures.

Burdett, SIR FRANCIS (b. 1770, d. 1844), the son of Sir Robert Burdett, entered Parliament in 1796 as member for Boroughbridge. In 1797 he brought forward a motion for Parliamentary Reform, and in the following year vigorously protested against the attempts of the government to gag the press. Two years later he devoted all his energies to prevent the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and to secure better provision being made for political prisoners. In 1802 he was elected for Middlesex, and was re-elected at the head of the poll on the former election being declared void. At the election of 1806 he issued a celebrated address to the Middlesex electors, and on being re-elected gave a warm support to the administration of Fox and Lord Grenville. On the resignation of that government he stood for Westminster, and was easily elected. In 1810 he was convicted by the House of Commons of having committed a breach of privilege in a certain letter addressed to his constituents. Burdett refused to surrender to the Speaker's warrant, and the people defended his house. The result was a series of riots, in which the people were fired upon, and some of them killed. Burdett proceeded to bring actions against the Speaker, and nearly every one who had had a hand in his commitment to the Tower, but was unsuccessful. His imprisonment terminated with the prorogation of Parliament, and he resumed his place at the beginning of the session of 1811, when he chiefly occupied himself in opposing the Regency Bill. In 1819, after in vain attempting to induce the House to consider the conduct of the Manchester magistrates at Peterloo, he vented his feelings in a letter to his constituents, for which he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, with a fine of £2,000. In 1822 he supported Lord John Russell's proposed Reform Bill, and continued one of its warmest advocates till it was carried. After this Sir Francis gradually fell away from the Liberals. He denounced the alliance, which took place shortly afterwards, between the ministry and O'Connell, retired from Brookes's Club, and openly joined the Tories. In 1837 he was returned as Conservative member for North Wilts. Till his death in 1844 he continued to represent that constituency.

Burford, THE BATTLE OF (752), between the West Saxons, under Cuthred, and the Mercians, under Ethelbald, resulted in the victory of the former and the maintenance of the independence of Wessex.

Burgess, A, is, properly speaking, the inhabitant of a borough or town exercising a trade there, and enjoying the rights of freedom or citizenship. In the early days of the boroughs, the burgesses were "the owners of land; the owners of houses, shops, or gardens; the burgrave tenants, from whose burgages the firma burgi, or rent, was originally due. In a trading town they would be the members of the gild, and in the judicial work of the town they were the class who furnished the iudices and curatores."

They were also the electors of the municipal magistrates in cases where the corporations had not become close, and were in most cases the holders of the parliamentary franchise. The privileges of the burgesses were in former times very considerable—e.g., participation in the income of the corporation, exclusive right of trading within the borough, and the like. These privileges have, however, been swept away by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, and the burgesses are now simply the constituency which elects the borough council. The term burgess, too, is often applied to the representatives of a borough in Parliament. By a law of Edward II., the burgesses returned for any town were entitled to two shillings a day for expenses, and the practice of paying members of Parliament was occasionally resorted to up to the reign of Charles II. By an Act of Henry V. it was decreed that a burgess of Parliament must be resident in the borough which returned him; but this, however, was not enforced for long. [TOWNS; ELECTIONS.]

Burgh, HUBERT DE (d. 1243), first appears in history as one of Richard I.'s ministers. In 1199 John made him his Chamberlain. On the capture of Prince Arthur, in 1202, he was entrusted with the charge of the imprisoned prince at Rouen, and continued a faithful and active servant of John during the remainder of that king's reign. In 1216 he was appointed Justiciar, and in the next year bravely defended Dover Castle against the French, who were compelled to raise the siege, and shortly afterwards defeated by De Burgh in a naval engagement in the Channel. On the death of William Marshall he became Regent of the kingdom, the custody of the king's person being entrusted to Peter des Roches. Between these two there was constant rivalry, De Burgh representing the English, Des Roches the foreign interest. In 1224 the reckless turbulence of Falkes de Breauté gave De Burgh an opportunity of getting rid of the foreigners. De Breauté was banished, and, on the king attaining his majority in 1227, De Burgh attained supreme power by the exile of his great rival, Des Roches. In this year also he was raised to the earldom of Kent; and, in 1228, he was appointed Justiciar for life. From this date till 1232 England was entirely in his hands, and was, on the whole, well governed. In 1232 the intrigues of Des Roches, who had been permitted to return, and the king's weariness of restraint, occasioned his fall. He was accused of connivance with Twenge in his attacks on the Italian clergy, and the emptiness of the treasury was attributed to the mismanagement of the minister. He was driven from office, and for the next two years suffered the cruellest persecution at the hands of the monarch for whom he had done so much. The disgrace of Des Roches in 1234 restored him to favour, but he did not resume his office, and the remainder of his life was spent in retirement, broken only by occasional appearances in the political arena, as in 1238, when he supported the king against the powerful baronial confederacy headed by Richard of Cornwall. Hubert's policy was a thoroughly national one. He resisted the encroachments of the Pope and the rapacity of the foreigners, as well as the arbitrariness of the king and the turbulence of the barons. His aim was, however, limited to a restoration of the administrative system and policy of Henry II. It is said that an Essex blacksmith, when ordered to put chains on Hubert, replied, "Do what you will with me: rather would I die than put fetters on him. Is not he that faithful and magnanimous Hubert, who hath so often snatched England from the ravages of foreigners and restored England to England?"

Burgh, WALTER HUSSEY (b. 1743, d. 1783), was a celebrated Irish barrister and politician. He made a most successful practice at the bar, and was appointed Prime Sergeant in 1779. As a member of the Irish Parliament he belonged to the national party of Flood and Grattan, he approved of the Volunteers, and for a brilliant speech on a free trade motion of Grattan's, in which he described the condition of Ireland as one of "smothered war," he thought it necessary to resign office. Towards the end of his life he cooled towards the Volunteer movement, fearing that it would embroil England and Ireland, but supported the cause of Irish independence at the risk of all chances of preferment. Just before his death he was appointed Chief Baron of the Exchequer. Hussey Burgh is described as the best every-day speaker of the Irish Parliament, though his manner was that of a lawyer. He was a vain and ostentatious man, and died heavily in debt, but his liabilities were paid by a Parliamentary grant proposed by Grattan on account of his integrity and patriotism.

Burghhead, THE BATTLE OF (1040), was fought between Thorfinn, Earl of Orkney and Caithness, and King Duncan, who was attempting to seize the territories of the Earls of Orkney on the mainland. It resulted in a victory for Thorfinn.

Burghersh, HENRY DE (b. circa 1290, d. 1340), was a nephew of Lord Badlesmere, through whose influence he was made Bishop of Lincoln in 1320. He was suspected of complicity with his uncle in 1322, and was deprived of his bishopric, though he seems to have been restored before the end of the reign. He sided with the queen and Mortimer against Edward II., and for his support he was made Treasurer, and, in 1328, Chancellor, which office he held till the fall of Mortimer. He was frequently employed by Edward III., and died at Ghent, whither he had gone on diplomatic business.

Burgoyne, JOHN, LIEUT.-GEN. (b. 1730, d. 1792), a natural son of Lord Bingley, in 1762 acted as brigadier-general under Lord Tyrrawley in Portugal, where he greatly distinguished himself by a most daring and successful raid upon a strong body of troops who were guarding the magazines at Valencia. In 1775 he was appointed to a command in America. The next year he was summoned home to advise the king on colonial questions, but returned to his command in 1777, when he at once issued an invitation to the natives to join the English flag. He then organised an expedition in order to join Clinton, who was advancing from the south. Before they could meet, however, Burgoyne had encountered such difficulties that he was compelled to surrender on the 17th Oct. at Saratoga. He was allowed to come home on parole, and no sooner had he arrived than the Opposition made overtures to him to lay the blame of the disaster on the government. He thus became odious to the ministry, whom he charged with mismanagement in not supplying him with proper resources; and the king meanwhile refused to see him, or to allow him a court-martial, which he demanded. This the ministry also strenuously opposed, knowing that the corruption of the War Department would come out if any inquiry were held. In 1779 Burgoyne refused to go back to America, on the ground that his honour did not compel him to do so; and the ministry seized the opportunity to dismiss him from the army. On the Rockingham ministry coming in in 1782, he was reinstated, and appointed Commander-in-chief in Ireland. Burgoyne's previous services lead us to infer that the disaster of Saratoga was not entirely due to himself; and this idea is confirmed by the steady refusal of the government to allow any inquiry. In the absence of that inquiry, it is difficult to form a just estimate of Burgoyne's merits.

Burgoyne, SIR JOHN (b. 1762, d. 1871), the son of General Burgoyne, was educated at Eton and Woolwich, and, in 1793, received a commission in the Royal Engineers. In 1800 he sailed for the Mediterranean with Sir Ralph Abercromby, and saw active service throughout the French wars in Sicily, Egypt, Sweden, Portugal, and Spain. He was with Sir John Moore at the retreat to Corunna; and, in most of the great battles and sieges of the Peninsular War, he was first or second in command of the Engineers. In 1812 he was sent to New Orleans as commanding Engineer under Sir Edward Pakenham, and, in consequence, was not present at Waterloo, though he returned in time to form one of the army of occupation at Paris in the middle of July, 1815. During the long peace he held some important civil appointments. When the Russian War was on the verge of breaking out he was sent to Constantinople to report on the measures necessary for the defence of the Ottoman Empire, and, on his return, was appointed Lieut.-General on the staff of the army of the East. It was Sir John Burgoyne who was most strenuous in dissuading Lord Raglan from attacking Sebastopol on the north, and supported with equal warmth the flank march and attack on the south side. From the first he pointed out the Malakoff as the key of the entire position; and conducted the siege operations before Sebastopol up to the middle or end of March, 1855, when he was recalled to England, leaving Sir Harry Jones to complete the work. Soon after he was created a baronet, and subsequently received a field-marshal's baton, and the appointment of Constable of the Tower.

Burgundy, RELATIONS WITH. Of the ten Burgundies that history knows, England had important dealings only with the French fief, the duchy of Burgundy, under its last line of Valois dukes. The imperial free county of Burgundy (Franche Comté) also belonged to them. They began with Philip the Bold (le Hardi), whose valour at Poitiers was rewarded by his father John with the grant of the vacant duchy on his taking the hand of its heiress (1363). The acquisition of Flanders, so closely bound to England by economical and political ties, hostility to Louis of Orleans, whose championship of Richard II. and absolutism involved his hostility to the Lancastrian monarchs, first brought the house into intimate relations with England. The Burgundians and Armagnacs fought for supremacy under the mad Charles VI., and their feuds gave ample opportunity to English intervention. Both united to withstand Henry V., and met a common defeat at Agincourt (1415). But the murder of John the Fearless (1407—1419) on the bridge of Montreaux, at the instance of the Dauphin and the Armagnacs, led to Burgundy throwing its whole weight on the English side. Paris, the centre of Burgundian influence, welcomed the entry of Henry V. and the new duke, Philip the Good (1419—1467). Up to 1435, this close alliance enabled the English to retain their hold of North France. But the nationalist revival stirred even Philip, the death of the Duke of Bedford broke his close family tie to the English house, and the mad attempt of Humphrey of Gloucester on Holland and Hainault completed the alienation which led to the Peace of Arras (1435) between Burgundy and France, and even an attack on Calais from our old ally. In the Wars of the Roses, Philip and his son Charles generally sympathised with the Lancastrians. Charles the Bold (1467—1477) regarded his descent from John of Gaunt through his Spanish mother as making him a member of the Lancastrian house; and he showed the greatest sympathy with the exiles whom Edward IV.'s accession had driven to the Netherlands. But he could not afford to quarrel with Edward, and as Louis XI. definitely supported Warwick, and reconciled him with Margaret of Anjou, Charles very unwillingly joined the Yorkist cause, and married Edward's sister Margaret. When in 1469 Edward was driven from England by Margaret and Warwick, he found refuge in the Netherlands, but a personal interview only produced personal hostility between him and Charles. Despite Charles's inadequate support, Edward won back his crown; and fear of France caused the renewal of the political alliance. In 1474 a common expedition against France was determined upon, but Charles lingered at Neuss, and came at last without an army; so Edward, in the Treaty of Pecquigny (1475), abandoned Burgundy for France. The marriage of Mary, Charles's daughter, with Maximilian I., brought Flanders and England into new relations that passed on to the Austro-Spanish Alliance. But the conquest of Burgundy by Louis on Charles's death (1477) put an end to the independent existence of the House of Burgundy.

Burke, THE FAMILY OF, was founded in Ireland by William Fitzaldelm de Burgh, a descendant of Robert Mortain, and first cousin of the great Justiciar, Hubert de Burgh. He was the seneschal of Henry I., and was made Viceroy of Ireland in 1176. In 1225 Henry III. bestowed the province of Connaught on Richard de Burgh, son of Fitzaldelm, who, after a violent struggle with the O'Connors, succeeded in establishing himself there. His son Walter became Earl of Ulster in right of his wife Maude, daughter of Hugh de Lacy, and at this point the De Burghs split up into two families—those of Ulster and Connaught. Of the Ulster line, Richard de Burgh, known as the Red Earl, taking advantage of the weakness of the Fitzgeralds, raised the De Burghs to the position of the most powerful family in Ireland. The Ulster earldom expired with his grandson William, murdered in 1333 by the English of Ulster. His daughter Elizabeth afterwards married Lionel, Duke of Clarence, son of Edward III., whereby the earldom of Ulster became eventually attached to the royal family in the person of Edward IV. The De Burghs of Connaught, scorning to hold their lands of a woman, and fearing that their possessions might pass by marriage into other hands, declared themselves independent of English law, and renounced English customs. They assumed the name of Burke, and divided Connaught between them, Sir William, ancestor of the Clanricardes, taking Galway with the title of MacWilliam Oughter (the Upper), and Sir Edmund, ancestor of the Mayos, taking Mayo with the title of MacWilliam Eighter (the Lower). The first Earl of Clanricarde, created in 1543, was William, or Ulick, "of the heads," so-called from his victories over the Geraldines. In 1576 the Burkes, fearing that Connaught was to be colonised as Ulster had been, broke out into open rebellion. Thereupon their territories were utterly laid waste, and the race was nearly extinguished. In 1635, Wentworth's commission of inquiry into defective titles declared the lands of the Burkes to have lapsed to the crown. Ulick, however, the fifth earl, and second Earl of St. Albans, was created Marquis of Clanricarde for his services in subduing the rebellion of 1641, and he is the direct ancestor of the present marquis.

Burke, EDMUND (b. 1729, d. 1797), born in Dublin, was educated at Trinity College, and came to London to study at the Middle Temple in 1750. The study of law was not congenial to him; and he soon deserted it for literature. His first attempts in this field were made in 1756, and consisted of A Vindication of Natural Society, which was intended as a satire on Bolingbroke's theory of the origin of society, and A Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas on the Sublime and Beautiful, which was warmly praised by such judges as Lessing and Kant. In 1759 the first volume of the Annual Register was published, and contained a survey by Burke of the chief events of the year. In 1761 he accompanied "Single-speech" Hamilton, who was private secretary to Lord Halifax, to Ireland. The connection lasted four years, at the end of which time Burke threw up a pension which Hamilton had procured for him, and returned to England. In the same year Rockingham came into office and appointed Burke his secretary. In Dec., 1765, through the influence of Lord Verney, Burke was returned to Parliament for Wendover, and lost no time in making himself known to the House by a speech on the American colonies, which won for him a compliment from Pitt. In 1769 he wrote his remarkable pamphlet, Observations on the Present State of the Nation. Burke was always on the side of constitutional order and liberty on such questions as the right of a constituency to choose its own representative, the freedom of the press, the legality of general warrants issued by Parliament, and the relations of a colony to the mother country. In 1770 he published Thoughts on the Present Discontents, which, though unsuccessful as a pamphlet, placed its author in the front rank of political philosophers. In 1772 he was offered the direction of a commission, which was to examine the details of every department in India; but loyalty to his party made him decline the offer. In April, 1774, he made one of the most celebrated of all his great speeches—that on American taxation. In November, 1774, he was invited to stand for Bristol, and represented that city for six years. In March, 1775, he moved his resolutions in favour of conciliation with America; he urged the government to recognise the old constitutional maxim that taxation without representation is illegal, to return to the old custom of accepting what grants the general assemblies of the colonies should freely contribute, and above all things not to enter upon civil war. Two years later Burke addressed a letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol, in which, in the clearest and most independent way, he explained to his constituents the principles which had guided him in his policy towards the colonies. In Feb., 1780, he brought in his resolutions for the amendment of the administration. His first project was directed against the corruption of Parliament and the sources of that corruption, and was contained in a plan for the better security of the independence of Parliament, and the economical reformation of the civil and other establishments. In the same year Burke retired from the representation of Bristol, finding that his independence was distasteful to the electors. Lord Rockingham's influence, however, obtained for him the seat of Malton in Yorkshire; and on that nobleman succeeding Lord North in 1782, he accepted the Paymastership of the Forces. On the death of Lord Rockingham in July, his ministry became divided against itself; Lord Shelburne succeeded to the Premiership; and Burke, Fox, and Sheridan resigned. The combination against him proved too strong for Shelburne, and in April, 1783, he made way for a coalition ministry under the nominal lead of the Duke of Portland. Burke returned to the Pay Office, and immediately committed a grave indiscretion in restoring two clerks who had been suspended for malversation. The most important act of this administration was the introduction of Fox's India Bill, which seems to have been devised and drawn by Burke. Burke and Fox advocated the measure with all their energy and power; but the king saw his opportunity of getting rid of a ministry which he disliked, and successfully used his influence to have the Bill thrown out by the Peers. This success he followed up by dismissing the ministry and sending for Pitt, who, in Jan., 1784, became Prime Minister. The India Bill, which Pitt introduced, was a compromise, of much narrower scope than Fox's Bill, and seems to have escaped any violent attack from Burke. He, however, vigorously attacked Pitt's Irish policy, as well as the commercial treaty with France. A more glorious field for the exercise of his powers was now opened for Burke in the prosecution of Warren Hastings. In April, 1786, Burke, in answer to a challenge from Hastings's friends, laid before Parliament his charges. The first charge was thrown out; the second and third were supported by Pitt and carried by so large a majority that in May, 1787, Burke brought forward a resolution to impeach Hastings. The management of the prosecution was entrusted by the Commons to Burke, Fox, Sheridan, Windham, and Grey. The trial began in Feb., 1788, and was opened by Burke in a speech peculiarly impassioned and persuasive. Seven years went by before the Lords brought in their verdict of acquittal. In the same year which saw the impeachment of Warren Hastings, politics were thrown into confusion by the illness of the king. Pitt's Regency Bill was vehemently attacked by the Opposition, and by no member of it more bitterly than by Burke. The king's unexpected recovery, however, rendered all the preparations of the Opposition unnecessary, and gave Pitt a further lease of office. In the following year the outbreak of the French Revolution was the beginning of the last act in Burke's career. For the remainder of his life his thoughts continued to be centred on France. His passionate love of order and reverence for the past prevented him from over sharing in the generous enthusiasm which the earlier efforts of the French people awakened in Fox, Wordsworth, and Coleridge. He distrusted the Parisians, and foresaw too surely that the popular outbreak would end in something very different from liberty. It was not, however, till Feb., 1790, that Burke, in the House of Commons, openly avowed his horror of the principles that were being worked out in Paris. His avowal was couched in such terms that it occasioned a breach of his long-standing friendship with Fox. In the next month the breach had so far widened that Burke deserted Fox on a motion for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts which he himself had suggested. At length, in November, appeared the Reflections on the French Revolution. Its success was wonderful, and it did much to alienate the majority of Englishmen from all sympathy with the Revolution. In the course of the next year Burke finally renounced his connection with Fox. In August he published his Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs. He continued in Parliament to storm against the murderous atheists in France, and their advocates on this side of the Channel. In 1794 he lost his brother and his only son, and he never recovered from the blow. In the same year he retired from Parliament, but he still watched France with the same unmitigated apprehension. He found time, nevertheless, to give to the world his sound views on the corn trade in his Thoughts and Details on Scarcity. In 1796 he wrote his Letter to a Noble Lord—a scathing answer to some objections raised by the Duke of Bedford to the pension which Pitt had generously bestowed. In the same year appeared the first two Letters on a Regicide Peace, brilliant specimens of Burke's most gorgeous rhetoric, in which he protested against any peace with the national government of France. His work, however, was ended, and he died at Beaconsfield on the 9th of July, 1797. It is impossible within our limits to give any adequate estimate of Burke's character and genius. We may perhaps be permitted to quote the words of a competent critic (Mr. John Morley): "There have been more important statesmen, for he was never tried by a position of supreme responsibility. There have been many more effective orators, for lack of imaginative suppleness prevented him from penetrating to the inner mind of his hearers. . . . There have been many subtler, more original, and more systematic thinkers about the conditions of the social union. But no one that ever lived used the general ideas of the thinker more successfully to judge the particular problems of the statesman. No one has ever come so close to the details of practical politics, and at the same time remembered that these can only be understood and only dealt with by the aid of the broad conceptions of political philosophy."

Burleigh, or Burghley, WILLIAM CECIL, LORD (b. 1520, d. 1598), born at Bourne in Lincolnshire, was the son of Robert Cecil, Master of the Robes to Henry VIII., who educated him for the law. Having married the sister of Sir John Cheke, he became intimate with the Protector Somerset, his friendship being increased by his second marriage with the daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, the tutor of Edward VI. In 1547 he accompanied the Protector on his expedition to Scotland, and in the following year became Secretary of State. On the fall of the Protector, he was imprisoned for a short time, but speedily restored to favour, and throughout the reign of Edward VI. continued to perform the duties of Secretary of State. Though no favourer of Northumberland's scheme for altering the succession, he was at length induced to sign "the device" as a witness; and at this most critical period of his career managed to avoid the displeasure of Mary; he conformed to the Catholic religion, and became very friendly with Pole. Before Mary's death, Cecil entered into correspondence with the Princess Elizabeth, on whose accession he found himself at once in high favour at court; he was immediately appointed Secretary of State, and for forty years enjoyed the entire confidence of the queen, to whom he was "the oracle she consulted on every emergency, and whose answers she generally obeyed." During almost the whole of Elizabeth's reign, Sir William Cecil may be said to have practically directed the affairs of the nation; though on one or two occasions, disgusted at the treatment he received from his bitter enemies, the courtiers, chief of whom was Leicester, he was on the point of retiring altogether from public life. In 1560 he went to Scotland, as Commissioner, to end the war, and on his return counteracted the progress which the Spanish ambassador, De Quadra, had made in his absence, by strongly advocating an alliance with the Huguenot leaders. In spite of his anti-Spanish policy, Cecil was no favourite with the people; and the court party, headed by Leicester, whose marriage with the queen he strenuously opposed, strove hard to work his ruin. The perfection to which he brought his system of espionage, by which every plot against the queen was known to her ministers almost as soon as it was hatched, undoubtedly, on more than one occasion, saved Elizabeth from assassination and the country from an internal war, though it provoked against Cecil the wrath of men like Arundel and Norfolk, whose aims he thwarted. His great scheme was the formation of a Protestant confederacy, to consist of England, Sweden, Denmark, the German princes, the Scotch Protestants, and the Calvinists in France and Flanders, against the Catholic powers; his great stumbling-block was the Queen of Scots, whose execution he did not cease to advise as absolutely necessary for the safety of the queen and of the realm. More than once was the assassin's dagger directed against Cecil himself, and in 1572 the plot of Berney and Mather might have been successful but for the minister's spies. The great blot on his character and on his administration is the persecution of the Catholics for practising the rites and ceremonies of their religion, to which Cecil, and even Elizabeth herself, had not scrupled to conform in the time of their need. To his economical spirit, too, may be ascribed that unprepared state of the arsenals and the navy which so materially increased the danger to be apprehended from the Armada. The history of Cecil, who in 1571 had been created Lord Burleigh, from the accession of Elizabeth to his death, August 4, 1598, is the history of England, so closely is his name identified with the whole current of the foreign and domestic policy of the reign. He can hardly, perhaps, claim to be called a great man; but he was an adroit, skilful, and sensible statesman, of tried judgment, untiring perseverance and application, and boundless industry in mastering details.

Burmese Wars. (1) FIRST BURMESE WAR (1824—1826). At the time Clive laid the foundation of the English Empire in India, Alonipra had established a great dominion on the other side of the Ganges. He united under his sway the kingdoms of Siam, Pogu, Ava, and Aracan. Both nations extended their dominions until they became contemninous; and the Burmese became so confident in their own success that they demanded of Lord Hastings that he should surrender Chittagong, Dacca, and some other places, which they claimed as original dependencies of Aracan. His refusal, and the encroachments of the Burmese in seizing Cachar, a district of Bengal, and a little island on the coast of Chittagong, produced war. In March, 1824, the English attacked and occupied Rangoon at the mouth of the Irawaddi. From then to December the Burmese again and again assaulted Rangoon, which had become the stronghold of the English. Stockade fighting continued till March, and then Sir Archibald Campbell found it possible to advance up the Irawaddi to Prome, and found it deserted. The English remained there during the rainy season. In November hostilities were renewed, and the English gradually forced their way up to within forty-five miles of Ava, the capital. There at length, in February, 1826, the Treaty of Yandaboo was concluded, by which the Burmese ceded Assam, Aracan, and the coast south of Martaban, and gave up their claims to the English provinces.

(2) SECOND BURMESE WAR (1852). After the Peace of Yandaboo, however, and especially after a change of dynasty, which occurred in 1837, the English continued to be treated with great insolence, and even outrage, by the court of Burmah. The successive residents were insulted, and the traders were subject to perpetual extortion. In 1851 Commodore Lambert, in the Fox, appeared, and to him the English residents in Rangoon complained. Communications were opened with the court of Ava, but without success, and thereupon Commodore Lambert proceeded to blockade the port of Rangoon. The matter was referred to the government, and, after three applications had been made in vain for redress, Lord Dalhousie (12th February, 1852) determined on war. Two expeditions were sent from Bengal and Madras, and the Bengal column landed in the Rangoon River on the 2nd April. After some stockade fighting the town of Martaban was captured, and on the 11th April the siege of Rangoon commenced. On the 14th the place was carried by storm. The natives of Pegu now came over and flocked in numbers to the standard of General Godwin. On the 17th May, Bassein, the western port of Burmah, was captured. In September the army moved on, Prome, which was captured 9th October. On the 20th December a proclamation was issued, with the consent of the Directors, annexing Pegu. A treaty of peace was drafted, but the commissioners could not come to terms. The war therefore ended without any treaty being concluded. It was not till 1862 that the relations of the Burmese court and England were placed on a regular diplomatic footing. In 1867 a treaty was concluded by which British vessels were allowed to navigate Burmese waters; and several missions were subsequently despatched into the interior of Burmah. In one of these Mr. Margary, an Englishman, was murdered by the Chinese at Manwyne in February, 1875. Since 1867 there has been no further outbreak of hostilities—though, on account of the jealous and suspicious attitude of the Burmese court towards England, and the anarchical condition of the country, this has more than once seemed imminent.

Burned Candlemas was a name bestowed by the Scots on the spring of 1355—6, at which time Edward III. completely ravaged East Lothian.

Burnell, ROBERT (d. 1292), was one of Edward I.'s great ministers. In 1265 he was Secretary to Prince Edward, and soon after the accession of that king was raised to the Chancellorship. He was a great lawyer, and assisted the king in his legal and constitutional reforms. From 1274 to his death he was practically Prime Minister, and it was at his manor-house at Acton Burnell, in Shropshire, that the important statute De Mercatoribus was passed. He was an ecclesiastic, and in 1275 was made Bishop of Bath and Wells. "As a statesman and a legislator," says Lord Campbell, "he is worthy of the highest commendation."

Campbell, Lives of the Lord Chancellors.

Burnes, SIR ALEXANDER (b. 1803, d. 1841), when a young officer in the Bombay army, was selected by Sir John Malcolm, in 1830, to take charge of a mission to Runjeet Singh, which was to proceed up the Indus, and at the same time make an attempt to establish friendly relations with the chiefs on its banks.

He was badly received in Scinde, and it was only the energetic remonstrances of Colonel Pottinger, Resident at Cutch, which procured him means of transporting his convoy up the Indus. He was well received by Runjeet, and proceeded to Simla and submitted a report. He was directed to return to Bombay, through Afghanistan, Balkh, and Bokhara, and to explore and report. In 1837 Capt. Burnes made his appearance at Cabul, where he unsuccessfully attempted to conclude an alliance with Dost Mohammed. In 1839 he accompanied the Afghan Expedition, and was entrusted with the important task of concluding an alliance with Mehrab Khan, ruler of Beloochistan, which he accomplished. In 1840 he was created a baronet, and was left in Cabul to succeed Sir W. Macnaghten as envoy. In 1841 he was murdered in the Cabul massacre. [AFGHAN WARS.]

Burnet, GILBERT (b. 1643, d. 1715), Bishop of Salisbury, was born at Edinburgh. He studied at Aberdeen, and visited England, France, and Holland. In 1665 he was ordained and presented to the living of Saltoun by the father of the celebrated Fletcher of Saltoun, who himself became Burnet's pupil. In 1668 he was appointed Professor of Divinity at Glasgow, and became known to the Duke of Hamilton, a relation of whom he married. He incurred the resentment of Lauderdale, by whom he was accused of instigating the opposition to the government, and thought it advisable to leave Scotland and to settle in London. In 1675 he was appointed preacher at the Rolls Chapel. He became very popular as a preacher, and was well known at court. During the Popish Plot he made great efforts to save the victims of that delusion. In 1681 he published the first volume of his History of the Reformation, and received the thanks of the zealous Protestant Commons for it. In 1683 he accompanied Russell to the scaffold, and was examined by the Commons on the charge of having written his dying speech. On the accession of James, he withdrew to the Continent, and after travelling for a year arrived at the Hague, where he soon gained the confidence of William of Orange, and succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation between the prince and his wife. He wrote numerous tracts directed against James, whose bitter enmity he excited. He accompanied William to England as his chaplain, and after the Revolution, was rewarded with the bishopric of Salisbury. He was a zealous advocate of the claims of Mary to a share of the throne. In religious politics he took the unpopular latitudinarian side. While most vigorously opposed to granting any rights to Catholics, he was in favour of toleration for Dissenters. Accordingly, he attempted, with his friend Tillotson, to draw up a scheme of reconciliation with the Presbyterians, and he supported Nottingham's Comprehension Bill. In politics he was a thoroughgoing Whig. He proposed to insert the name of the Princess Sophia as secured in the Bill of Rights, but the clause was rejected by the Commons. He was therefore regarded by the adherents of the house of Brunswick as the chief supporter of their cause. He also claims to have inserted in the Bill of Rights the clause which forbids the sovereign to marry a Papist. In 1693 it was resolved by the Commons that a pastoral letter of his, in which he had spoken of England as being conquered by William, should be burnt by the hangman. On the death of Mary he wrote a warm eulogy on her character. In 1698 he was appointed tutor to the young Duke of Gloucester, the heir to the throne, whose education he carefully superintended. In 1701 his Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles was censured in Convocation; and the same year an ineffectual attempt was made in the House of Commons to get him removed from his post about the young prince. He violently attacked the Occasional Conformity Bill in 1704. He was a staunch supporter of the Union with Scotland, and was chairman of the Committee for considering the Articles in the Lords. His care for the welfare of the Church was shown by his scheme for the augmentation of small livings, which ultimately ripened into Queen Anne's Bounty. In the Sacheverell episode he enunciated the doctrines of the Whigs in a speech against passive obedience. He upbraided Queen Anne with her supposed design of settling the crown on the Pretender, and towards the close of his life vehemently opposed the Tory Peace of Utrecht.

The History of the Reformation of the Church of England is a valuable piece of historical composition, despite its character of partisanship. Burnet's other important work is the History of His Own Time (1690-1713), published posthumously by his son in 1724-54. From fear of giving offence the editor had suppressed many passages in the original manuscript; but the suppressed passages are restored in the edition published by Routledge in 1823. The History is the work of a violent Whig, distorted and discoloured by the author's prejudices and partialities; and it is written with singular want of discretion and self-command. Still it is highly valuable as a copious contemporary record of events as they appeared to one who had borne a prominent share in them. Burnet also wrote numerous polemical pamphlets, and several other historical and literary works, including The Life and Death of John, Earl of Rochester, 1690; The Life of Sir Matthew Hale, 1683; Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, 1777; and a translation of More's Utopia, 1685.

The best edition of the Hist. of the Reformation is that in 7 vols. by N. Pocock, 1835; and of the Hist. of His Own Time, that of Oxford in 6 vols., 1833. For an able criticism of the latter work see Guizot, Notice sur Burnet; see also Oldmixon, Critical Hist. of Eng., 1721; and P. Nicolson, Memoirs. Burn's Hill, THE BATTLE OF (1847), was fought in Kaffirland between a British force which was endeavouring to seize Sandilli, the Kaffir chief, and the Kaffirs; the British were defeated.

Burrard, SIR HARRY (b. 1755, d. 1813), entered the army early in life, and first saw active service in the American War, being present at Camden, and under Lord Rawdon in South Carolina in 1781. In 1798 he distinguished himself in the unfortunate expedition to Ostend. At Alkmaar he was posted on the left in command of the brigade of Guards, and rendered good service in supporting Abercromby's attack. In 1807, he went as second in command of the expedition to Copenhagen; and on his return he was made a baronet. In the following year he was sent out with reinforcements to Portugal. He arrived just in time to find that Wellesley had defeated Junot at Vimiero and was arranging everything for a hot pursuit. Burrard at once forbade any further advance, and recalled the troops to their positions. The results of this prohibition were disastrous, since they prevented Wellesley from totally destroying Junot's army, and rendered the Convention of Cintra necessary. A court of inquiry was held, in which Sir Harry was exonerated from all blame; but popular indignation prevented him from ever being employed again. Napier, a not too gentle critic, says that "it is absurd to blame Sir H. Burrard for not adopting one of those prompt and daring conceptions that distinguish great generals only." Wellesley himself acknowledged that Sir Harry Burrard had acted on fair military reasons.

Burrows, PETER, was an Irish politician and barrister. He began life as tutor to one of the Beresfords, and was offered a seat in the Irish Parliament, but declined to become a mere placeman and to vote against his convictions. He preferred to go to the bar, and soon became famous. In 1783 he was a delegate to the great Volunteer Convention. He entered the Irish Parliament shortly before the Union, and was one of the many barristers who declined to be bought over by Lord Castlereagh, his friend Charles Bushe, afterwards Solicitor-General, being another. When Lord Cornwallis was sent to Ireland as Lord-Lieutenant, Burrows proposed to his friends that an appeal should be made to the Yeomanry to defeat the Union, but he was dissuaded from the step, much to his subsequent regret. His speeches were among the best that were made on the anti-Union side. In 1811 he appeared as counsel for the arrested delegates of the Catholic Convention, and won his case. He was a particularly earnest man, and thoroughly incorruptible.

Burton, HENRY (b. 1579, d. 1648), was Clerk of the Closet to Prince Charles, but after Charles's accession to the throne he was removed, and for accusing Laud of Popery was forbidden the court. In 1637 he was accused before the Star Chamber of writing schismatical and libellous books against the hierarchy of the Church, and to the scandal of the government. For this he was sentenced to stand in the pillory, lose his ears, be fined £5,000, and imprisoned for life. The first part of the sentence was carried out, and he remained in prison till 1640, when he was released by the Long Parliament, the proceedings against him annulled, and £5,000 compensation given him.

Burton, JOHN HILL (b. 1809, d. 1881), born at Aberdeen, studied at Marischal College, and became an advocate at the Scotch bar, 1831, but devoted himself chiefly to literature. He became Secretary to the Prison Board of Scotland in 1854, Historiographer Royal in 1867, and a Commissioner of Prisons in 1877. He wrote Lives of Simon Lord Lovat and Duncan Forbes of Culloden, 1847; Narratives from Criminal Trials in Scotland, 1852; several works on legal and general subjects; A History of Scotland to 1688, 1867; A History of Scotland from the Revolution to 1745, 1853; and A History of the Reign of Queen Anne, 1880. Mr. Burton's History of Scotland (issued in 8 vols., 1873) is a very able, careful, and accurate work, and is the best general Scottish history which has appeared in recent times.

A memoir of Mr. Burton is prefixed to his work, The Bookhunter (new ed., 1882).

Bury St. Edmunds, in Suffolk, was probably a Roman settlement of some importance. Previous to the ninth century it was known as Beodric's-worthe. It derived its modern name from St. Edmund, King of the East Angles, who was taken prisoner here by the Danes in 870, bound to a tree, and shot to death with arrows. In his honour an abbey was founded here which became famous in monastic history, and is now a ruin of great interest. It was one of the most celebrated Benedictine foundations in England, and at the Dissolution was found to be possessed of enormous wealth. In 1214 a great meeting of the barons took place at Bury, when they swore solemnly to compel King John to grant a charter. It was one of the centres of the Peasants' revolt of 1381. Frequent Parliaments were held here, the most famous in 1446, at which Duke Humphrey of Gloucester was arrested.

Busaco, THE BATTLE OF (Sept. 27, 1810), secured Wellington's retreat to the lines which he had prepared on Torres Vedras. He had taken up a strong position on the Busaco range of hills, with a very steep front. On the 29th, in the early dawn, Massena ordered the English position to be assaulted in the centre, where the ascent was easiest. Picton was in command; and here the French assault was so rapid and determined that after driving back the skirmishers they gained the crest of the hill, and threw the third division into confusion. At that moment General Leith, who was on Picton's right, seeing the danger, moved up a brigade to his assistance; and the French were driven over the hillside. Meantime Ney, on the French right, had led his men over more difficult ground, but with equal gallantry attacked Craufurd, who commanded on the extreme left of the allied line. When the French were on the point of carrying the position, Craufurd launched against them a reserve of 1,800 men, whose onslaught it was impossible to withstand, and the second assault of the French failed. It was clearly impossible to take this strong post by assault; and Massena, in the evening, hastily began to execute a flanking march round the hills on the left of the allied forces. Wellington perceived the movement only just in time, and ordered a retreat to meet it. The allied troops were in great danger on several occasions; but the disorder and confusion of the French army rendered its movements slow, and saved the allies from defeat. As it was, they were worsted in several skirmishes with French scouting parties, and the negligence of Craufurd at the last moment imperilled the safety of the allied army; but at length Wellington had the satisfaction of having all his forces ensconced behind the lines of Torres Vedras.

Bussy-Castelnau, CHARLES JOSEPH, MARQUIS OF (b. 1718, d. 1785), a distinguished French officer, was Dupleix's able lieutenant, and was mainly instrumental in maintaining French influence in the Deccan and Carnatic. In 1748 (Oct. 17) he caused the English to raise the siege of Pondicherry. On the arrival of Lally in India, Bussy found himself subordinate to that officer, who rendered his plans ineffectual. Bussy was taken prisoner at Wandewash and conveyed to England, but at the trial of Lally he was released on parole and allowed to return to France to clear himself. He wrote a Mémoire contre M. de Lally, Paris, 1766.

Bute, JOHN STUART, 3RD EARL OF (b. 1713, d. 1792), son of James, second earl, married, in 1736, Mary, daughter of the celebrated Lady Mary Wortley Montague, in whose right he inherited a large fortune. In early life he became by accident acquainted with Frederic, Prince of Wales, and soon acquired great influence over him, though it is difficult to see what were the charms which endeared him to the prince, since he is described as "cold and unconciliating in his manners, proud and sensitive in his nature, solemn and sententious in his discourse." During the later years of George II. he had remained attached to the court of the widowed Princess of Wales; and scandal attributed to their relations a character which there is no real evidence to show that they possessed. But no sooner was George III. seated on the throne than Bute took advantage of his ascendancy over the young king to come to the front in politics. After the dissolution of Parliament early in 1761, he became one of the Secretaries of State as the colleague of Pitt, to whom he was warmly opposed on the question of the Continental war. Pitt resigned in October, leaving Bute supreme. The discovery of the Family Compact between France and Spain, which Pitt had suspected, led to a necessary rupture with Spain; but Bute was none the less resolved to come to terms with France and to desert Germany, and to reverse the policy of his predecessors. On Nov. 3, 1762, the preliminaries were signed at Fontainebleau, and peace was definitely concluded in the following February. But the ministry was unpopular; and this unpopularity gradually developed into a fierce hatred, which amused itself in burning the Prime Minister in effigy in almost every public place. This extreme feeling can scarcely be said to have been justified by Bute's public measures; and two, at any rate, of his chief sins in the popular view are well set forth by a contemporary writer, who says that he was utterly "unfit to be Prime Minister of England, because he was (1) a Scotchman, (2) the king's friend, (3) an honest man." In April, 1763, he had to yield to the storm of indignation which he had aroused; and he never afterwards filled any prominent office in the State. But he retained his influence over the king, and was all-powerful in the Closet, until George Grenville, after the failure of Bute's attempted intrigues with Pitt, insisted on his complete dismissal from the court as a condition of his own return to power. From this time forward, there is little evidence that Bute had any hand in the politics of the day, though his withdrawal could not remove the suspicion of his secret influence at the back of the throne. During the last twenty-five years of his life he lived in almost complete retirement at Christchurch, in Hampshire, in the midst of his family.

Butler, THE FAMILY OF, was founded in Ireland by Theobald Gualtier or Walter (a brother of Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor of England), who received grants of land in Leinster from Henry II., together with the hereditary office of Pincerna, or Butler, to the Kings of England. The Butler family did not play a very prominent part in Irish history until the beginning of the fourteenth century, when Edmond le Boteler was created Earl of Carrick for his exertions against Edward Bruce and the Scots. From him sprang two lines, those of the Earls of Ormonde and the Earls of Carrick. The earldom of Ormonde was created in 1328, and James, the second earl, who married Eleanor, daughter of Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Essex and first cousin of Edward II., raised the family to a position of equality with the Burkes and the Fitzgeralds. The Butlers were powerful chiefly in the Pale, and though they adopted some Irish customs, yet, on the whole, they were faithful to their English origin. They almost alone, in opposition to the Fitzgeralds, supported the house of Lancaster and the English connection. Kilkenny and part of Tipperary formed their Palatinate, and they stood next in power to the Fitzgeralds. The title of Ossory was created in 1527, when Pierce Butler consented to resign the title of Ormonde to Thomas Boleyn, Viscount Rochford, but the latter honour was restored to him after the execution of Rochford. The Butlers joined the Desmond in the Munster insurrection of 1569. They played an important part in English history during the seventeenth century; they were now Protestants, and, though Irish in sympathy, thoroughly Royalist in their views, and anxious to keep up the English connection. James, Duke of Ormonde, who was created marquis in 1642 and duke in 1661, commanded the Royalist troops for the suppression of the Irish rebellion, and after the Restoration was governor of the country. His son Ossory died in the service of William of Orange. James, the second duke, was one of the staunchest supporters of the old Pretender; in consequence of his intrigues during the last years of the reign of Queen Anne, his honours were extinguished and his immense estates forfeited (1716). His brother and heir, Charles, was created Baron Butler of Weston, Hunts.

Butler, SAMUEL (b. 1612, d. 1680), is the author of one of the greatest political satires in the English language. The early years of his life are obscure, but he is said to have been at one time employed by Selden as an amanuensis, and to have been recommended by him to the Countess of Kent. He subsequently entered the service of Sir Samuel Luke, a rigid Presbyterian, where he had the opportunity of observing the various traits of bigotry and absurdity which he subsequently wove into Hudibras. This work was published in three parts; the first in 1663, the second in 1664, and the third in 1678. The work is a satire on the Independents and Presbyterians, and is of considerable historical interest as giving a striking picture of many of their peculiarities. Its abounding wit, and the extraordinary copiousness and variety of diction displayed in the dialogues, as well as the genuine humour of some of the comic situations, have made it one of the most popular of political satires. Butler was the author of a satire on the Royal Society, The Elephant in the Moon; a collection of Characters, and some other works. He seems to have gained little or no solid reward from the court, and is said to have died in the extreme poverty in London. In 1721 a cenotaph was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey which provoked from Samuel Wesley a well-known epigram.

An edition of Hudibras with copious and useful explanations of allusions, &c., is that of Grey, Lond., 1744.

Butt, ISAAC (b. 1812, d. 1879), the son of an Irish Protestant clergyman, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1835, was made Professor of Political Economy the following year. In 1838 he was called to the Irish bar and began to take an active part in politics on the Conservative side. He was a strenuous opponent of O'Connell. In 1844 he was made a Queen's Counsel, and in 1848 defended Smith O'Brien. From 1852 to 1865 he sat in Parliament as member for Youghal, but did not distinguish himself. In 1871 he was elected as Home Rule member for Limerick, and assumed the leadership of the new party, and in 1872 founded the Home-Rule League. But he was opposed by the more extreme and violent section of his party, and by the end of his life he had little authority left in the Home Rule ranks.

Buxar, THE BATTLE OF (Oct. 23, 1764), was fought between the English, commanded by Major Munro, and the army of the Vizier of Oude. The latter was completely routed, and obliged to abandon his camp, with all its stores and 130 pieces of cannon. This victory was scarcely less important than that of Plassey. It demolished the power of the Vizier Sujah-Dowlah, the only chief of importance in the north, and made the English masters of the valley of the Ganges.

Buxton, SIR THOMAS FOWELL (b. 1786, d. 1845), a member of the brewing firm of Truman, Hanbury, and Co., in 1816 established a well-organised system of relief for the poor in Spitalfields, and soon after examined the state of the prisons, in which he was aided by his sister-in-law, Mrs. Fry. He wrote a pamphlet exposing the horrors of the prison system, which excited great attention. He now stood for Weymouth, and was triumphantly returned. He continued to represent this borough till 1837, when he was defeated by Mr. Villiers. In Parliament he proved himself an important ally of Mackintosh on the question of the Amelioration of the Criminal Code. In 1823 he brought forward a resolution "that slavery, being repugnant to the Christian Religion and the British Constitution, ought to be abolished at the earliest period compatible with the safety of all concerned." It was not, however, till 1831 that the principle of emancipation was conceded, chiefly owing to Mr. Buxton's efforts, and in 1833 government introduced a measure of emancipation. Mr. Buxton did not, however, relax his efforts, but laboured to effect the abolition of the system of apprenticeship which was still sanctioned by the law. In 1837, on his defeat at Weymouth, he quitted Parliamentary life; and in 1839 he published The Slave Trade and its Remedy, in which he proposed the colonisation of Africa. An expedition with this object was sent to the Niger, but it proved a complete failure. In 1840 Mr. Buxton was created a baronet.

Bye Plot, THE (1603), was set on foot by a Roman Catholic priest named Watson, and was joined by ardent Catholics like Sir Griffin Markham and Anthony Copley, as well as by Puritans like Lord Grey of Wilton and George Brooke, who were discontented with the policy of James I. Their plan seems to have been to secure the person of the king, compel him to dismiss his ministers, and to grant toleration to Catholics and Puritans. Many were inveigled into joining on the pretence that the meeting was merely for the presentation of a petition in favour of general toleration. The scheme was badly arranged, no definite plan had been agreed upon, and it proved a complete failure. It is certain that the Bye Plot had no connection with the Main or Raleigh's Plot, with which, however, Cecil and the other ministers managed to mix it up in popular belief. Watson was executed, Markham reprieved on the scaffold, Grey imprisoned in the Tower, and Copley banished.

Byng, SIR GEORGE. [TORRINGTON, VIS-COUNT.]

Byng, JOHN, ADMIRAL (b. 1704, d. 1757), was the fourth son of Lord Torrington, and served at sea under his father. In 1756 he was sent out with a fleet of ten ships of war, poorly manned and in bad condition, with orders to relieve Minorca in case of attack. Only three days afterwards the French fleet attacked the castle of St. Philip in that island. Byng arrived off St. Philip on May 19th, and tried in vain to communicate with the governor. On the following day the engagement took place. Rear-Admiral West on the right attacked the enemy with vigour, and drove them back; but Byng held aloof, and the action was indecisive. After a council of war, he sailed off to Gibraltar and left Minorca to its fate. Byng was brought home under arrest, and tried by court-martial. His judges acquitted him of treachery and cowardice, but it was decided that he had not done his utmost to relieve St. Philip, or to defeat the French fleet. He was recommended to mercy. Pitt in vain tried to induce the king to pardon him. Byng was shot at his own request on the quarter-deck of his ship in Portsmouth Harbour; he met his fate with great courage. Voltaire, who had tried to help him by sending him a laudatory letter of the Duke of Richelieu, says that he was slain "pour encourager les autres." It is probably true that Byng had not done as much as he might have done for the relief of Minorca. But there can be no question as to the harshness and injustice of applying the severe penalties prescribed by the twelfth article of the naval code in the case of an officer who was rightly acquitted of treachery and cowardice. Though Byng was perfectly honest and sufficiently brave, it may, however, be conceded that he was wanting in capacity. "He trembled not at danger, but, like many other weak men in high places, he did tremble at responsibility." [MINORCA.]

Byron, JOHN, LORD (d. 1652), was the eldest son of Sir John Byron. He was one of Charles I.'s personal attendants, and was by him made Lieutenant of the Tower in 1641. As he was strongly attached to the royal cause, the Parliament was anxious to get rid of him, and, in 1642, the king consented to appoint Sir John Conyers in his place. On the outbreak of the war, Byron raised a troop for the king, and at the battle of Edgehill was in command of the reserve. He showed great bravery at Roundaway Down and Newbury, and, in 1643, was created a peer, and shortly afterwards Governor of Chester, where he sustained a long siege, capitulating only when all the provisions were exhausted. He was subsequently appointed Governor to the Duke of York. He took part in the second Civil War, and on the failure of the Royalists returned to his charge of the Duke of York, and died at Paris.

Cabal, THE (1667—1673), was the name given to the ministry formed in the reign of Charles II., after the fall of Clarendon.

The word "Cabal" had been used previously to denote a secret Committee or Cabinet, and answers to the "Junto" of a somewhat later date. [CABINET.] It happened, however, rather curiously that the initials of the statesmen who formed this administration spelt the word "Cabal." These ministers were Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley-Cooper (Lord Shaftesbury), and Lauderdale. "They agreed," says Ranke, "in wishing to strengthen the royal prerogative by moderating the uniformity laws with the help of France, and during the excitement caused by a foreign war; but, otherwise, they were attached to widely different principles. Lauderdale was a Presbyterian; Ashley-Cooper, a philosopher; Buckingham, if he held any opinion at all, an independent; Arlington, a moderate Catholic; Clifford, a zealous one." At first, in foreign policy, a new departure was taken by the formation of the Triple Alliance (q.v.), which compelled Louis to desist from his schemes of aggression in the Spanish Netherlands. But this line of policy was not long pursued. War with the Dutch and alliance with France followed, with the infamous Treaty of Dover (1672). Money was obtained by seizing that which had been deposited for security in the Exchequer, while Parliament, which might have proved obstructive, was prorogued. A Declaration of Indulgence, granting liberty of worship to all sects, was issued. But the war ended in failure, and the Declaration was received with great suspicion even by the Dissenters. The Treasury was empty, and in 1673 Parliament had to be summoned to grant supplies. Charles was compelled to withdraw the Declaration, and to assent to the Test Act, which, by excluding all Catholics from office, obliged Clifford and Arlington to resign, and put an end to the Cabal Ministry.

Ranke, Hist. of Eng., iii. 515; Macanlay, Hist. of Eng., i. 213.

Cabinet, THE, although familiar by name to every one as the most powerful body in the Executive Government of the State, is, properly speaking, unknown to the Constitution. Theoretically, the Cabinet is only an irregular Committee of the Privy Council. By the theory of the Constitution, the Privy Council is the proper body to advise the sovereign; yet the members of the Privy Council do not attend unless they are specially summoned, and they have only formal business to transact. The Cabinet Council took its rise under the Tudors, but was then only a small irregular body, consisting of the members of the Privy Council, whom the sovereign chose from time to time to consult. After the Restoration, when the distinction between the ordinary Council and the Privy Council had ceased to exist, and when all members of the Council were sworn as Privy Councillors, the Privy Council became unwieldy from its numbers. Charles II. complained that the great number of the Council made it unfit for the secrecy and despatch which are necessary in great affairs. He formed a select Committee of the Council, called the Cabal or Cabinet, which deliberated on all matters of business before they were submitted to the larger Council. This method of government was very unpopular—partly from the character of the ministers who composed the Cabinet, and partly from the imperfect understanding of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility. In 1679 an attempt was made by Sir William Temple to restore the Privy Council to its former position. Its numbers were to be reduced from fifty to thirty, of whom fifteen were to be the chief officers of State, and the rest made up of ten Lords and five Commons. The joint income of the Council was not to be less than £300,000, which was thought to be nearly equal to the estimated income of the House of Commons. Charles promised that he would be governed by the advice of this Council, but he continued to consult his Cabinet as before. The Cabinet assumed more definite duties under William III., who also introduced his principal ministers into Parliament. At the same time, the king chose his Cabinet from the two great parties, until, in 1693, he formed a Ministry exclusively of Whigs, called the "Junto." The accession of George I. made a great difference in the position of the Cabinet, because the king, not understanding English, ceased to attend its meetings. Both he and his successor, George II., cared more for the affairs of Hanover than for those of England. Under their reigns, the fabric of constitutional government was consolidated, although the Tories, in consequence of the remains of Jacobite sympathies among them, were excluded from power. George III., on his accession, determined to free himself from the domination of the Revolution Whigs. He did not, however, give up Cabinet government, although he was accused of consulting "an interior Cabinet" other than his responsible advisers. It was not till the accession of Pitt to office, in 1783, that the Prime Minister assumed the authority with which we are familiar. As Mr. Traill says (Central Government, p. 20), there are three ways in which Cabinet government has been matured and strengthened during the last hundred years, viz.: 1. Political Unanimity—the principle that a Cabinet should be formed on some definite basis of political opinion, or, in the case of a coalition, of agreement on certain specified points. 2. Unity of Responsibility—that is, that the members of a Cabinet should stand or fall together; the first instance of this dates from 1782. 3. Concert in Action—that the Cabinet should not consist of a number of units, each governing his own department independently of the rest, but of a body of men acting in concert for the common welfare. In theory, the choice of the Cabinet belongs to the crown, but in practice it is in the hands of the Prime Minister, and even he has no absolute choice in the matter. As Mr. Bagehot says (English Constitution, p. 14), "Between the compulsory list, which he must take, and the impossible list that he cannot take, a Prime Minister's independent choice in the formation of a Cabinet is not very large: it extends rather to the division of the Cabinet offices than to the choice of Cabinet Ministers. Parliament and the nation have pretty well settled who shall have the first places." The numbers of the Cabinet generally vary from twelve to fifteen. The following Ministers have usually been members of it:—The First Lord of the Treasury, the Lord Chancellor, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the President of the Council, the Lord Privy Seal, the Home, the Foreign, and the Colonial Secretaries, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretaries for India and for War, the President of the Board of Trade, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Postmaster-General, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the President of the Local Government Board, are sometimes members, and sometimes not. The meetings of the Cabinet are entirely secret, no minutes of proceedings are taken, and what passes is not supposed to be divulged.

Cabot, JOHN (d. 1499), was a Venetian merchant, who settled at Bristol in the reign of Henry VI. In 1497, having obtained a patent from the king for the discovery of unknown lands, he set sail from Bristol, with his son, in order to discover the North-West Passage to India. In the course of the voyage, they discovered Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Florida. John Cabot thus deserves the honour of discovering the mainland of America, which he reached June 24th, 1497, a year before Columbus.

Cabot, SEBASTIAN (b. 1477, d. circa 1557), was the son of John Cabot. In 1497 he accompanied his father on his great voyage, in the course of which the adventurers visited Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Labrador, and Florida. In 1512 Ferdinand the Catholic induced Cabot to enter the service of Spain; but on the death of the king, in 1516, he returned to England, and in the following year made another attempt to discover the North-West Passage, visiting Hudson's Bay. In 1525 he sailed on a voyage in the interests of Spain, and discovered St. Salvador and the River Plate, returning to Europe in 1531. In 1548 he again settled in England, and received a pension from Edward VI., with the title of "Grand Pilot of England." In 1553 he did good service to English commerce by being instrumental in establishing the trade with Russia.

Cabul, MASSACRE AT; RETREAT FROM, &c.
[AFGHAN WARS.]

Cade's Rebellion is the name generally given to the rising in south-eastern England in the summer of 1450. Parliament was sitting at Leicester vainly striving to frame measures to check the enormous evils, financial and political, from which the country was suffering, when, early in June, news came that the commons of Kent had risen in arms under a captain who called himself Mortimer, and whom Thomas Gascoigne, an Oxford theologian of the day, represents as "a descendant of Roger Mortimer, the bastard," whoever he might be. But the captain proved to be one Jack Cade, described by later writers as an Irishman who had killed a woman of Sussex, fled to France, fought there against the English, come back to England, and wedded the daughter of a squire. He undoubtedly gave proofs of military capacity; and we are told that the Primate, in a conference with him, found him "sober in talk and wise in reasoning," if "arrogant in heart and stiff in opinion." At any rate, the rising he led was no wanton one. Misrule at home and failure abroad had brought on men in power a hatred and contempt almost universal. The amiable king was as clay in the hands of his headstrong queen and the friends of the late unpopular Duke of Suffolk. The royal income had dwindled by improvident grants; the Exchequer was well-nigh bankrupt; grievous taxes oppressed the commons, whilst their favourite, the Duke of York, was excluded from the government. The bonds of law were relaxing on all sides. The lawless murder of the Duke of Suffolk at Dover, on May 2nd, had been followed by a report that the king's vengeance would fall on the county of Kent. The men of Kent were in no humour to submit to royal severities; they resolved on an immediate appeal to arms; and in combination with the men of Surrey and Sussex, and headed by Cade, who called himself "Captain of Kent," assembled, on June 1st, in considerable force, on Blackheath. This was no tumultuous gathering of a mere clownish mob, but an organised enterprise, deliberately carried out by means of the regular local machinery; and men of good birth are known to have taken part in it. In their formal complaint we learn the provocation and aims of the rebellion. Prominent among the first were the heavy taxation, the abuse of purveyance, the appointment of upstarts to high office, the treasonable loss of France, undue interference of great men at elections, and exactions under colour of law; among the second it was urged that the alienated crown lands should be resumed, the friends of Suffolk discarded, and the king's confidence given to York—in fact, redress of grievances and change of counsellors. The king at once mustered an army, and marched to London; and thence, after some delay, moved on Blackheath. Cade fell back before his advance; and Henry, thinking the brunt of the danger over, sent only a small force, under Sir Humphrey and William Stafford, in pursuit of him. Cade faced round at Sevenoaks, and there, on June 18th, a fight ensued, in which the king's force was routed, and both the Staffords killed. Cade returned to London, and occupied Southwark. The Londoners resolved, by a vote of the Common Council, to open their gates to the rebels; and on July 2nd, Cade led them across the bridge and took formal possession of the city by striking London Stone with his sword. For a time he preserved the show, and something of the reality, of discipline, making his men respect the persons and properties of the citizens, and returning with them every night to Southwark. But he took Lord Say and Sele, the Treasurer, who was in special ill-odour with the country, out of the Tower, and had him arraigned before the Lord Mayor, but afterwards caused him to be carried off and beheaded in Cheap. Crowmer, Say's son-in-law and Sheriff of Kent, and another were also murdered. Then discipline gave way; robberies became frequent, Cade himself plundering friend and enemy alike. This conduct enraged the Londoners; they turned upon Cade; and under the command of Matthew Gough, a soldier of renown in the French wars, sought, on July 5th, to hold the bridge against the rebels. Cade promptly made a furious onslaught upon them; drove them with heavy loss to the drawbridge at the centre, which he set on fire; and killed their leader. The contest lasted through the night; but the Kentish men fell back the next morning. The Chancellor (Archbishop Kemp) seized this moment of discouragement to tempt the insurgents with offers of pardon. These were produced by Bishop Waynflete at a conference with Cade, and were gladly accepted. Soon almost every man of the rebels was making for his home. But their captain, distrusting his pardon, or yielding to his instincts, flung open the gaols, and turned the released prisoners into a new force. With this he went to Rochester, whither his booty had been sent by water. A price was now set on his head; and his men quarrelled with him over the plunder. He left them and fled into Sussex. He was heading towards Lewes, when he was caught at Heathfield in a garden, by Iden, the new Sheriff of Kent, and struggling against capture, was cut down and wounded to the death. He died before his captors could get him to London.

Cadiz, EXPEDITIONS AGAINST. The first (1596) was undertaken to create a diversion in favour of Henry IV. of France, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Melun. In June, 1596, a combined fleet of English and Dutch under Lord Howard of Effingham and the Earl of Essex, entered Cadiz harbour, where Sir Francis Drake had burnt the shipping nine years before, and completely defeated the Spanish vessels assembled there for the defence of the city. Essex, with 3,000 men, landed at Puntal, and captured the town, extorting a ransom of 120,000 crowns from the citizens. The expedition returned ten weeks after it had left Plymouth, having done much to lower the prestige of Spain, and to assert the naval superiority of the English. The second (1625) resulted from the rupture of the negotiations for the Spanish marriage, and the restoration of the Palatinate by Spanish aid, and the consequent expedition planned by the Duke of Buckingham to seize a Spanish port and intercept the treasure fleet. An open breach took place in September, 1625, when Charles concluded an alliance with Holland (Sept. 8th), and a joint expedition was agreed on. Sir Edward Cecil (Lord Wimbleton) was entrusted with the chief command, with Lord Denbigh as rear-admiral and the Earl of Essex as vice-admiral. The combined fleet arrived in Cadiz Bay on Oct. 22nd; but instead of at once attacking the ships in the harbour and assaulting the city, the next day was spent in capturing the fort of Puntal, which guarded the entrance of the harbour. The delay gave the Spaniards time to garrison the before defenceless city, and made a surprise impossible. On the 24th Wimbleton landed his troops, and marched northwards to meet a Spanish force of whose approach he had heard; but the Spaniards retreated, and, after a useless and disorderly march, he returned next morning to his fleet. The fleet, which was to have destroyed the Spanish vessels at the head of the harbour, found them posted in an inaccessible creek, and accomplished nothing. Cadiz was now too strong to attack; so on Oct. 27th the soldiers were re-embarked, the fort of Puntal was abandoned, and the fleet put to sea to intercept the treasure ships. This portion of the enterprise also failed; the ships were unseaworthy, and disease raged among the crews; and in December the fleet returned to England.

The third (1702) occurred during the War of the Spanish Succession, and the idea appears to have been suggested by the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, who was convinced that the Spaniards were to a man in favour of the Archduke Charles, and that Cadiz would form a good basis of operations. Accordingly a joint expedition of English and Dutch was fitted out and placed under the command of the Duke of Ormonde; Sir George Rooke, who disapproved of the whole plan, being in command of the fleet of thirty ships of the line. The land forces amounted to 14,000 men. It was first designed to attack Gibraltar, but this idea was given up. For a fortnight the fleet was delayed by storms. Cadiz was strongly fortified and was defended by the veteran general Villadrias. Ormonde first attempted to gain over the governor Brancaccio, and then the inhabitants, but without success. As the town itself was supposed, though utterly without reason, to be impregnable, Villadrias having only 200 men, the allies occupied the port of Santa Maria, which they ruthlessly pillaged, the officers being as unprincipled as the men (July 18th). An attempt to take Fort Matagorda proved an utter failure; dysentery, too, broke out among the troops. Accordingly, on the 30th of September, Ormonde, sorely against his will, was constrained to re-embark his troops, and they set off homeward "with a great deal of plunder and infamy." On their way home, however, the expedition partly retrieved its character by the destruction of the Spanish galleons in Vigo Bay.

Cadogan, WILLIAM 1ST EARL OF (d. 1726), was one of the officers whom Marlborough most trusted. He was made colonel of the 2nd Regiment of Horse in 1703, and general in the following year for his gallant attack on the Schellenberg. In 1705 he was elected member for Woodstock. He fought at Ramillies, and towards the end of 1706, he was taken prisoner, but soon exchanged. In 1708 he was appointed ambassador to the States General. Cadogan led the van at Oudenarde, having been sent on to construct pontoons across the Scheldt, by which the army effected the passage. He also supported General Webb, in his gallant fight with the enemy at Wynendale. At the end of the year he was made lieutenant-general. He was again appointed envoy to the States General, but was recalled by the Tory ministry. In Marlborough's last campaign he surprised Bouchain and Cambrai, and broke the barrier which Villars had termed his "non plus ultra." On the disgrace of Marlborough he resigned his appointments. On the accession of George I. he was made Master of the Horse, and envoy to the States General. When the Jacobite insurrection of 1715 broke out, Cadogan was sent to Scotland after the dilatoriness of Argyle had been proved, and soon brought the campaign to a conclusion. He was raised to the Peerage in 1716. He signed the defensive alliance between England, France, and Holland, and subsequently carried out the execution of the Barrier Treaty, and signed the Quadruple Alliance. His influence in Holland was partly owing to his friendship with Marlborough, and partly because he had married a Dutch lady of good family. On the death of the Duke of Marlborough, he was appointed Commander-in-chief and Master-General of the Ordnance. Later on he supported Carteret in his quarrel with Walpole.

Cadsand, THE BATTLE OF (1337), the first fight of the Hundred Years' War against France, was brought about by the attack of the Count of Flanders on the party of Van Artevelde, who sought aid from England. Sir Walter Manny was sent with a small force, and having effected a landing at Cadsand, an island at the mouth of the Scheldt, inflicted a serious defeat on the troops of the count.

Caen, THE TREATY OF (1091), was made between William Rufus and Robert of Normandy, under the mediation probably of the King of France. Robert renounced his claim to England, and was allowed to retain his capital and the greater part of his duchy; but he recognised the commendations which many of the Norman nobles had made to William Rufus, who thus became a Continental neighbour to his brother, "hemming in what was left of Normandy on every side" (Freeman). (Cherbourg, Fécamp, and St. Michael's Mount were among the places surrendered by Robert. The treaty provided that if either Robert or William should die without an heir the survivor should succeed to his dominions.

Freeman, William Rufus, ii., in the Appendix the different versions of the treaty are given.

Caerlaverock Castle, on the Nith, in Dumfriesshire, was held for some days in the year 1300 by sixty men against an overpowering force commanded by Edward I. It was the place where James V. of Scotland died, December 14th, 1542. In 1545, Hertford persuaded Lord Maxwell, its owner, to surrender the castle to the English, by whom, however, it was not held for long. The castle was destroyed by Cromwell.

The siege of Caerlaverock by Edward I. forms the subject of a curious French poem giving a catalogue of the various barons and knights present, with a description of their arms, persons, and characters. It was printed by Grove in 1808, and Sir H. Nicolas in 1828. An elaborate edition has been issued by Mr. Thos. Wright, Lond., 1864, 4th ed.

Cagliari Affair, THE. In June, 1857, some of the passengers on a trading steamer, the Cagliari, seized the ship and attacked the island of Perga. The ship, after being abandoned by its captors, was taken at sea by a Neapolitan war-vessel, and two English engineers aboard were imprisoned till Mar., 1858, until one became mad, and the other seriously ill. The affair formed the subject of much discussion in Parliament, representations from the English government to that of Naples ending in the payment of £3,000 compensation by the latter in June, 1858.

Cairns, HUGH MCCALMONT, 1ST EARL (b. 1819), second son of William Cairns, of Co. Down, Ireland, was called to the bar in 1844, and entered Parliament as member for Belfast in 1852. In 1858 he was appointed Solicitor-General by Lord Derby. On the return of Lord Derby to power in 1866, he was made Attorney-General, and subsequently a Lord Justice of Appeal. In 1867 he was elevated to the peerage. He became Lord Chancellor in 1868, and held that office till the downfall of Mr. Disraeli's ministry. In Mr. Disraeli's second administration he again held the Chancellorship.

Caithness is mentioned in the Pictish Chronicle as the territory of Cait, one of the sons of Cinge. The district seems to have embraced the whole of the northern part of the island from sea to sea. It passed under the rule of the Norwegian Earls of Orkney in the ninth century, though the Kings of Scotland claimed the territory as part of their kingdom. William the Lion, about 1196, deprived Earl Harold of that part of the district of Caithness which comprises Sutherland, and bestowed it on the Morays. The Norwegian Earls of Caithness held of the Scotch king, and not of the King of Norway, as did the Earls of Orkney. The old line of earls came to an end, in 1231, with the death of Earl John, and for the next century the earldom was held by the family of Angus, after which it passed to the St. Clairs, or Sinclairs. The bishopric of Caithness was founded by David I., with the cathedral at Dornoch.

Skene, Celtic Scotland, iii., Appendix.

Caithness, JOHN, EARL OF (d. 1231), son of Harold, was supposed to have connived at the murder of Bishop Adam. He was in consequence deprived of half his earldom by Alexander II., from whom, however, he bought it back a year later. The earl was burnt to death in his own castle, 1231.

Calais first passed into the possession of the English in the reign of Edward III. It was invested by the English in August, 1346, and after the battle of Crecy Edward III. appeared in person before the walls with the army that had won the victory. The town endured a siege for nearly a year with heroic bravery, and finally surrendered, Aug. 4, 1347. According to Jean Le Bel, six of the chief citizens offered their lives to the king in ransom for their fellow-townsmen, but were spared by the intervention of Queen Philippa. The town was unsuccessfully besieged by the Duke of Burgundy in 1436, and remained in English hands as the sole vestige of the English conquests in France at the close of Henry VI.'s reign. In 1455, Warwick was made Captain of Calais, but, in 1470, he and Clarence were refused entrance to the city. In July, 1475, Edward IV. landed at Calais to begin his projected campaign in France. In January, 1558, the town was invested and easily captured by the Duke of Guise, owing to the apathy of the English government, which had left the town without men or supplies to withstand a siege. By the peace of Cateau Cambresis the French bound themselves to restore Calais to the English at the end of eight years, on pain of forfeiting a large sum of money; but the engagement was never carried out. It was while lying off Calais on Aug. 7, 1588, that the great Spanish fleet [ARMADA] was dispersed by the fireships of the English. In 1596 Calais was taken from the French by Philip of Spain, a circumstance which so alarmed England as to occasion the expedition to Cadiz under Lord Howard of Effingham. Calais was restored to France in 1598, and has since remained in the hands of the French.

Calathros. A district in the ancient kingdom of Dalriada, lying between the Roman wall and the River Avon, now called Callander. The Battle of Calathros (634) resulted in the defeat of King Donald Brec, who was attempting to wrest the district from the English.

Calcutta first became an English trading station in 1686, when the small factory established at Hooghley was removed to this place. In 1696 Fort William was built, and became the head-quarters of the Bengal servants of the East India Company. In 1707 it was constituted a Presidency, and its trade soon became considerable. In 1710 the population was computed at nearly 12,000. The city was strongly fortified, and in 1742 the trench called the "Mahratta ditch" was dug round it to protect it from the predatory Mahratta horsemen. In 1756 the town was captured and sacked by Surajah Dowlah, and the tragedy of the "Black Hole" enacted [BLACK HOLE OF CALCUTTA]. In Jan, 1757, the town was reconquered by Clive, and rebuilt. In 1773 it became the capital of British India as well as of Bengal, by an Act of Parliament which gave the Fort William government superiority over those of the other Presidencies. The Governor of Bengal was henceforth called the Governor-General, and in 1834 his title was changed to that of Governor-General of India. Many magnificent buildings were erected in the European quarter, including the splendid Government House built by Lord Wellealey in 1804. In 1854 the supreme government was separated from the local Bengal government by the creation of a Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, who also has his seat at Calcutta. The population of the town and suburbs in 1876 was 794,000.

Caledonia. The name given generally by the Romans to that part of Britain lying north of the Firths of Forth and Clyde, and first laid open by the conquests and explorations of Agricola. The name first occurs in Lucan, vi. 67, and Valerius Flaccus, Argonaut., i. 7. Tacitus says that the red hair and large limbs of the Caledonians point to a German origin. The Caledonians, according to Ptolemy, extended from the Sinus Lemannionis (probably Loch Long) to the Varar Acetuarium (Beaulieu Firth). They occupied the tract of wild country called Caledonia Silva, or Forest of Celyddon, and were the most powerful of all the tribes north of the Brigantes. At a later period the name came to include apparently all the barbarian and partially un-subdued natives of the northern mountainous district. In 201 the Caledonians joined the revolt of the Meatæ. Severus conducted a campaign against them in 208; but they again revolted a year or two afterwards. In the fourth century, and subsequently, the name is used as equivalent to the whole of Northern Britain—modern Scotland, as distinguished from England and Ireland.

Calendar. THE REFORMATION OF THE (1751), was in great part due to the efforts of Lord Chesterfield. The "Old Style," which was now eleven days in error, had long since been abandoned by most civilised nations. England, however, with Russia and Sweden, still clung to the antiquated system. "It was not," wrote Chesterfield, "very honourable for England to remain in a gross and avowed error, especially in such company." Accordingly, having paved the way to his measure by some letters to the World, Chesterfield drew up the scheme in concert with Lord Macclesfield and Bradley the astronomer. The Bill successfully passed both Houses of Parliament. It ordained that the year 1752 should begin on the 1st of January instead of the 1st of March, and that the 3rd of the month of September should be called the 14th, so as to lose the eleven days. Further, such changes should be introduced as would make the solar year and the lunar year coincide. In the matter of payments, it was enacted that these should not be altered, and that the 5th of April, the 5th of July, the 10th of October, and the 5th of January should still continue to be the days on which the dividends of the public funds became due. This change met with a good deal of ignorant opposition. The common Opposition election cry was, "Give us back our eleven days."

Cambridge was the site of a Roman station, named Camboritum. After the English conquest the name of the town was changed to Grantchester, the modern name being derived from the great stone bridge across the Cam. In 1267 it was fortified by Henry III., and afterwards taken by the barons. In 1381 it was attacked by the insurgents, and many of the colleges were pillaged and their charters burned. During the Great Rebellion it was occupied and fortified by the Parliamentarians. The town has returned two members to Parliament since Edward I.'s time.

Cambridge, UNIVERSITY OF. [UNIVERSITIES.]

Cambridge, RICHARD PLANTAGENET, EARL OF (d. 1415), was the second son of Edmund of Langley, Duke of York. He was created Earl of Cambridge by Henry V., but in 1415 was concerned in the conspiracy with Lord Scrope of Masham and others, to dethrone Henry and place the Earl of March on the throne. On the discovery of the plot Cambridge was beheaded. He married, first, Anne Mortimer, sister of the Earl of March, through whom the claims of the house of Mortimer were transferred to the family of York; and, secondly, Maud, daughter of Thomas, Lord Clifford.

Cambridge, GEORGE FREDERICK WILLIAM CHARLES, DUKE OF (b. 1819), son of Adolphus Frederick, seventh son of George III., was born at Hanover. He became a colonel in the British army, 1837; a major-general in 1845; and a lieutenant-general in 1854. In the latter capacity he saw active service at the battles of the Alma and Inkermann, as commander of the two brigades of Guards and Highlanders. In 1862, he became field-marshal; and on the resignation of Viscount Hardinge was appointed Commander-in-chief.

Cambuskenneth, THE BATTLE OF. [STERLING, BATTLE OF.]

Camden, THE BATTLE OF (August 16, 1780), fought during the American War of Independence, arose out of an attempt made by the Americans to save the Carolina provinces from falling into British hands. In the early part of the summer, Washington despatched De Kalb with 3,000 men to join Gates in the South; and Virginia sent out a large body of Militia. The centre of the British force, which was widely extended over South Carolina, lay at Camden, but Cornwallis, on hearing of Gates's advance, concentrated a large body on that place. A skirmish at daybreak of August 16 between the vanguards of the two armies soon developed into a general battle. The British were outnumbered, but a great part of the American force was raw and undisciplined, the steady attack of the regulars was irresistible, and the flight soon became a hopeless rout. The American losses were very heavy both in men and stores. Among the former was De Kalb himself. The victory was the most decisive advantage gained by the British during the war. It placed South Carolina and Georgia almost entirely in the power of the British. [CORNWALLIS.]

Camden, CHARLES PRATT, 1ST EARL (b. 1713, d. 1794), was the son of Chief Justice Sir John Pratt. He was educated at Eton, and called to the bar in 1738. In February, 1752, he defended a printer who was prosecuted for an alleged libel. His practice and his reputation continued steadily to increase, until when Pitt came into office in 1757 he was appointed Attorney-General. When Pitt resigned in October, 1761, Pratt continued in office as Attorney-General, and in the following January became Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. While he held this position, he continued to maintain constitutional principles against tyrannical attempts to oppress the subject, and decided in numerous cases against the legality of general warrants. To him Wilkes applied, and the Chief Justice ordered his release on the ground of his privilege as a member of Parliament. On the formation of the Rockingham cabinet, in 1765, he was raised to the peerage as Baron Camden. In February, 1766, he made a great speech in favour of the repeal of the Stamp Act, and against the Declaratory Act. In the following July Camden was raised to the woolsack. Lord Camden's opinion on the right of Parliament to expel Wilkes seems to have been at variance with the action taken by the cabinet, though in his perplexity as to the right course to take he continued to belong to the government; but in January, 1770, he openly declared his differences with his colleagues on that subject of the Wilkes question, and resigned the Great Seal. In 1772 he warmly opposed the Royal Marriage Act. In January, 1782, he supported Lord Shelburne's amendment to the address on the King's Speech. On the formation of the second Rockingham cabinet in March, 1782, Lord Camden preferred the office of President of the Council to the Great Seal. In 1783 he resigned, and offered a vigorous opposition to the "Coalition" Ministry. Soon after Pitt became Prime Minister, Camden was again made President of the Council. In May, 1786, he received an earldom. He conducted, in the House of Lords, the measures adopted by the government in relation to the Regency Bill. The last occasion on which he addressed the House of Lords was the debate on Fox's Libel Bill. On the eve of fourscore years, he made his final and successful effort to put on the statute-book those principles as to the rights of juries which he had so consistently maintained throughout his life.

Camden, JOHN JEFFREYS PRATT, 1st MARQUIS (b. 1759, d. 1840), son of the preceding, entered Parliament in 1780 as member for Bath. In 1795 he succeeded Lord Fitzwilliam as Viceroy of Ireland. On his entry into Dublin in March, 1796, there was a serious riot, which could only be quelled by bloodshed. In 1797 he was bitterly denounced by Grattan, on account of the severities he had found it necessary to authorise in Ulster; but the Parliament, now thoroughly alarmed by the progress of disaffection, was on his side. The English government was more uncertain how to act, but ultimately supported Lord Camden, and took his side in the dispute in which he was involved with General Abercromby. He was, after the beginning of 1797, in full possession of all the rebel plans, but was unable to act on his information during the Rebellion of 1798. He was consequently urging the gravity of the situation on the English cabinet, but it was only after Father Murphy's successes that the Guards and other English troops were sent out to support him. The Whigs in England, meanwhile, continued to attack him as a tyrant of the worst kind, Sheridan moving for his recall in the Commons, and the Dukes of Leinster and Norfolk in the Lords. Both motions were defeated, but popular clamour was so great that, in June, 1798, he was recalled. In 1804 he was in the cabinet, and in 1812 was made a marquis. For nearly sixty years he held the lucrative post of Teller of the Exchequer; but during more than half that period he patriotically declined to draw the enormous emoluments of the office.

Camden, WILLIAM (b. 1551, d. 1623), one of the most celebrated of English antiquaries, was born in London and educated at St. Paul's School and at Oxford. In 1575—6 he became a master at Westminster School; in 1589 received a prebend at Salisbury Cathedral; in 1593 he became Head Master of Westminster, and in 1597 Clarencieux King-at-arms. In 1607 he was commissioned by James I. to translate into Latin the account of the trial of the Gunpowder Plot conspirators. In 1622 he founded his Professorship of History at Oxford, and died at Chiselhurst the next year. Camden's most celebrated work is the Britannia sive Florentissimorum Regnorum Angliæ, Scotiæ, Hiberniæ, et Insularum Adjacentium, ex Intima Antiquitate Chorographica Descriptio, which first appeared in 1586, and had gone through a ninth edition in 1594. A new and enlarged edition was published in 1607. It is an interesting work, and the care and learning shown in its compilation still make it of great value to scholars. Though many of Camden's antiquarian theories have been dispelled by later research, his work is important as a great storehouse of facts. He also wrote an English antiquarian work of less elaborate character, called Remaines Concerning Britain, 1605, which has been frequently reprinted. In 1615 he published the first part of his Annales Rerum Anglicarum Regnante Elizabetha, the second part of which did not appear till after the author's death. It is not a work of special value.

The Britannia was translated into English by P. Holland 1610; and by Bishop Gibson in 1694, which translation was reprinted in 1723 and enlarged in 1752 and 1771. An enlarged translation was published by Gough in 3 vols., 1789. An edition of Camden's Works in 6 vols. was published in 1870.

Camden Society, THE, was founded in 1838 for the purpose of printing ancient chronicles, documents, and memorials relating to English history and antiquities. It has published over 130 volumes, many of which are of the greatest importance, and are, indeed, indispensable to the historical student. The Camden Society's works bear especially upon the history of England under the Tudors and Stuarts. [AUTHORITIES.]

Cameron of Lochiel, "a gracious master, a trusty ally, a terrible enemy," was one of the staunchest adherents of James II. in the campaign of 1689. He was in command of the Camerons at Killiecrankie (q.v.), but after the death of Claverhouse he refused to serve under his successor, Cannon, the Irish commander, and retired to Lochaber. In 1692 he took the oaths to William III. with the other Highland chiefs.

Cameron, RICHARD (d. July 20, 1680), the founder of the Cameronians, was born at Falkland, in Fife, and was the son of a village tradesman. He entered the ministry and distinguished himself by his violent opposition to the restoration of episcopacy. He proceeded to still further lengths by the Sanquhar Declaration, by which he and his followers practically declared themselves rebels, and announced their intention of offering armed resistance to the government. In 1677, Cameron was compelled to flee to Holland; but in the spring of 1680 he returned, and was killed in the skirmish of Aird's Moss.

Cameronians, THE, took their name from Richard Cameron, the author of the Sanquhar Declaration. They were sometimes called "Covenanters," from their rigid adherence to the Solemn League and Covenant, and afterwards "McMillanites" (from the name of their first minister after the Revolution) and "Mountain Men." Their creed considered as enemies to righteousness

Romanists, Episcopalians, and more especially those moderate Presbyterians who had accepted the indulgence of Charles II. Besides holding the binding obligation of the Covenant on the three kingdoms, they maintained the Westminster Confession, and the Scriptures as the absolute rule of faith and conduct. The sect was not extinguished by the defeat of Aird's Moss, and the death of their leader. They issued a defiance to the royal authority, Oct. 28, 1684, and in return were proscribed and hunted about from place to place by the royal troops. The Cameronians were most numerous in the wilder parts of south-western Scotland, where, on the accession of William III., their warlike temperament, which had been so unfortunately displayed at Dunbar, Bothwell Bridge, and Aird's Moss, was utilised by the formation of the Cameronian Regiment. The Revolution secured for Scotland a Presbyterian church government; but many of the more extreme Cameronians refused to swear allegiance to William III., or to attend the established places of worship. These Covenanting nonjurors became the "Reformed Presbyterians," or the "Old Presbyterian Dissenters," and formed a Presbytery and subsequently a synod in 1743. They founded numerous churches in England, Ireland, and America, and their number in Scotland in 1840 was estimated at about 6,000.

Campbell, THE FAMILY OF, is, according to tradition, descended in the female line from the ancient kings or chiefs of Argyle, and from one of these, a certain Diarmid, the clan is supposed to derive its name of Seol Diarmid, by which it was known in Erse and Gaelic. In the reign of Malcolm Canmore the name was changed to Campbell by the marriage of the heiress of the house with a person of that name. A Sir Colin Campbell, Lord of Lochow, was among the Scottish knights and barons summoned to the Council of Berwick in 1291. His son, Sir Neil Campbell, was a strong supporter of Robert Bruce, whose sister he married. His son, Sir Colin, received large grants of land in Argyshire from King Robert and his successor. His grandson, Duncan, was made Chancellor of Scotland by James I., and raised to the peerage as Lord Campbell. The grandson of this peer, Colin, was made Earl of Argyle in 1457. Archibald, the eighth earl, was created Marquis of Argyle in 1641: but was executed, and his honours forfeited in 1661. The earldom was restored to his son, Archibald, the ninth earl, in 1663, who was beheaded in 1685. His son, Archibald, was restored under William III., and created Duke of Argyle in 1701. [ARGYLE, PEERAGE OF.]

the ducal house of Argyle, was the son of Dr. George Campbell, minister of Cupar. He was educated at the Grammar School at Cupar, and at the University of St. Andrews, and was called to the bar of Lincoln's Inn in 1806. He soon obtained a good practice. In 1827 he obtained a silk gown, and in 1830—31 he represented Stafford in the House of Commons. In 1832 he was made Solicitor-General, and in Feb., 1834, was appointed Attorney-General. During his period of office he inaugurated several important law reforms, among which were the Act called Lord Campbell's Act for the amendment of the law of libel as it affects newspapers [LIBEL, LAW OF], and an Act limiting the power of arrest in cases of disputed debt. He was also engaged as counsel in several cases of great importance, notably the trial of Lord Cardigan, before the House of Lords, for shooting Captain Tuckett; the case of Stockdale v. Hansard; and the defence of Lord Melbourne in the action for damages raised by Mrs. Norton. In June, 1841, he was raised to the peerage and received the Irish Chancellorship, which post he held for only sixteen days. In 1846 Lord Campbell joined the Whig cabinet as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In 1850 he became Lord Chief Justice, and held that office till he was appointed Lord Chancellor of Great Britain by Lord Palmerston in 1859. Lord Campbell published, in 1849, The Lives of the Lord Chancellors and Keepers of the Great Seal of England, in seven volumes. It is a work disfigured by inaccuracy, carelessness, and (in the case of the more recent Chancellors) by the prejudices and personal jealousy of the author; but it nevertheless contains a good deal of interesting matter. He also wrote Lives of the Chief Justices, a much inferior work. He was found dead in his chair on the morning of Sunday, June 24th, 1861.

Lord Campbell's Memoirs, edited by his daughter, Mrs. Hardcastle, 1879.

Campbell, JOHN, LL.D. (b. 1708, d. 1775), was the writer of many useful historical works which had a considerable reputation in the last century. He was largely concerned in the Ancient Universal History, and was editor of the Modern Universal History. He also wrote A Political Survey of Great Britain, 1772, and Lives of the Admirals, the latter of which is a careful and interesting work.

Campbell, SIR COLIN. [CLYDE, LORD.]

Camperdown, THE BATTLE OF (Oct. 11, 1797), was fought between the English and the Dutch. In the autumn of 1797 a great Dutch fleet was prepared to co-operate with the French in the invasion of Ireland, Oct. 9. The Dutch, under De Winter, weighed from the Texel. Admiral Duncan, who had been lying in Yarmouth Roads, crossed the German Ocean, and came in sight of the Dutch on the morning of Oct. 11th, nine miles from the coast, near Camperdown. At half-past eleven Duncan made the signal for the fleet to engage, and at twelve o'clock determined to pass through the enemy's line in two divisions and engage to leeward. But the weather was so hazy that the signal was not seen by many of the ships, which accordingly engaged in close action as each captain saw an opportunity. The two flag-ships passed through the line, followed by a few leading ships, while the others, for the most part, engaged the enemy to windward. The action was fought with the desperate stubbornness which had always been so marked a characteristic of the two nations. De Winter in the Frigheid, assailed by the English admiral's ship and two others, after a desperate contest, surrendered, when he was totally dismantled, and had scarcely enough men left to fight his guns. One after another the Dutch ships followed his example, and it only remained for the British to secure the prizes before night set in. Eight of the Dutch ships, with over 6,000 prisoners, were taken. The English lost 1,040 and the Dutch 1,160 killed and wounded. In the action the English had 16 line-of-battle ships carrying 8,221 men, and the Dutch 16 line-of-battle ships carrying 7,157. The Dutch prizes were so shattered as to be quite useless.

Campian, EDMUND (b. 1540, d. 1581), was born in London and educated at Oxford, where he became a Fellow of St. John's College; but having openly embraced the Catholic faith, to which he had long secretly inclined, suffered a short imprisonment. On his release he went to Cardinal Allen's college at Douay, where he became noted for his learning and virtues. His affability and high moral character made him an invaluable assistant to the Jesuits, and in June, 1581, he undertook a "missionary journey" to England, in company with Robert Parsons. Their zeal was such as to cause the Parliament of 1581 to pass the harsh statute against any one harbouring a Jesuit, and active measures were taken for the apprehension of the two missionaries. In July, 1581, Campian was taken at Lyfford, in Berkshire, and sent to the Tower, where he was tortured, in order to extort from him the names of Catholics who had given him shelter. He was then indicted for compassing and imagining the queen's death, and, after what appears to have been a very unfair trial, was executed at Tyburn, Dec., 1581.

Camulodunum, a town of Celtic and Roman Britain, is now generally allowed to be identical with the modern Colchester. It became the capital of the Trinobantes under Cunobelin, or Cymbeline (q.v.). In 44 it was taken by Aulus Plautius, and in 60 was made a Roman colony. Two years later Boadicea and the Iceni captured and burnt the city and defeated Petilius Cerialis, but shortly afterwards, in the neighbourhood of Camulodunum, Suetonius Paulinus retrieved by a complete victory the honour of Rome.

Canada was probably discovered by John Cabot in 1497, and by him taken possession of for England, though the occupation of the country was never formally entered upon. In 1525 an expedition, sent out by Francis I., under the leadership of Giovanni Verrazano, a Florentine, took possession of the country, which had previously been claimed for England by Cabot, giving it the name of "La Nouvelle France." In 1541 another French expedition, under M. de Roberval, gave Canada its present name, mistaking the Indian word "kanata" (huts) for the native name of the country. In spite of various attempts on the part of England to establish her claim on Canada, the country remained in the hands of the French until 1763, when it was ceded to Great Britain by the terms of the Treaty of Paris. The Quebec Bill, passed in 1774, established the government of Canada, with a careful regard to the rights and feelings of the French inhabitants, and was the means of securing the allegiance of the great mass of French Canadians, by whose aid the American invasion of Canada, in 1776, was easily repulsed. In 1790 the province of Canada was divided, at the suggestion of Pitt, into Upper (or Western) and Lower (or Eastern) Canada, mainly for purposes of representation, whilst the division also served to mark out the locality where the English and French elements respectively preponderated. Each province had a Governor and an Executive Council, a Legislative Council appointed by the crown, and a Representative Assembly appointed by the people. For some years after the establishment of the Houses of Assembly, there were frequent disputes between them and the Legislative Council, giving rise to such discontent that, in 1812, the Americans projected an invasion of Canada, under the impression that they would be joined by a large majority of the inhabitants. The Canadians, however, stood firmly by the British during the American War of 1812—15, and the attacks on East and West Canada were repulsed. On the conclusion of peace in March, 1815, the disputes again broke out, varying in degree according as the policy of the governors was conciliatory or the reverse. The grievances of the French or national party seem to have had real existence. The Executive and the Upper Legislative Chamber were composed of crown nominees, and in no sense represented the feelings of the bulk of the inhabitants. The administration (especially in matters of local government) was clumsy, inefficient, and perhaps corrupt. The discontent among the French Canadians continued to increase. The refusal of the government to make any concessions at length brought matters to a crisis, and in 1837 a rebellion broke out in Lower Canada. This insurrection, though crushed almost at its first outbreak, had still the effect of opening the eyes of the Home Government to the danger of neglecting any longer the demands for reform which were being urged upon them by the French Canadians, and accordingly, in 1838, Lord Durham was sent out to Canada to report on the best method of adjusting the future government of the province. The result was the union of the two Canadas in 1840, from which time discontent and insurrection have been at an end. The changes introduced by the union were considerable. A single government was instituted, with a single parliament, consisting of a Legislative Council of twenty or more life members, and a Lower House of eighty-four deputies, appointed by popular election every four years. The reforms of 1840 were consolidated by Lord Elgin (1847), to whose practical and far-sighted administration of his office of Governor-General much of the prosperity of Canada is due. In 1856 the Upper House was made elective. In 1867 Canada and the other provinces of British North America were united, under the title of the DOMINION OF CANADA. The Dominion embracing the whole of British North America, with the exception of Newfoundland, includes the various provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Manitoba, and the North-West Territories. The government of the Dominion is exercised by a Governor-General, who is advised by a Privy Council; whilst there are two Legislative Chambers called the Senate and the House of Commons, the members of which meet at Ottawa, the capital of the Dominion and the seat of the Executive Government. The various provinces are administered by Lieutenant-Governors, appointed by the Governor-General, and have separate chambers of legislature. The Province of Canada proper in the Dominion of Canada consists of the two districts of Ontario and Quebec, each having a provincial government, vested, in the case of Ontario, in a Lieutenant-Governor and a Legislative Assembly consisting of eighty-two members elected for four years; in the case of Quebec in a Lieutenant-Governor, a Legislative Assembly of sixty-five members, and Executive and Legislative Councils appointed by the Governor. Since the constitution of the Dominion, the connection with England has shrunk to very slight proportions. Canada has a supreme Court of Appeal, and there is therefore now no appeal from the law-courts of Canada to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, or any other English court of law. The legal system in the older provinces is somewhat complicated, and in Quebec the old laws and customs of French Canada, founded on the jurisprudence of the Parliament of Paris, the edicts of the French kings, and the Civil Law, are still recognised by the courts for certain purposes. The trade, population, and agricultural prosperity of the Dominion of Canada have advanced greatly of late years, especially in the North-West Territory. The area of the Dominion of Canada is about 3,500,000 square miles, and its population, which is increasing fast, was 4,320,000 in 1881, of whom over a million are of French descent.

Canning, GEORGE (b. 1770, d. 1827), was born in London, the son of a poor barrister. His mother, left in needy circumstances, went upon the stage, and afterwards married an actor. George was sent by his uncle, Stratford Canning, a London merchant, the father of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, to Eton, where he had a brilliant career. Whilst at school he founded and contributed largely to a school magazine called The Microcosm. In 1787 he went to Oxford, where he attracted the attention of Pitt, and formed a close friendship with Mr. Jenkinson, afterwards Earl of Liverpool, which was of great service to him in later life. He was at this time a Whig, devoted to Fox and Sheridan, and inclined to look favourably on the French Revolution. On leaving Oxford, he at first went to the bar, but in 1793 was induced to enter Parliament as member for Newport (Isle of Wight), and as a follower of Mr. Pitt. He spoke frequently during his first years in the House of Commons, and always as a supporter of the ministry. In 1796 he became member for Wendover and Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs. In the autumn of 1797 he published, in conjunction with John Hookham Frere, Jenkinson, George Ellis, and Gifford, a satirical paper called The Anti-Jacobin. Some of Canning's contributions have taken a permanent place in literature. In the year 1799 Canning laboured earnestly with Pitt to effect the union with Ireland, on the basis of giving equal political rights to the Roman Catholics. When this measure failed, owing to the persistent opposition of the king, Canning left the government with his chief. Pitt was succeeded by Addington, who was assailed by Canning with untiring ridicule. "Pitt is to Addington," he said, "as London to Paddington." In 1799 he married the daughter of General John Scott, who brought him a large fortune. In 1804 he returned to office, with Pitt, as Treasurer of the Navy. On the death of Pitt in 1806, Fox came into office, and Canning had to retire. In March, 1807, he took office, under the Duke of Portland, as Minister for Foreign Affairs. In this capacity he executed the bold stroke of securing the Danish fleet lest it should fall into the hands of Napoleon (Sept., 1807). He also organised the assistance given by England to Spain against Napoleon, which eventually tended more than anything else to effect the emperor's downfall. He could not agree with Lord Castlereagh, the Secretary at War, and after the failure of the disastrous Walcheren expedition, for which Castlereagh had been largely responsible, resigned his office. Castlereagh became aware that Canning had intrigued against him with the Duke of Portland, and challenged him to a duel. They met at Putney, and Canning was wounded in the shoulder. Canning's resignation of office was an event which long retarded his advancement. He remained a strong advocate of the Emancipation of the Catholics. After the murder of Perceval in May, 1812, Canning and Wellesley received the king's commands to form a ministry, but they were unable to come to terms with Grey and Grenville. Lord Liverpool became Prime Minister instead. Lord Liverpool offered him the post of Foreign Secretary, which Canning refused. In 1814 he went as ambassador to Portugal. Two years later his impatience of being out of office led him to accept the post of President of the Board of Control in Lord Castlereagh's cabinet. In this ministry he was forced to sanction measures of repression of which he could not approve. He agreed with his colleagues in their dislike of Parliamentary reform, but differed from them both with regard to the Emancipation of the Catholics and the harsh measures adopted towards the Princess of Wales. During the trial which followed at the accession of George III., Canning travelled abroad and refused the Home Office offered him by Liverpool. In November, 1820, he came to London, resigned office, and then returned to France. In 1822 the directors of the East India Company appointed him to succeed Lord Hastings as Governor-General. He made all preparations for departure, and went down to Liverpool to take leave of his friends, when Lord Castlereagh (the Marquis of Londonderry, and Secretary for Foreign Affairs) suddenly committed suicide. Canning gave up the brilliant prospect of the Viceroyalty, and succeeded Londonderry. He now showed his resemblance to those English statesmen, who, like Chatham and Palmerston, have been able to sympathise with the aspirations of foreign Liberals. He supported constitutional principles against the reactionary efforts of Metternich. He protested against the Congress of Venice, and against the intervention of France in the affairs of Spain. He opposed the policy of the Holy Alliance. He was the first to recognise the independence of the Spanish colonies in America; as he said he "called a new world into existence to redress the balance of the old." He protected constitutional government in Portugal, and effected the severance of Portugal and Brazil. He still longed anxiously for the Emancipation of the Catholics, but this was temporarily hindered by the agitation of O'Connell, and was not effected till two years after Canning's death. He supported Huskisson in preparing the way for free trade, and laboured to effect the abolition of the slave trade. On the death of Lord Liverpool in Feb., 1827, Canning became Prime Minister. His last act was to secure the liberation of Greece by the Treaty of London, July, 1827. He died on the following August 8th. His death was felt as a shock to the whole of the civilised world, for he was the most prominent opponent of the system of reaction which was endeavouring to stamp out aspirations for liberty wherever they were found, and which afterwards led to the violent outbreaks of 1830 and 1848. Few names stand higher on the roll of English ministers.

Canning's Speeches, published in 6 vols., London, 1828. The best authorities for his life are the two works of his private secretary, Stapleton, The Political Life of the Rt. Hon. George Canning, 3 vols., 1831, and George Canning and His Times, 1859. There is a brilliant sketch of his career in Lord Dalling's Historical Characters. [O. B.]

Canning, CHARLES JOHN, VISCOUNT (b. 1812, d. 1862), third son of George Canning, was born at Gloucester Lodge, Kensington, Dec. 14, 1812. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In August, 1836, he was returned for Warwick, and remained a member of the House of Commons for six weeks. On the death of his mother, Viscountess Canning, March 15, he succeeded to the title in consequence of the deaths of his two elder brothers. He gradually acquired the reputation in the House of Lords of a conscientious, painstaking young statesman, without taking any very prominent part in the debates. In 1841 he was offered office by Sir Robert Peel, as Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. In 1846 he became Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and began to take a larger share in the business of the House. In 1848 he supported the Jewish Disabilities Bill; in 1850 he supported Lord Derby's resolution condemning Lord Palmerston's foreign policy, and spoke against Lord John Russell's Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. In 1851 Lord Derby offered him the Foreign Office, but he refused, feeling himself really a Liberal. In 1852

the Coalition Ministry of Lord Aberdeen came into office, and Canning became Postmaster-General. This office he continued to hold under Lord Palmerston. In 1855 he was appointed Governor-General of India, and on Feb. 1st, 1856, he disembarked at Calcutta. He was a cold, impassive man, to whom few would have ventured to make known the public agitation at the close of 1856 and opening of 1857; and he may be entirely acquitted of the charge of not having made himself acquainted with, or not following up if he did hear them, what were as yet intangible and confused rumours. When, however, the mutinies did begin, Lord Canning issued order after order, warning the sepoys against any false reports, and disclaiming any idea of deprivation of caste. Unfortunately, stronger measures than these were necessary to have stifled the Indian Mutiny. When once it had broken out he did his best to bring up troops to the front, and he endowed every person in authority with extra powers, while at the same time refusing to allow any retaliatory massacres. In 1858, on the termination of the Mutiny, he ordered the confiscation of all Oude, though this was repudiated by the Board of Control. In August, 1858, he issued from Allahabad the proclamation providing for the sole dominion of the crown, and putting an end to the rule of the East India Company. The rest of Lord Canning's administration was chiefly remarkable for the judicial reforms in 1860—61, the completion of many railways and canals, and the famine in the North-west Provinces, 1860—61. In 1862 Lady Canning died; this hastened the departure of the viceroy. His health had been considerably impaired by the cares of the previous six years; and he died three months after his arrival in England (June 17, 1862), "leaving the reputation of an industrious and conscientious public servant" (Times).

Canon Law. [ECCLESIASTICAL JURISDICTION.]

Canterbury was probably a place of no importance before the Roman occupation of Britain. By the Romans it was called Durovernum, a Latinised form of its Celtic name, which means the town of the rapid river. The fact that the Saxons called it the burgh of the Kent men would show that it was the most important place in the province. Under the descendants of Hengist it became the capital of Kent, and owing to this circumstance the first bishopric, and the metropolitan see, of England. The town was ravaged several times by the Danes, and almost destroyed by them in 1011. In 1067 the Danes burnt down the cathedral. It was rebuilt by Lanfranc and Anselm; but partially destroyed (including the choir) in 1174. It was rebuilt by William of Sens immediately afterwards. Important additions were made in the two following centuries, but it was not till 1495

that the great central tower was completed. Its importance was considerably increased after the canonisation of Becket, when it became the principal centre of pilgrimage in England. It was a town on the royal demesne, and was governed by a portreeve, or provost, till the time of John, when two bailiffs were appointed: the right of electing the bailiffs being granted in the eighteenth year of Henry III.'s reign. A charter was granted in 26 Henry VI., which established a mayor, aldermen, and common councilmen. Edward IV. enlarged the jurisdiction of the city, and formed it into a county. The city came under the operation of the Municipal Reform Act of 1835. The city has returned two members to Parliament since 23 Edward I.

Canterbury, ARCHBISHOPS OF; SEE OF. [ARCHBISHOP.]

Canterbury, CHARLES MANNERS SUTTON, 1ST VISCOUNT (b. 1780, d. 1845), the eldest son of Charles Manners Sutton, Archbishop of Canterbury, was called to the bar, 1805, and first sat in Parliament for Scarborough, 1807. In 1817 he succeeded Mr. Abbot as Speaker of the House of Commons, which office he held till 1834. The activity of commercial enterprise which followed the re-establishment of peace led to a rush of private business in the House of Commons, and Mr. Manners Sutton showed great skill in dealing with it. When Earl Grey resigned in 1832, Manners Sutton assisted the Duke of Wellington to form his temporary ministry; this was apparently to oblige the king, who rewarded him with the order of the Bath. In 1834, when Lord Melbourne was suddenly dismissed from office, a rumour was started that Manners Sutton was to be the Tory premier; and in consequence of this and of his active negotiations in forming the Peel ministry, the Whigs threw him out, and elected Mr. Abercromby Speaker in his place. In 1835 he was called to the Upper House.

Cantii, THE, were a British tribe, occupying a portion of the present county of Kent (which derives its name from them) and a part of Surrey. They were divided into four kingdoms, and were the most important of the peoples of south-eastern England. From their proximity to Gaul, they seem likewise to have been the most civilised of all the native tribes at the time of Cæsar's invasion.

Cantilupe, WALTER DE (d. 1265), was the son of William de Cantilupe, one of the itinerant justices, and in 1231, he was himself appointed an itinerant judge. In 1236 he became Bishop of Worcester, when he boldly resisted the exactions of the Pope. He supported Simon de Montfort in the Barons' War, and was one of the twenty-four councillors appointed to watch the execution of the Oxford Statutes, and he solemnly absolved the barons before the battle of Lewes. For the part he took in the contest, he was excommunicated by the Pope.

Cantilupe, St. THOMAS DE (d. 1282), the nephew of Walter de Cantilupe, was a man greatly respected for his piety and learning. In 1265 he was appointed Chancellor by Simon de Montfort, but relinquished the office in the same year, after the battle of Evesham. He is remarkable as being the last Englishman who was canonised.

Canton was first visited by the English about 1634. From 1689 to 1834 the East India Company had a monopoly of the trade with that port. In 1841, during the first China War, Canton surrendered to Sir Hugh Gough, and the following year foreigners were granted permission to settle in the town. In 1856, after the affair of the lorcha Arrow, war was declared between England and China, and Canton was bombarded by the English. The bombardment led to an exciting debate in the House of Commons (beginning Feb. 26, 1857), in which men of all parties strongly condemned the action of Lord Palmerston's government, and a motion, proposed by Mr. Cobden and seconded by Mr. Milner Gibson, was carried against the ministry by a majority of 16. Canton was occupied by the English and French in Dec., 1857, and held, under English and French Commissioners, till October, 1861.

Canute (called Cnut in the English of his own day—a word that Pope Paschal II. could not pronounce, and therefore Latinised into Canūtus), King (b. circa 995, s. 1017, d. 1035), was the younger son of Swegen, or Sweyn, King of Denmark, and the first foreign conqueror of all England. His connection with England began in 1013, when, being still a lad in years, he accompanied his father on the great expedition that forced the English to take Sweyn as their king and drove Ethelred into exile. Young as he was, his father entrusted him with the command of the fleet and the care of the hostages when starting on his southward march from Gainsborough. But a few months later (Candlemas, 1014) Sweyn ended his days; and the Danish fleet, with one voice, chose Canute as his successor. By his father's death he became, for a time, a landless viking, a splendid adventurer; for the English at once restored their native king to the throne, and the Danish crown fell to Sweyn's elder son Harold. Caught unprepared by a sudden march of Ethelred, he sailed away from Lindsey, cut off the hands, ears, and noses of the hostages, put the wretches ashore at Sandwich, and went off to Denmark. Next year (1015) he was back again at Sandwich with a powerful fleet and army. Coasting round to Poole Bay, he landed his men, and in a few months was master of Wessex. The first days of 1016 saw him in Mercia also; his burnings and ravagings soon compelled submission; at Easter he was getting ready to lay siege to London, the only part of England that still defied his power. But at this moment the death of Ethelred, and the accession of his vigorous son Edmund to the command of the national cause, gave a new turn to the conflict. Inside London, Edmund was chosen king; outside, Canute; and a fierce and chequered struggle between the rivals began. Edmund rallied the men of Wessex to his standard; there were two Danish sieges of London, both unsuccessful; five minor battles, four of which are given as English victories, one as doubtful; and one last great battle, that of Assandun, in Essex (Ashington or Ashdon). This was a terrible, seemingly a crushing, overthrow of Edmund. But while this triumph assured Canute a kingdom in England, it failed to tear Wessex from the indomitable Edmund. At Olney, in the Severn, the rivals came together, and agreed on a division of the land between them which made the Thames the common boundary of their dominions. This compact had, however, but a brief trial. On St. Andrew's Day (Nov. 30) Edmund died; and in 1017 Canute was accepted as king of the whole kingdom (1017—1035). His reign was comparatively uneventful. He began it by dividing the realm into four earldoms, giving two of them to Danes, a third to Edric, the treacherous Englishman, and keeping Wessex under his own immediate rule. He put away his Danish wife and married Emma, King Ethelred's widow, a lady nearly double his age. He slew the one son of Ethelred who was within his reach, Edwy, and sent the two little sons of his dead antagonist to Norway, to be made away with there. He had three other Englishmen of high rank put to death, and soon took the same course with the traitor Edric. Next year (1018) he wrung from the country a payment of £83,000 to satisfy his fleet, the bulk of which thereupon carried his army back to Denmark. Having thus established his throne, he entered upon the line of conduct that has gained him the good word of modern historians, purposing henceforward to rule England for the English and by the English. One by one the leading men of Danish birth were removed from England or slain, and their places given to Englishmen. Thus the famous Godwin and renowned Leofric came to hold posts of the highest trust; indeed, after a little, Canute handed over to the former his own special care, the earldom of Wessex. He confirmed the laws of King Edgar, who had made no distinction between the Danish and purely English parts of his kingdom, treating all his subjects as members of the same body politic. He sought to gain the favour of the people by religious foundations, by gifts to monasteries and churches, by doing reverence to the saints and holy places they revered, by preferring the churchmen they honoured, and by many other gracious and politic acts. Though other countries demanded his care, he bestowed the largest share of his time and attention on England, making her interests his peculiar concern. We are told that he even placed English bishops in Danish sees, and brought English workmen to instruct his Danish subjects in their handicrafts. And in England itself he seems to have favoured Wessex most. Nor is this strange. It is true that he was supreme lord of many lands; Harold's death in 1019 gave him Denmark; Norway he conquered in 1028; in 1031 he invaded Scotland, and made King Malcolm admit his superiority; Sweden is also reckoned among his vassal kingdoms. But no one of these could in real worth compare with England; and of England, Wessex was the fairest portion. In 1027 he made a journey to Rome, and wrote from thence a letter to his English people, full of penitence for the past, good promises for the future, and lofty moral sentiment. He was in high esteem among foreign princes; his sister Edith married Robert, the Norman duke; his daughter Gunhild, King Henry III. of Germany. He died at Shaftesbury in November, 1035, perhaps still under forty years of age. Canute has been greatly praised by some modern historians. Dr. Stubbs reckons him among the "conscious creators of English greatness." Mr. Freeman's judgment of his policy and character is exceedingly favourable. Clearly his rule brought many blessings to England; under it she enjoyed long unbroken peace, a firm, yet humane, administration of the laws, and a comparative freedom from vexatious imposts and oppressions. In his later years he issued a body of laws which testify to his preservation, in full integrity, of the national constitution, to his regard for religion, to his strict impartiality, and respect for the people's rights. The quiet that settled down on the land may, perhaps, be explained in part by his institution of the Húscari, a permanent force of fighting-men, 3,000 or 6,000 in number, owing obedience to a military code—the earliest approach to a standing army in England. Not without reason did the common folk cherish his memory, if only by repeating simple tales of his sayings and doings.

Cape Breton, which lies to the east of Nova Scotia, and is now incorporated with it, was first discovered by Cabot in 1497, but remained practically uninhabited until 1714, when it was occupied by the French for fishing purposes; a few years later the town of Louisbourg was built, and the French established a regular settlement on the island, which formed a convenient basis for hostilities against Nova Scotia. In 1744, an attack was made upon Port Royal, the capital of Nova Scotia, by De Quesnay, the Governor of Cape Breton; the English, in retaliation, attacked and took Louisbourg, and held Cape Breton until the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. In 1758 Louisbourg was again taken by the English under the command of Admiral Boscawen and General Wolfe, and all its fortifications destroyed. A few years afterwards, Cape Breton was created a separate colony, and Sydney, its present capital, was founded in 1820. However, it was incorporated with Nova Scotia, and has ever since that time remained a county.

Capgrave, JOHN (b. 1393, d. 1464), was Prior of Lynn in Norfolk, and provincial of the order of Augustinian Friars in England. He wrote a Chronicle of England extending from the creation to the year 1417, and a work entitled The Book of the Illustrious Henries, which contains the lives of great men who have borne the name of Henry. Capgrave is one of our few contemporary authorities for the early part of the fifteenth century and reign of Henry VI., and his works are of some value. His Chronicle and Book of the Illustrious Henries have been edited, in the Rolls Series, by Mr. F. C. Hingeston.

Caradoc (CARACTACUS) (d. circa 54). A British chief, said to have been son of Cynobelin or Cymbeline. At the head of the Silurians of the West, Caradoc carried on a struggle of nine years against the Romans under Vespasian and Plautius. After sustaining frequent defeats, he was at length driven out of his own district and compelled to take refuge with the Brigantes, whose queen, Cartismandua (q.v.), delivered him up to Ostorius Scapula (A.D. 51). He was carried in chains to Rome, where his dignity and noble bearing are said to have induced the Emperor Claudius to order his release. His subsequent history is unknown.

Carausius (d. 293) was a native of Batavia, and the first "Comes Littoris Saxonici." In this office he managed to accumulate great wealth, and, in 286, with the aid of some Frankish warriors, seized the great naval station of Gesoriacum, and proclaimed himself one of the Emperors of Rome. His talents enabled him to keep this position and maintain his power in Britain till 293, when he was murdered by his own officer, Allectus.

Carberry Hill (near Musselburgh) is the place where the forces of Bothwell and Queen Mary met those of the Confederate Lords, June 14, 1567. There was no actual collision, but Bothwell, seeing that his chances of victory were almost hopeless, made his escape, while Mary surrendered herself to Kirkcaldy of Grange.

Cardmaker, JOHN, a notorious preacher of the Reformed doctrines, was burnt at Smithfield during the Marian persecution, May, 1555. He recanted when examined before Gardiner, but subsequently withdrew his recantation.

Cardwell, EDWARD, VISCOUNT (b. 1813), was educated at Winchester, and Balliol College, Oxford, where he was elected to a fellowship. He entered Parliament in 1842 as member for Clitheroe. He supported Sir R. Peel in the financial changes of 1845—46. He was Secretary to the Treasury from 1845—46, and President of the Board of Trade in Lord Aberdeen's administration. In 1859 he accepted the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland under Lord Palmerston, and was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster from 1861 to 1864, when he became Secretary of State for the Colonies. In Dec., 1868, he became Secretary for War under Mr. Gladstone, and a member of the Committee of Council on Education. In his former capacity his name is associated with the abolition of purchase in the army. In 1874 he resigned with his colleagues, and was raised to the peerage.

Carénage Bay, in St. Lucia, is famous as having been, in 1778, the scene of a severe conflict between the French, under the Count d'Estaing, and the British, under Admiral Barrington and General Meadows. The French were completely defeated.

Carew, SIR GEORGE (d. 1613?), was secretary to Sir Christopher Hatton and a distinguished diplomatist, being sent by Elizabeth as her ambassador to Poland, 1597, and by James I. to France, 1605—9. He was the author of A Relation of the State of France, printed by Dr. Bird in 1749.

Carew, SIR NICHOLAS (d. 1539), was a courtier and favourite of Henry VIII., who made him a Knight of the Garter. He was executed March 3, 1539, for the offence of having held conversations with the Marquis of Exeter about "a change in the world," which was supposed to imply a design of setting Cardinal Pole on the throne in place of the king. Bletchingley Park, in Surrey, one of his forfeited possessions, was subsequently granted to Anne of Cleves, as a portion of her separation allowance.

Carew, SIR PETER (d. 1575), of Mohun Ottery, in Devonshire, spent his boyhood at the court of France, and on his return to England entered the service of Henry VIII. On the outbreak of the Western rebellion, in 1549, Sir Peter and his brother were sent down to Devonshire with orders to crush the insurgents; they were, however, unable to make head against them until the arrival of reinforcements under Lord Russell and Lord Grey; in fact, the violence of the Carew party was said by Somerset to have widely extended the rebellion. After the defeat of the insurgents, Carew espoused the cause of Mary, whom he proclaimed in Devonshire, 1553. Very soon afterwards, however, he joined the anti-Spanish party, and was entrusted with the task of raising Devonshire, while Sir Thomas Wyatt was to raise Kent. His action, however, in the rebellion of 1549 had made him so unpopular with the country people that he was unable to do anything effectual against the government, and was compelled to seek an asylum in France for the remainder of Mary's reign. In 1560, Carew was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate the Treaty of Leith (q.v.), and in the same year was entrusted with a mission to reorganise the army in Scotland. A few years later Sir Peter became one of the colonists of Munster, where many cruelties are attributed to him. He joined the expedition of Essex in 1575, but died the same year.

Carew's Life, by John Vowel, was edited by Mr. Maclean, Lond., 1857.

Cargill, DONALD, one of the most extreme of the Covenanted clergy, was a chief promoter of the Sanquhar Declaration, 1680. For having excommunicated Charles II. and the Duke of York, he was, on his capture at Glasgow, taken to Edinburgh and executed, July 26, 1681. [CAMERONIANS.]

Carleton, SIR DUDLEY. [DORCHESTER, LORD.]

Carleton, GUY. [DORCHESTER, LORD.]

Carleton, HENRY BOYLE, 1ST BARON (d. 1725), was a leading Whig politician. In 1701 he was created Lord Chancellor and Under Treasurer of the Exchequer. He was one of those who opposed the "tacking" of the Occasional Conformity Bill. He was employed by Godolphin to request Addison to write a poem on the battle of Blenheim; the result of his negotiations being The Campaign. In 1707 he was made Secretary of State. He was one of the managers of Sacheverell's trial, and in consequence of that ill-advised step was compelled to resign his office. On the accession of George I., Boyle was raised to the peerage, and created Lord President of the Council, an office he held until his death. "He was," says Budgell, "endowed with great prudence and winning address; his long experience in public affairs gave him a thorough knowledge of business."

Budgell's Lives of the Boyles.

Carlisle was probably a Roman station, and has been identified with Luguvalium in the Itinerary of Antoninus, from which, indeed, the name has been derived—Caer-Luel. The town was sacked by the Danes in 875, and rebuilt with a strong castle by William Rufus. It was held by the Scots during their tenure of Cumberland, and the beginning of the great church of St. Mary's is attributed to David I., King of Scotland. Subsequently it was frequently besieged in the course of the border wars, one of the most celebrated sieges being the unsuccessful one by William the Lion (1173). The place surrendered to Charles Edward in 1745, and the mayor and corporation proclaimed him king. The cathedral, begun in the reign of William Rufus, was partly destroyed by Cromwell in 1648.

Carlisle, GEORGE WILLIAM, 7TH EARL OF (b. 1802, d. 1864), was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In 1826 he accompanied his uncle, the Duke of Devonshire, on his visit to Russia at the coronation of the Emperor Nicholas. He was afterwards returned to the House of Commons for the family seat of Morpeth, and one of his earliest speeches was in defence of the character of the Russian emperor. During the agitation of the Reform Bill he enlisted on the side of Earl Grey, and on the dissolution of Parliament which followed the success of General Gascoyne's motion, he was returned for Yorkshire, which seat he held till the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832. He was Chief Secretary for Ireland from 1835 to 1841, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster from 1849 to 1851. In 1855 he became Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and began a career of popularity almost without parallel among Irish viceroys. A change in the government removed him for a short time; but he returned again in 1859, and held this office till the summer of 1864, when illness compelled him to lay it down.

Carlisle, LUCY, COUNTESS OF (b. 1600, d. 1660), was the daughter of Henry Percy, ninth Earl of Northumberland. In 1617 she was married to the Earl of Carlisle, who died in 1636. She was a favourite attendant of Queen Henrietta Maria, and is supposed to have been Strafford's mistress. After his death she became the confidante, and it was said the mistress, of Pym, to whom she betrayed all the secrets of the court, and it was by her that he was made acquainted with the king's desire to arrest the Five Members in January, 1642. In 1648 she seems to have assisted the Royalists with money towards raising a fleet to attack England, and on the Restoration she was received at court, and employed herself in intriguing for the return of Queen Henrietta to England, which was opposed by Clarendon and others. Very soon after the queen's return she died suddenly.

Carlisle, THE STATUTE OF (1307), passed by Edward I. in Parliament, after he had previously obtained the consent of the barons to it in 1305, was intended to prevent the drain of English gold to Rome by clerical exactions. It forbade the payment of tallages on monastic property, and rendered illegal other imposts by which money was to be sent out of the country. Though never acted upon, this statute is most important as the precedent on which the Acts of Provisors and Premunire and the whole series of anti-papal assertions of the independence of English nationality were based.

Statutes of the Realm, i. 150.

Carlow, the seat of one of the great castles founded by the Norman conquerors of Ireland, was often taken and re-taken in the rebellion of 1641. In July, 1650, it was occupied by the Royalists, and after a short siege taken by the Parliamentarians, under Sir Hardress Waller. In May 25, 1798, a skirmish took place between the royal troops and the rebels, in which 400 of the latter were killed.

Carnarvon, HENRY HOWARD MOLYNEUX HERBERT, 4TH EARL OF (b. 1831), was Under Secretary of State for the Colonies in Lord Derby's second administration, 1858-9, and Secretary of State for the Colonies in Lord Derby's third administration, 1866. He, however, resigned on account of a difference of opinion respecting Parliamentary Reform, in 1867. On the formation of Mr. Disraeli's cabinet in 1874, he was appointed for the second time Secretary of State for the Colonies. In 1878 he resigned, on account of a difference with his colleagues with regard to the Eastern question.

Carnatic was the name formerly given to the district in south-eastern India extending along the coast from the Guntoor Circar to Cape Comorin, now included in the Presidency of Madras. In the middle of the eighteenth century the country was governed by the Nabob of the Carnatic at Arcot. It was cut up, however, in the south by the Marhatta kingdom of Tanjore, the British and French settlements, and the almost independent districts of the Polygars of Madura, Tinnevely, &c. It was feudally subject to the Viceroy, or Nizam, of the Deccan. In 1743 Anwar-ud-Deen was appointed Nabob by the Nizam-ul-Mulk. On his death, the succession was disputed between Chunda Sahib, who was assisted by the French, and Mohammed Ali, who was supported by the English. The latter succeeded in establishing their nominee as Nabob over the greater part of the Carnatic; but both he and his son, Omdut-ul-Omrah, who succeeded in 1795, failed to raise themselves from a position of dependence on the English. The discovery of their correspondence with Tippoo Sahib (q.v.) determined Lord Wellesley on annexing the country, under the conviction that the alliance treaties had thereby been broken. On the death of Omdut-ul-Omrah, therefore, an arrangement was made (1801) with Azim-ul-Omrah, his nephew, to the effect that the entire civil and military government of the state should be resigned to the Company, and one-fifth of the revenue should be reserved for his support. On his death, in 1825, the title was continued to his infant son, and on the death of the latter, childless, in 1853, the title was extinguished.

Carne, SIR EDWARD (d. 1561), was a graduate of Oxford, where he became Doctor of Civil Law in 1524. He was frequently employed as envoy to various foreign princes by Henry VIII. In 1530 he was sent by the king to Rome to argue against the citation of Henry to appear at the Papal Court. He frequently represented the English sovereign at Rome under Mary, and in the earlier years of Elizabeth's reign; but was finally detained by Paul IV. at Rome, and compelled to become governor of the English Hospital there. This was declared to be a gross violation of the privilege of an ambassador; but it is probable that Sir Edward, who disliked the religious changes of Elizabeth, was a willing captive.

Caroline, QUEEN (b. 1682, d. 1737), wife of King George II., was the daughter of John Frederick, Margrave of Brandenburg-Anspach. In the year 1705 she married Prince George of Hanover, over whom, in spite of his immorality, she maintained the greatest influence during his life. During the quarrels of her husband and his father, she retained her influence over the first without forfeiting the esteem of the second. In 1727 she was crowned with her husband. When Walpole was displaced from power, at the commencement of the reign, she espoused his cause, being persuaded of his financial abilities, and attracted by the jointure of £100,000 a year he secured in her favour. She therefore persuaded the king that Compton was unfitted for the post of minister. During her life she continued the firm friend of Walpole, and upheld his policy of peace at home and abroad. She was deeply mortified when he was obliged to relinquish his Excise scheme. In 1737 she reprieved Porteous, who was condemned for firing on the crowd at Edinburgh. On the outbreak of the quarrel between Frederick, Prince of Wales, and her husband, she violently espoused the cause of the latter. In consequence, she and her son were on extremely bad terms, and the queen often expressed a wish for the prince's death. Her influence over the king continued unimpaired till the end of her life, and on her death-bed the monarch gave a rather curious testimony of it. The dying queen besought her husband to marry again. "Non," answered the sobbing prince, "j'aurai des maitresses." "Oh, mon Dieu!" was the reply; "cela n'empêche pas." Caroline was a woman of considerable intellectual ability. She knew something of philosophy and theology, and affected the character of patroness of literature and poetry. She took creditable pains to get the higher posts in the Church filled by men of learning and character. She was a valuable ally of Walpole, and materially assisted him in carrying out his policy.

The best account of the queen is gained from Hervey's Memoirs. See also Horace Walpole, Memoirs, and Stanhope, Hist. of Eng.

Caroline of Brunswick, QUEEN, wife of George IV. (b. 1768, d. 1821), was the daughter of Duke Charles William Frederick of Brunswick, who died after the battles of Jena and Auerstadt, 1806, and sister of Duke William Frederick, who was killed at the battle of Ligny, 1815. Her mother, Augusta, was daughter of Prince Frederick of Wales, and sister of George III. At the age of twenty-seven the princess was married to George, Prince of Wales, afterwards Regent and king. A more unfortunate choice could not have been made. The prince was already married to Mrs. FitzHerbert, and although that marriage was considered void under the Royal Marriage Act, he was averse to contracting any other similar tie. The princess had been badly brought up, was clever, but uneducated and undisciplined, impulsive and indiscreet, with a good heart, but devoid of regulating judgment. The marriage took place on April 8, 1795. A daughter, afterwards Princess Charlotte of Wales, was born on January 7, 1796. Even before this the prince had treated his wife so badly as to call forth a remonstrance from his father. He now wrote, on April 30, 1796, to say that they were to live apart. This repudiation of his wife without any reason except personal dislike, within a year of their marriage, is sufficient to account for, and almost to excuse, any conduct of which she might afterwards have been guilty. Matters remained thus for the next ten years. The princess lived quietly at Blackheath. In the year 1806 rumours were set afloat that the conduct of the princess had been improper. She always had a fancy for children, and before her death had adopted half-a-dozen. At this time she had adopted a child named William Austin, and scandal said she was his mother. A delicate investigation was ordered, evidence was laboriously collected, and a report laid before the king. The report acquitted the princess of improper conduct, but seemed to fix upon the charge of indiscretion. Assisted by Perceval and others, she vigorously defended herself, and was entirely acquitted by a Minute of Council in 1807. Princess Charlotte of Wales was heir to the crown. As a child she had been allowed to see her mother regularly, but as she was growing up, the permission began to be refused. Canning and Brougham took the side of the Princess of Wales. She had the whole force of popular opinion with her, for the prince was very much disliked, and the wrongs of the princess were calculated to touch the heart of the multitude. The queen took a strong dislike to her, and about 1813 she was forbidden to attend the royal drawing-room. In June, 1814, she went abroad, with an allowance of £35,000 a year. She went first to Brunswick, and then to Switzerland and Italy. Her conduct was very eccentric, and her suite gradually left her, upon which she fell into the hands of an Italian family named Bergami. She went to Jerusalem, and then returned to Italy, living at the Villa d'Este, on the Lake of Como. On January 29, 1820, George IV. succeeded to the throne, and his wife assumed the title of queen. Before this a commission had been sent out to Milan to collect evidence of the queen's conduct during her sojourn at the Villa d'Este. The king ordered her name to be omitted from the Liturgy, and forbade royal honours to be paid her at foreign courts. The queen, finding herself thus treated at Rome, determined to come to England. She was received with great enthusiasm in London. Immediately after her arrival steps for commencing her trial were taken in the House of Commons. On November 6 the Bill was passed by a majority of twenty-six, and on the third reading it was passed only by a majority of nine, when it was withdrawn. This result was received with general delight throughout the country. On November 29 the queen went in procession to St. Paul's, to return thanks for her deliverance from a great peril and affliction. In the next session of Parliament she accepted a pension of £50,000 a year from the government, and from that time her popularity gradually declined. In 1821 George IV. determined to be crowned with great pomp in Westminster Hall. The queen claimed, according to ancient precedent, to share the ceremony with him. At an early hour on the day of the coronation the queen set out with a coach and six. She had no ticket of admittance, and was repulsed by the officials. As she retreated the jeers of the crowd followed her. This was on July 19, and she died on August 7. However much she may have been deficient in moral dignity, we may feel convinced that there was no foundation for the grave charges brought against her character; and that for the lighter indiscretions of her life, her education and the treatment of her husband are quite sufficient both to account and to atone.

Carstares, WILLIAM (b. 1649, d. 1715), was educated at Utrecht, where he became acquainted with William III. He was accused of being implicated in the Rye House Plot and was tortured at Edinburgh. After the Revolution, he acquired great influence with William, to whom he acted as a sort of unofficial secretary for Scotch affairs. The king appointed Carstares his chaplain in Scotland. In 1704 he became Principal of Edinburgh University, and was one of the active supporters of the Union. "Sprung of that respectable middle class," says Mr. Burton, "to whom it has been in a manner the peculiar pride of the Scots priesthood to belong, he rose to hold in his hands the destinies of the proudest heads of the proud feudal houses of Scotland." Carstares was a man of undoubted ability, and is honourably distinguished among the public men of his age by his firmness and honesty. A volume of Carstares's State Papers and Letters was published in 1774, and is of considerable value as illustrating Scottish affairs during the Revolution.

Carte, THOMAS (b. 1686, d. 1754), born at Clifton, studied at Oxford, and entered the Church. He was a strong partisan of the Stuarts. He declined to take the oath to George I., and abandoned the priesthood; and, being suspected of complicity in the Jacobite plots of 1715 and 1722, he was obliged to flee to France, where he resided for twelve years. He was the author of a Life of James, Duke of Ormonde, 3 vols. folio; and a History of England to the year 1654. Both are valuable works, showing much learning and industry on the part of the author, though the strong Stuart partisanship of the writer is very marked, especially in the life of Ormonde.

Carteret, LORD. [GRANVILLE, JOHN CARTERET, EARL.]

Carthusians, THE, one of the regular monastic orders, was an offshoot of the Benedictines. The order was instituted at Chartreuse, by Bruno of Cologne, in 1080. The rule resembled that of the Benedictines, but was much more rigorous and austere. The Carthusians came into England about 1180; but they failed to make much way in the country. There were only nine monasteries of the order in England: the Charterhouse (the name, of course, is a corruption for Chartreuse) in London, and those at Witham, Henton, Beauval, St. Anne's Coventry, Kingston-on-Hull, Mountgrace, Eppworth, and Shene. There were no Carthusian nunneries in England.

Cartismandua was the Queen of the Brigantes, from whom Caractacus, after his defeat by the Romans (A.D. 51), sought shelter and assistance, and by whom he was treacherously betrayed to his enemies. [CARADOC.] According to Tacitus, Cartismandua quitted her husband, Venusius, and married his armour-bearer, Velloctatus. Venusius drove her from her territories, and forced her to seek an asylum in the camp of the Romans, who marched into the district and took possession of it.

Cartwright, THOMAS (b. 1535, d. 1603), the leader of the Church of England party in Elizabeth's reign which advocated the abolition of episcopacy, was educated at Cambridge, whence he was compelled to withdraw during the Marian persecution. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned, and acquired great reputation as a preacher, becoming so active a supporter of a Presbyterian polity, and so determined an opponent of episcopacy that he was prohibited from occupying the pulpit, and expelled from the university. In 1572 he published his Admonition to Parliament (q.v.), and was drawn into a long controversy with Archbishop Whitgift. In 1584 he was imprisoned by order of Bishop Aylmer, but released by the queen. In 1590, after the death of his patron, Leicester, Cartwright was examined by the Court of Star Chamber, and sent to the Fleet Prison, "for setting up a new discipline and a new form of worship," remaining in confinement for nearly two years.

Hook, Lives of the Archbishops.

Carucage was a tax on every carucate or hundred acres of land, and was first imposed over the whole country by Richard I. in 1198, when the tax was five shillings. John, in the first year of his reign, fixed it at three shillings. A carucate was originally as much land as could be ploughed by one team in a season, but it afterwards became fixed at one hundred acres.

Cashel, THE SYNOD OF (1172), was a great assembly of the Irish Church, attended by all the archbishops and bishops. The ecclesiastical disorders, which had formed one at least of the causes which led to the Bull of Pope Adrian, and the invasion of Ireland by Henry II., were condemned. Thus the marriage of the clergy was forbidden, the tithe introduced, the appropriation of benefices by laymen, and levying of cashery on the clergy abolished. In other ways, too, the Roman discipline and the authority of the Pope were recognised.

Casket Letters are a celebrated collection of documents, supposed to be the correspondence between Bothwell and Mary Stuart. Bothwell left in Edinburgh Castle a casket containing some papers, for which he sent after his flight from Carberry Hill. His messenger was intercepted whilst returning, and the casket and its contents fell into the hands of the Earl of Morton. On a letter from the queen to Bothwell contained in it, the charge that she was an accomplice in Darnley's murder was founded. The letters were laid before the Scotch Council of Government, and the Scotch Parliament adjudged the charge proved (Dec. 1567). They were again produced before the English Commissioners at Westminster, compared with some other writings of the queen's, and accepted as genuine (Oct., 1568). The letters descended from one Scottish regent to another, and finally passed into the hands of the Earl of Gowrie. After his execution (1584) they disappeared. They had, however, been translated into different languages and published. Mary continually asserted them to be forgeries, and demanded first to see the originals, then to be provided with copies. Neither of these requests was granted. An argument in favour of the theory that the letters were forgeries is furnished by the fact that the two most criminatory letters were evidently originally written in Scotch, and the copies published were a translation of this Scotch original into French. But Mary, until after her flight into England, always used the French language in her letters. Therefore the conclusion is that she could not have written these letters. But the question of the genuineness of non-existent documents is naturally difficult to solve. Amongst English historians, Froude, Burton, and Laing believe the letters genuine; Caird and Hosack take the opposite view. Of foreign writers on the subject, Ranke, Pauli, Mignet, and Gaedeko accept the letters, whilst Schiern, Philippson, Gauthier, and Chantelauze, deny their authenticity.

Cassivellaunus (CASWALLON), at the time of Cæsar's second invasion of Britain (B.C. 54), was chief of the Cassi, and had shortly before usurped the sovereignty of the Trinobantes and murdered the lawful king. The Roman invasion drove the tribes of the south-east of Britain to form a league, at the head of which Cassivellaunus was placed. For a short time he succeeded in repelling the Romans, but his stronghold being captured, and the other tribes having deserted him, he submitted to Cæsar, gave up the country of the Trinobantes to Mandubratius, son of the late king, and contented himself with keeping his own domains. After the departure of Cæsar we hear nothing more of Cassivellaunus.

Castillon, THE BATTLE OF (1453), was the last engagement in the Hundred Years' War between England and France. In 1452 the Gascons rose against the French, and besought aid from England. Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, was sent out, and was at first very successful. In June, 1453, hearing that the French were besieging Castillon, a fortress on the Dordogne, he marched with a small force to relieve it, but the French were stronger than he imagined, and he was defeated and slain. With his death all the hopes of the English were at an end.

Castlebar Races (1798). The name given to the engagement fought near Castlebar on August 26, 1798, during the French raid on Ireland. Generals Lake and Hutchinson, with 2,000 Irish militia, a large body of yeomanry, and Lord Roden's fencibles, advanced against General Humbert, who had landed at Killala on the 17th of the month. Humbert had with him 800 French troops, and about 1,000 of the Irish rebels. The militia, however, would not stand their ground, and at once ran; and the yeomanry following, Lake's guns were taken, and Roden's horse were unable to save the day. Of Lake's men fifty-three were killed and thirty-four wounded; the French loss was heavier, but they took fourteen guns and 200 prisoners, and the town of Castlebar fell into the hands of the insurgents, with whom it remained for about a fortnight, till the surrender of Humbert at Ballinamuck, on September 8th.

Castlereagh, VISCOUNT. [LONDON-DERRY.]

Castles, of which there are remains of nearly 500 in England alone, belong chiefly to the period between the Norman Conquest and the middle of the fourteenth century. It is true that strong places were fortified by Alfred and his successors; but these would rarely be more than a mound and a ditch, with wooden tower and palisade; and Domesday, which mentions forty-nine castles, gives only one stone castle, viz., Arundel, as existing under the Conqueror. They were a Norman product, even when, as at Hereford and Warwick, strong earthworks in place of masonry show that the Norman builder used an existing English fortress. They are identical in type with the great castles of Normandy, and keep pace with them in development. Thus the essential point of the Norman castle is the massive rectangular keep, with walls as much as 20 feet thick, and, as at Rochester, over 100 feet high, with its stairs, chapel, chambers, kitchen, well—making it complete in itself as a last resort. The base court in the castles built immediately after the Norman Conquest (e.g., Oxford, London, Newcastle) was for some years left to the protection of a stockade. When this was replaced by circuit walls, with a strong gatehouse, we have complete the Norman system of fortification by solid works of great passive strength. The "Edwardian" castle (e.g., Carnarvon) exhibits a system, which completely superseded this, of concentric works, with skilful arrangement of parts, so as to include a far larger area. Such a castle as Bamborough could accommodate a large garrison with stores, horses, and cattle, and could be stormed only in detail. The duke in Normandy had exercised the right of holding a garrison in the castles of his barons, and the Norman kings of England jealously maintained the requirement of a royal licence for their erection. Of the forty-nine in Domesday, thirty were built by the Conqueror himself. In the anarchy of Stephen's days, 375 were built, or, according to Ralph de Diceto, 1,115. Henry II., on his accession, had to besiege and recover for the crown the "adulterine" castles; and after the revolt of 1173 it became a definite policy of the crown to keep down their numbers, and have a voice in the appointment of castellans. One of the first steps of the barons of 1258 was to substitute nineteen of themselves for the alien favourites as guardians of the royal castles, and the last stand of the defeated party was made in De Montfort's castle of Kenilworth from Oct., 1265, to Dec., 1266. After this the castles ceased to be a menace to royal power. The Edwardian castles were chiefly national defences on the coast or the Welsh and Scotch Marches. The number of licences to "crenellate and tenellate" rises to its height in the reigns of Edward II. and Edward III.; the Commons in 1371 even petition that leave to do this may be given freely for all men's houses and for the walls of boroughs. But these were castellated mansions rather than true castles. In them the keep sinks to a guardhouse, the walls are less solid, the windows are adapted to convenience rather than defence. However, under the Stuarts such fortified mansions proved capable of standing a siege. But the last castles are not later than Tudor times, and even the "Peel" towers, for defence against the Scots, fall into ruin after the union of the kingdoms. The castles had been a heavy cost and trouble to the crown. Bridgnorth alone had cost in repairs £213 during Henry II.'s reign; the Constable of Bridgnorth besides was paid 40 marks salary; and the jurors of 1258 declared it required £20 a year to keep it up in time of peace. The tenure of castle guard, at the rate of forty days' service for a knight's fee, commuted often for a mark on the fee, was a burden vexatious both to nobles and gentry. Some castles, like Lancaster and Richmond, were associated with a quasi-royal jurisdiction over the district. In others the lords would be only too ready to arrogate such rights. Many, no doubt, like Bridgnorth, served as centres of tyranny, even when in royal hands. And this tendency probably accounts for the frequent changes made by the crown in the persons chosen as royal constables, and for the fact that Edward I. finds it necessary, even after Henry II.'s determined assertion of royal rights, to make the Quo Warranto inquiry into the jurisdictions claimed by each of his barons.

It is only by closely tracing the local history of some one great castle that the justice can be realised of Matthew Paris's description of them as "nests of devils and dens of thieves," or the bitter words of the contemporary English monk of Peterborough on the castles of Stephen's reign:—"They filled the land full of castles, and when they were finished, filled them with devils and evil men; . . . then they tortured men and women for their gold and silver; . . . then plundered they and burned all the towns; . . . they spared neither church nor churchyard; . . . they robbed the monks and the clergy; . . . the earth bare no corn; the land was all ruined by such deeds; and it was said openly that Christ slept and His saints." The castles of England, on many sides illustrate the national history. Berkeley has its story of royal tragedy, Kenilworth of constitutional struggle, Carlisle of border romance. The names of Montgomery and Balliol and Granville recall the baronial families who brought into England the titles of their Norman castles. And the immense households which the later spirit of chivalry gathered together into Alnwick, or Lancaster, or Warwick made the castle of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries a local centre of vast social influence, even when the days of its military and constitutional domination had passed away.

Cateau Cambresis, THE TREATY OF (April 2, 1559), was concluded between France, Spain, and England after the accession of Elizabeth. The chief difficulty in bringing about the peace had been the question of Calais, which the French were determined to keep. Finally it was arranged that the French should keep the town for eight years, and then restore it. The French gave up their claims on Milan and Naples; they also agreed to evacuate and raze the fortresses they had built on the Scottish border, and to give substantial bonds for the restitution of Calais. The Dauphin and Dauphiness were to confirm the treaty, and to agree to recognise Elizabeth's right to the English crown.

The treaty is given in Rymer, Fœdera, xv. 505.

Catesby, WILLIAM (d. 1488), one of Richard III.'s ministers, was Speaker of the House of Commons in 1484, and seems to have owed his rise to Lord Hastings, of whom he was at first a close follower, though he afterwards deserted his cause when Hastings fell under the displeasure of

Richard. He was taken at the battle of Bosworth and put to death by the orders of Henry VII. The three principal advisers of Richard III.—Catesby, Sir Richard Ratcliff, and Lord Lovel, are held up to opprobrium with him in the well-known contemporary rhyme:—

"The Cat, the Rat, and Lovel the Dog, Rule all England under the Hog."

Cathedral is properly the chief church of the diocese, in which the bishop's seat was established. The ecclesiastical organisation on the Continent generally followed the lines of the political organisation of the Roman Empire. The province usually became the diocese, and the church of the provincial capital became the seat of the bishop. In England, however, Christianity was largely brought by missionaries, who lived together under monastic rules. Hence, among others, many of the English cathedrals—e.g., Worcester—were originally monastery churches, over which a bishop was set. In other cases the bishop was set over a district, and chose his own cathedral church. Hence the bishops' seats were frequently changed, till after the Norman Conquest they were ordered to be fixed in cities and walled towns. Thus, among others, the older cathedrals of Sherborne, Selsey, and Dorchester gave place to those of Salisbury, Chichester, and Lincoln. [BISHOPRIC.] English cathedrals were of two classes, according to their origin. The clergy attached to them were in some cases monks, in others secular canons. In the first case the bishop reckoned as abbot of the monastery, in the second case he was the head of his chapter. In both cases, however, the secular and official duties of the bishop tended to sever him from his cathedral, and the chapter took possession of it. The dean became more powerful than the absent bishop, who was gradually driven from his own church, and retained little save a visitatorial power over his chapter. The annals of most mediæval episcopates are full of the quarrels between the bishop and the monks or chapter, leading to constant appeals to Rome and a diminution of the episcopal authority. In the reign of Henry VIII., after the suppression of the monasteries, the monastic cathedrals were re-modelled. These "cathedrals of the new foundation" are Canterbury, Carlisle, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Rochester, Winchester, and Worcester. The bishoprics founded by Henry VIII.—Bristol, Chester, Gloucester, Oxford, Peterborough, and Westminster—were provided with cathedrals after the same model. Westminster, though it lost its bishop, has retained its dean and its position as a cathedral church. In recent times new bishoprics have been founded, and the bishop's seat established in old collegiate and parish churches, which have been turned into cathedrals at Manchester, Ripon, Liverpool, St. Albans, and Newcastle. Catherine of Aragon, QUEEN, first wife of Henry VIII. (b. 1485, d. 1536), was the youngest of the four daughters of Ferdinand, King of Aragon, and Isabella, Queen of Castile. The foreign policy of Henry VII. was based on a renewal and development of the traditional mediæval alliance between England and the Spanish kingdoms. Hence, as early as 1492 a treaty was made between the two monarchs to cement their friendship by intermarriage. In 1498, Arthur, the eldest son of Henry VII., was contracted to Catherine by proxy, and in 1501, when Arthur was fifteen years old, Catherine was sent to England. The marriage was then celebrated in St. Paul's Cathedral; but four months afterwards Arthur died. It was agreed that Catherine should be married to Henry, Arthur's younger brother. A papal dispensation was obtained to legalise such a marriage, and a contract of marriage was made. When Henry VIII. ascended the throne, in 1509, his first act was to marry Catherine. He was then eighteen years old, and she was twenty-four. Catherine was not handsome, but she was lively, of an amiable disposition, well-informed, and devoted to her husband. Her married life was at first happy. But of her three sons and two daughters, all died in infancy except Mary. She ceased to bear children, and showed the effects of advancing years much more than did Henry VIII. She had lost Henry's affections, but still retained his esteem, when Anne Boleyn appeared upon the scene. With the growth of the king's attachment to Anne scruples about the validity of his marriage with Catherine arose in his mind. In 1527 these scruples went so far that he consulted with Cardinal Wolsey how to obtain a divorce. Throughout the complicated negotiations for that purpose Catherine, alone and friendless as she was, preserved a firm and dignified attitude. She was submissive to Henry's will on all small points, but refused to make any admissions which might facilitate a divorce. She stood upon the justice of her cause, and, though Wolsey and the papal nuncio, Campeggio, plied her in every way, she remained firm. On June 1, 1529, she and the king appeared before the legate at Windsor. Catherine refused to admit the jurisdiction of the court, saying she had appealed to Rome. The Pope, Clement VII., being in the power of the Emperor Charles V., who was Catherine's nephew, was driven to receive the appeal and avowed the case to Rome. Wolsey had failed, and his disgrace followed. Still Henry patiently pursued his object of obtaining a divorce from Rome; as this became more improbable, he attempted to intimidate the Pope. In 1531 Catherine was ordered to leave Windsor; she retired to Ampthill, and was no longer treated as queen. She still remained firm in her position that she was the king's wife by lawful marriage, and would so abide till the court of Rome shall have made thereof an end." But Henry VIII. made an end his own way. On March 30, 1533, Cranmer was made Archbishop of Canterbury. He cited Catherine to appear before him at Dunstable. Catherine paid no heed to his citation, and was pronounced contumacious. On May 23 Cranmer gave his decision that the marriage was null and void from the beginning, as contracted in defiance of the Divine prohibition. From this time Catherine was styled in England the Dowager Princess of Wales. At Easter, 1534, Pope Clement VII. pronounced Henry's marriage with Catherine to be lawful, and ordered the king to take back his legitimate wife. Henry VIII. replied by an Act of Parliament declaring the marriage unlawful, and making it treason to question the lawfulness of his marriage with Anne Boleyn. Catherine lived in retirement in one of the royal manors. Henry VIII. did not cease to endeavour to procure from her submission to his will, but she constantly asserted the lawfulness of her marriage. She died at Kimbolton in January, 1538, and on her deathbed wrote Henry a letter assuring him of her forgiveness, and commending to his care their daughter Mary. By Henry's orders she was buried with becoming pomp in the abbey church of Peterborough, which was soon after erected into a cathedral.

Catherine of Braganza, QUEEN, wife of Charles II. (b. 1638, d. 1705), was the daughter of John, King of Portugal. She was married to Charles II. in 1662. Her married life seems not to have been happy, owing to her husband's infidelities and the harshness and neglect with which he treated her. She mixed very little in politics, and, though a sincere Roman Catholic, never made any real attempts to get Romanism re-established in England. Notwithstanding this, she was accused by Titus Oates of plotting against the king's life, but the informer's equivocations were detected by Charles, and the charge was dropped. After her husband's death she lived quietly in England till 1692, when she returned to her native country, where she spent the rest of her life.

Catherine of France, QUEEN, wife of Henry V. (b. 1401, d. 1438), was the daughter of Charles VI. In 1420 she was married to Henry V., in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Troyes. By him she had only one son, Henry VI. In 1423 she took for her second husband Owen Tudor, a Welsh gentleman attached to the court, "the smallness of whose estate was recompensed by the delicacy of his person, being every way a very compleat gentleman." By him she had three sons, the eldest of whom, Edmund Tudor, was the father of Henry VII. [TUDORS.]

Catherine Howard, QUEEN, fifth wife of Henry VIII. (b. ? 1522, d. 1542), was the daughter of Lord Edmund Howard, the son of the Duke of Norfolk. Educated under the care of the Dowager Duchess of Norfolk, she early developed a taste for levity and frivolity. Henry VIII. was captivated by her beauty and vivacity, and married her, July 28, 1540. But the levity which had marked her before her marriage continued afterwards, and there can be little doubt that she was guilty of improper conduct with at least one of her former lovers, Derham. In Nov., 1541, she was charged with adultery, and sent to the Tower. On Dec. 10 two of her paramours, Derham and Culpepper, were beheaded. In 1542 a Bill of Attainder against her was passed; and on Feb. 12 following she was executed. Immediately afterwards a bill was passed making it high treason for any woman whom the king married or sought in marriage to conceal any questionable circumstances in her past life.

Strickland, Queens of England.

Catherine Parr, QUEEN, sixth wife of Henry VIII. (b. 1513, d. 1548), daughter of Sir Thomas Parr, was connected by birth with the Nevilles and other great families. She was carefully educated, and married, at an unusually early age, to Edward, Lord Borough, who left her a widow, and in her sixteenth year she was married, for the second time, to John Neville, Lord Latimer, with whom she lived happily for several years. During this period she became greatly attached to the doctrines of the Reformers. Lord Latimer died in 1542, and Catherine was besieged by many suitors. She was beautiful, and famed for her accomplishments, and her husband's death had left her in possession of one of the finest properties in the kingdom. The most favoured of her suitors was Sir Thomas Seymour, who, however, prudently withdrew his pretensions when the king cast his eyes upon the lady. In July, 1543, she was married to Henry, and this, unlike the king's previous matrimonial alliances, excited no dissatisfaction among any class of his subjects. In the very difficult position of queen she acted with great prudence. She ministered to the growing bodily infirmities of the king, and endeared herself to his children. But there is no doubt that she was a sincere and, as far as prudence allowed her, an active supporter of the Reformers. In spite of her great caution, Henry conceived a mistrust of her theological learning, and was prevailed upon by Bishop Gardiner to sign articles of impeachment against her, and to order her arrest; but Catherine's skilful management succeeded in averting the danger. It is probable, however, that Henry was meditating a fresh charge of treason against her when he was overtaken by death. Almost immediately after this event Catherine married her former suitor, Sir Thomas Seymour of Sudeley, the Lord High Admiral. Her husband, however, neglected her, and had obviously fixed his affections on the Princess Elizabeth. The union was unhappy, and in August, 1548, she died in childbirth. From some words spoken by Catherine during her last illness, it has been supposed that Seymour poisoned her; but there is no evidence to confirm the suspicion. Catherine was the author of a volume of Prayers and Meditations, and a tract called, The Lamentations of a Sinner, which is written with a good deal of vigour, and in parts with some genuine eloquence.

Catholic Association, THE, was founded by Daniel O'Connell in 1823. It embraced all classes, and was really representative in character, though not nominally so. It received petitions, appointed committees, ordered a census of the Catholic population, and collected the Catholic Rent. This was a subscription raised all over Ireland by means of officers called Wardens, appointed by the Association. O'Connell managed all the money that came in, without accounting for it to any one. In 1825 Parliament attempted to put down the Association by means of the Convention Bill, but the Association dissolved itself before the Bill came into force. This, however, was merely in appearance; as a matter of fact, it continued to exist, and the Catholic Rent was still raised. In 1829, after the victory won at the Clare election, the Convention Bill having expired, the old Association was renewed, and it declared that none but Catholics should in future be elected for Irish constituencies. The members also began to assemble at monster meetings, to which they marched in military array; but a proclamation against these meetings was obeyed by the Association. When the Emancipation Act was passed it was accompanied by a measure for suppressing the Association. But, its object being fulfilled, the Association was dissolved before the Bill became law. Sheil and Wyre were the leaders, next to the "Liberator" himself.

Catholic Committee, THE, was an association of some of the leading Catholics in Ireland, which was established in the reign of William III., and was intended to watch over Catholic interests. The Committee became extremely active during the agitation of the last quarter of the eighteenth century. In 1791 there was a split in the Committee, the bishops and the noblemen, like Lord

Fingal and Lord Kenmare, separating from the more violent party; the latter pressed for instant emancipation, while the former were willing to wait. The violent party determined on a convention, and on an alliance with the United Irishmen, under Byrne and Keogh. The consequence was the Back Lane Parliament (q.v.). Meanwhile, however, the Committee itself, after a hot debate, accepted the Relief Bill of 1793, and the Back Lane Parliament dissolved. But from this time the moderate party lost influence, and in 1798 the Committee dissolved itself. In 1809 and 1871 it was reconstituted, and reassembled for a short period. [CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION.]

Catholic Emancipation. In the reign of William III. various statutes had been passed against the Roman Catholics which forbade them to hold property in land, and subjected their spiritual instructors to the penalties of felony. These acts had ceased to be applied, but they were a blot upon the statute book, and served as a temptation to informers. In 1778 an Act, brought in by Sir G. Savile, repealed these penalties with general approval. These Acts did not apply to Scotland, but it was contemplated to repeal similar enactments which still disgraced the Scotch statute book. This stirred up fanaticism in Edinburgh and Glasgow in 1779; riots took place in the Scotch capital, and the houses of Roman Catholics were attacked. A Protestant Association was established in Scotland, and Lord George Gordon, who was more than half a madman, was chosen as its president. The association spread to England, and a branch was established in London, and in consequence the disturbances known as the Gordon Riots (q.v.) broke out. In 1791 Mr. Mitford brought in a Bill for the relief of "Protesting Catholic Dissenters"—that is, Roman Catholics who protested against the Pope's temporal authority, and his right to excommunicate kings and absolve subjects from their allegiance, and the right of not keeping faith with heretics. Mr. Fox opposed the measure on the ground that relief should be given to all Roman Catholics. Mr. Pitt expressed similar sentiments. The Bill was altered during its progress, and at last it passed in a form which allowed Roman Catholics who took an oath of allegiance to secure to themselves freedom of education, of holding property, and of practising the profession of the law. It also allowed Catholic peers to approach the king. Roman Catholics were still worse off in Ireland. Their public worship was proscribed; they were excluded from all offices in the learned professions; they were deprived of the guardianship of their children; if they had landed estates they were forbidden to intermarry with Protestants. In 1792 some of the worst of these disabilities were removed by the Irish Parliament, and in 1793 this relief was further extended. The restraints on worship and education, even the disposition of property, were removed; they were admitted to vote at elections on taking the oath of allegiance and abjuration; they could hold some of the higher civil and military offices, and could enjoy the honours and endowments of the University of Dublin. In the same year a similar Bill was passed for the relief of Scotch Roman Catholics. In 1799, when the Union with Ireland was in contemplation, Pitt intended to admit Irish Roman Catholics to the Parliament of the United Kingdom. But George III. was strongly opposed to this step, and would not allow his minister to give any direct pledge. When Pitt attempted, after the Union, to carry out his tempered scheme of relief, the king refused his consent, and Pitt resigned office. After this the question slept, but in 1803 the Catholics obtained a further slight measure of relief on condition of subscribing the oath of 1791. In May, 1805, Lord Grenville moved for a committee of the whole House to consider a petition from the Roman Catholics of Ireland; but his motion was negatived by a majority of 129. A similar motion was made by Fox in the House of Commons, but it was lost by a majority of 112. In 1807 an attempt was made by the ministry to admit Roman Catholics in Ireland to the higher staff appointments of the army. This attempt they were obliged by the king to abandon, and as his Majesty went on to require from them a written declaration that they would propose to him no further concession to the Catholics, they were obliged to resign. Their successors, under the Duke of Portland and Mr. Perceval, were opposed to the Roman Catholic claims; still numerous petitions were presented by Irish Roman Catholics, and similar petitions were presented in 1810 in favour of English Roman Catholics. Many Protestants began to petition for the relief of their Catholic brethren, and the feeling in the universities became less strongly opposed to change. After the murder of Mr. Perceval the Marquis Wellesley was charged with the formation of a ministry, and made the settlement of the Catholic claims the basis of his programme. He did not, however, succeed. In the same year Mr. Canning carried a motion for the consideration of the laws affecting Catholics by a majority of 129. In the Lords a similar motion was lost by a single vote. A Catholic Association (q.v.) had been formed in Ireland in 1823. During Mr. Canning's tenure of office it had been dissolved, in the hope that he would be sure to carry out his well-known views. After his death, in 1827, it was reconstructed. In 1828 it secured the return of Daniel O'Connell for the county of Clare. Mr. Peel and the Duke of Wellington were convinced that the time for settling the question of the Catholic claims had now arrived. Besides other difficulties, they had to face the strong opposition of the king, George IV., who now expressed as much objection to the measure as his father had done. At last the king was persuaded to allow the ministry to draw up three measures, one to suppress the Catholic Association, one a Relief Bill, and the third to revise the franchise in Ireland. After some delay caused by the king, Peel introduced the measure of Catholic Relief. It admitted Roman Catholics, on taking a new oath instead of the oath of supremacy, to both Houses of Parliament; to all corporate offices; to all judicial offices, except in the ecclesiastical courts; to all civil and political offices, except those of Regent, Lord Chancellor in England and Ireland, and Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Roman Catholics were still restrained in the exercise of Church patronage. The motion to go into Committee was agreed to by a majority of 188. The Duke of Wellington said, on the second reading of the Bill, in the House of Lords: "I, my Lords, am one of those who have probably passed a longer period of my life engaged in war than most men, and principally, I may say, in civil war, and I must say this, that if I could avoid, by any sacrifice whatever, even one month of civil war in the country to which I am attached, I would sacrifice my life in order to do it." The Bill was opposed in the Lords by the Archbishop of Canterbury and several others of the episcopal bench, but it was carried on April 10, 1829, by a large majority. The king gave his consent with great reluctance. Sir Robert Peel writes in his memoirs a solemn declaration that he acted throughout in this measure from a deep conviction that they were not only conducive to the general welfare, but that they had become imperatively necessary to avert an imminent and increasing danger from the interests of the Church, and of the institutions connected with the Church.

Cato Street Conspiracy (1820) was the name given to a wild plot formed by a number of desperate men, having for its chief object the murder of Lord Castlereagh and the rest of the ministers. The originators were a man named Arthur Thistlewood, who had once been a subaltern officer, Ings, a butcher, Tidd and Brunt, shoemakers, and Davidson, a man of colour; and they had arranged to murder the ministers at a dinner at Lord Harrowby's on the night of the 23rd February, to set fire to London in several places, seize the Bank and Mansion House, and proclaim a provisional government. The plot, however, had been betrayed to the police by one of the conspirators, named Edwards, some weeks before. The conspirators were attacked by the police as they were arming themselves in a stable in Cato Street, near the Edgware Road. A scuffle ensued, in which one policeman was stabbed and several of the criminals escaped. Thistlewood was among these, but he was captured next morning. He and four others were executed, and five more were transported for life. A good deal of discussion took place in the House of Commons on the employment of the informer Edwards by the authorities.

Cavaliers. In December, 1641, frequent tumults took place round the Houses of Parliament, in the course of which more than one collision occurred between the mob and the officers and courtiers who made Whitehall their head-quarters. The two parties assailed each other with nicknames, and the epithet, "Cavalier," was applied by the people to the Royalists. The original meaning of the term, which was to become the designation of a great political party, is difficult to discover. Professor Gardiner says that it "carried with it a flavour of opprobrium as implying a certain looseness and idleness of military life." Mr. Forster thinks that it was used as a term of reproach on this occasion "to connect its French origin with the un-English character of the defenders of the queen and her French papist adherents, to whom it was chiefly applied." According to the statement of William Lilly, an eye-witness of these riots, it referred at first rather to the personal appearance of the Royalists than to anything foreign or sinister in their characters. "The courtiers having long hair and locks, and always wearing swords, at last were called by these men 'Cavaliers'; and so all that took part or appeared for his Majesty were termed Cavaliers, few of the vulgar knowing the sense of the word 'Cavalier.'" It thus exactly corresponded to the term Roundhead [ROUNDHEAD]. The earliest uses of the word in the Journal of Sir S. D'Ewes are found under the dates of Jan. 10, and March 4, 1641. The king complained of its use, accusing his opponents of attempting "to render all persons of honour, courage, and reputation odious to the common people under the style of Cavaliers, inasmuch as the highways and villages have not been safe for gentlemen to pass through without violence or affront." The name at first used as a reproach came to be adopted by the Royalists themselves as a title of honour. "A complete Cavalier," wrote Dr. Symonds, in a sermon preached before the royal army, "is a child of honour. He is the only reserve of English gentility and ancient valour, and hath chosen rather to bury himself in the tomb of honour than to see the nobility of his nation vasalaged, the dignity of his country captivated or obscured by any base domestic enemy, or by any foreign fore-conquered foe." The name thus originated continued to be used to describe the Church and King party till the introduction of the epithet "Tory." [TORY.]

Cavendish, THOMAS (b. 1664, d. 1692), a gentleman of Suffolk, fitted out in 1686 an expedition for discovery and privateering, having imbibed a love for sea adventure during a voyage with Sir Humphrey Gilbert in 1585. A futile attack on Sierra Leone was followed by a descent on the coasts of Chili and Peru, where he met with more success, capturing some of the Spanish treasure-ships, notably the "Santa Anna" from the Manillas. He returned to Plymouth in September, 1688, by the Moluccas, Java, and the Cape of Good Hope, with the honour of being the second Englishman who had circumnavigated the globe, and was knighted by the queen. He died off the coast of Brazil whilst engaged in another voyage of discovery.

Cawnpore, MASSACRE OF (1857). On June 5th the Cawnpore regiments mutinied, plundered the treasury, and set off to Delhi. On the 6th they were brought back by Nana Sahib, and invested the Residency. Not less than 1,000 persons had taken refuge there, and they prolonged the defence from June 6th to June 24th, till the ammunition and provisions were all gone. Then Nana Sahib offered to transmit them safely to Allahabad on condition of surrender. The offer was accepted, and on the 27th, the survivors, men, women, and children, were marched down to the boats which had been prepared for them, in number about 450. They had no sooner embarked than a murderous fire was opened on them from both banks. "Many perished, others got off in their boats; but their crews had deserted them, and one by one they were again captured. A considerable number were at once shot, and otherwise put to death, but 122 were reserved." After Havelock's victory, July 15th, it was decided that they should be put to death with those who had escaped from Futtehgurh. They were all brutally destroyed on the 16th; some by shot, some by sword-cuts; the bodies were cast into a well, and there is no doubt that many were thrown in while still alive. [INDIAN MUTINY.]

Kaye, Sepoy War.

Caxton, WILLIAM (b. ? 1421, d. ? 1491), the first English printer, was born near Hadlow, in Kent, and apprenticed to a rich London mercator in 1438. He left England in 1441 to transact business in connection with his trade in the Low Countries, and finally took up his residence at Bruges, where he remained for thirty-five years. He joined there the gild of Merchant Adventurers, who had a depôt in the city. In 1463 Caxton was promoted to the office of governor of the gild. Soon afterwards he, together with another English envoy, was entrusted by Edward IV. with the task of renewing an expiring commercial treaty between England and Burgundy. In 1470, Caxton used his influence at Bruges in behalf of Edward IV., who was taking refuge there from the Lancastrians, and in the next year the Duchess of Burgundy offered him a post at her court. By the duchess's command he completed, in 1471, a translation into English of a popular French collection of romances concerning the Trojan War. He became acquainted with Colard Mansion, who had some knowledge of the new art of printing which Gutenberg had perfected some sixteen years before. Together they printed Caxton's translation—The Recuyell of the Histories of Troye—and 1474 has been the year assigned as the date of the production of this, the first English-printed book. The experiment proved eminently successful to another of Caxton's translations—The Game and Playe of the Chess—issued from the same press in 1476. In 1476 Caxton arrived in England with new type, and set up a press near the western entrance to Westminster Abbey. During the following fifteen years, he printed many works—chivalric romances, religious works, and translations. His patrons included Edward IV., Richard III., and Henry VII., and the chief noblemen and many merchants of the day. Caxton was buried in St. Margaret's Churchyard, outside Westminster Abbey.

The best biography of Caxton is that by Mr. William Blades, which has practically superseded all its predecessors. [S. L. L.]

Ceadwalla, King of Wessex (685—688), was descended from Cerdic through Ceawlin. His name is generally considered to bespeak a British origin, the same as the Welsh Cadwallon, and in support of this view it may be mentioned that his brother was called Mul, i.e., "mule," a man of mixed descent. On being banished from Wessex, he retired to Sussex, which kingdom he subdued. He was, however, subsequently expelled, returned to Wessex, and, on the death or abdication of Centwine, became king. He then conquered Sussex and the Isle of Wight, and twice ravaged Kent. In 688 he abdicated, and went on a pilgrimage to Rome, where he was baptised by the Pope, and received the name of Peter. He died on Easter Day, 689.

Anglo-Saxon Chron.; Henry of Huntingdon.

Ceawlin, King of Wessex, succeeded to the throne in the latter half of the sixth century on the death of his father Cymric. Under his leadership the West Saxons enlarged their boundaries and the Britons were driven back. In 568 he defeated Ethelbert of Kent at Wimbledon, and three years later gained a great victory over the Britons at Bedford, which brought the important towns of Aylesbury, Bensington, and Eynsham under his dominion. In 577 he won a victory at Dereham, in which three British kings fell, and as a result of this success he obtained possession of the three cities of Bath, Gloucester, and Cirencester. In 584, again attempting to extend his conquests to the upper Severn valley, he fought a doubtful battle at Faddiley in Cheshire, defeated the Britons at Frithem in Shropshire, but after this is said to have made an alliance with them against Ethelbert, by whom he was defeated at Wodnesbeorh (? Wanborough, about three miles from Swindon) and driven out of his kingdom (? 590). Two years after this he died. Ceawlin is reckoned as the second Bretwalda in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle; and William of Malmesbury says of him that "he was the astonishment of the English, the detestation of the Britons, and eventually the destruction of both."

Cecil, Sir WILLIAM. [BURLLEIGH.]

Celts in the British Isles. The Celts form one among that large group of peoples which is commonly called the Aryan group, and which includes nearly all the present inhabitants of Europe with several considerable peoples of the East. The name Celt was that by which the people were first known to the Greeks, whereas the Romans always knew them under the name of Galli, or Gauls; both these words probably mean the same thing, namely the warriors, or according to Professor Rhys, the kilt-wearing, or clothed people. Another name by which the Celts of South Britain were known is Cymry, which is still the name by which the Welsh designate themselves, and which possibly reappears in the Cimbri spoken of by the Roman historians. There can be no doubt that the Celts at one time formed the most powerful confederacy of nations in Europe. Gradually the Celtic peoples were driven back from their more easterly possessions by the Romans and the kindred races in the south, and in the north by the Teutonic peoples: so that at the time when the light of history first shines on them with any clearness we find them in possession only of the three most western lands of Europe—namely, the Iberian Peninsula, Gaul, and the British Isles.

It must not be supposed that the inhabitants of these lands, though they consisted fundamentally of the same race, formed in any sense a single nationality, or spoke an identical language. In the British Islands some dialects of Celtic are still spoken and others are but recently extinct. These we can classify. They are the Welsh, or Cymric (Kymraeg), the Cornish, the Manx (dialect spoken in the Isle of Man), the Irish (Erse or Gaidhelic), and the Highland Scottish, or Scottish Gaelic. To these we must add the only other living Celtic tongue, the Breton of Brittany, otherwise called Armoric. These six dialects divide themselves into two classes, the Gaidhelic (Goidelic) and the British or Cymric. The first included Irish, Manx, and Scottish Gaelic; the second comprises the Welsh, Cornish, and Armoric. It is quite possible that this division was in force as long ago as the date of the first Roman invasion, so that the inhabitants of the British Islands then consisted of two great nationalities, the Britons in the lower part of Britain, and the Gauls in the Highlands of Scotland and in Ireland. There can be little doubt that of the two the nationality of the Britons was most nearly allied to that of the Gauls.

Many of our geographical names serve to remind us of these two main divisions of the Celtic race. The word Gaidhel (which is, of course, etymologically allied to Gaul) is preserved in the words Gaelic and Gaelic, now used only for the Scottish Gaels, though in the native Irish the same word (Gaedhil) is applied to that nationality and language; it is preserved again in Galway in Ireland, and in Galloway in Scotland, and in many lesser local names. The word Cymry, which is still the name by which the Welsh call themselves, has been for us Latinised into Cambria, and remains again in Cumberland (Cumbria) which once included a much larger area than it now includes. Britain, Briton, are names which have been bestowed from without—namely, by the Greeks and Romans—while Wales, Cornwall, have likewise been bestowed from without by the Teutonic invaders of Britain. All the Celtic nationalities were, as we know, an immigrant people into Europe, and it is not to be supposed that when they made their way into these islands they found them empty of inhabitants, or that no traces of these earlier races continued to exist after the Celts had been long settled there. Some among the tribes which Cæsar counted among the Celtic inhabitants of Britain may have belonged to this earlier stock, in particular the Silures, who inhabited the south of Wales and Monmouthshire, near Caerleon (Isca Silurum), and a part at least of the tribes of Devonshire and Cornwall have been designated as representing these more primitive inhabitants of the British Isles, who were, it is generally believed, allied to the original inhabitants of Spain, the Iberians, and to the Basques, their modern representatives. It would seem that the Gaelic branch preceded the Cymric in the course of invasion, and that the latter as they advanced drove the Gæls towards the north and west. At the time of Cæsar's invasion the Cymric Celts may be said to have composed the body of the population south of the Firths of Forth and of Clyde; and as the names Britannia, Briton, were by the Romans bestowed only on the country and the people in the southern part of the island, the word Briton may be used synonymously with Cymric-Celt. In fact, the Cymric people came in after-times to designate themselves as Brythons. When first known to the Romans, therefore, the Britons are to be looked upon as one nation, with a certain admixture of more primitive elements, and with the addition of one intrusive nationality, the Belgæ, who had made a settlement in the south of the island. The Belgæ were likewise Celtic by blood, but were not closely allied to the native inhabitants of Britain. These Belgæ seem to have been more civilised than the rest of the inhabitants, and to have offered the most formidable resistance to the Roman arms. The exact districts over which they extended cannot be ascertained. The centre of their possessions probably lay somewhere near the borders of Sussex and Hampshire.

With the exception then of some primitive tribes and the intrusive Belgæ, the Britons from the Channel to the Firths of Forth and Clyde were, at the time of Cæsar's invasion, essentially one people belonging to the Cymric branch of the Celtic family [BRRONS]. North of the firths the land was inhabited by a people who were to the classic writers first known as Caledonians, but afterwards by the Romans known as Picts. This name, it is well known, means simply the painted or stained (Picti), and was bestowed upon all those who had not adopted the Roman civilisation, but adhered to their national system of staining themselves with woad. Concerning the nationality of the Picts there is considerable dispute. Tacitus says that they were of German origin. This assertion was formerly very generally accepted, and still is by some scholars. It is more probable that they were of a Celtic stock. Mr. Skene, who has undertaken an exhaustive examination of the question, arrives at the conclusion that they belonged, not to the Cymric but to the Gaelic branch of the Celtic family [PICRS]. In Ireland again the inhabitants were probably to be divided into several nationalities. There was, in the first place, undoubtedly a substratum of the same primitive stock of which we have noticed traces in England. Irish tradition tells us of four nationalities who, at different times, held rule in the island, namely, the Nemidians, the Firbolgs, the Tuatha da Danann, and the Milesians, or Scots. Should we set aside what seems purely mythical in the tradition, and with that the Nemidians, of whom nothing can be made, it is not unlikely that the three names which remain do really represent three peoples, out of which the Irish nation is composed. The Firbolgs, who are described as a dark and slavish race, very likely represent the oldest inhabitants of Iberian stock, while the Tuatha da Danann and the Milesians were two different branches of the Gaelic race, having somewhat different appearances and national characteristics. The Milesians, who eventually obtained the supremacy, seem to be identical with the Scots, who gave its name first to Ireland, and later on to Scotland [Scots].

Such is the general ethnology of the Celtic people of Great Britain and Ireland. What we know of their social life and religion at the time of the Roman conquest is gained almost solely from the testimony of Roman historians, and therefore applies chiefly to the inhabitants of South Britain, who were the only people to come in contact with the invader. We have some other sources of information in the Welsh and Irish traditions, and in all that is most ancient of what has been preserved of their ancient laws, especially of the Brehon Laws of the Irish [BREHON]. This last source of information shows us that the Celts, where untouched by Roman civilisation, adhered to a form of social organisation which was, at one time, pretty general among the Aryan peoples. The distinctive features in their state of society were that each tribe, or, more strictly speaking, each village, constituted a state in itself, a political unit whose tie of union with any other village was only of a very loose character. At the same time, the tie which united together the inhabitants of any single village was remarkably close, most of the land, for example, being held, not individually, but in common, by the whole body. This form of society is commonly distinguished by students as the Village Community (see Sir H. S. Maine, Village Communities of the East and West). The religion of the inhabitants of Britain must have been the same as that of the Gauls, if, as Cæsar tells us, the special home or college of the Gaulish priests, the Druids, was in this island [DRAVINS]. Of this creed we do not know much. There are, however, good reasons for believing that it very closely resembled the religion of the Teutonic neighbours of the Celts, of which some traces have come down to us. As with the German races, and as with the Romans themselves, the highest divinity was probably a god of the sky and of the thunder. Beside him stood a sun-god whom the Gauls, when they became Latinised, identified completely with Apollo, and who perhaps corresponded to the Freyr or Frô of the Teutonic peoples. His original Gaulish name may have been Granus. To form with these a trilogy we have a god of war, probably similar to the Teutonic Zio or Tiw, and called by the Roman writers

Mara. The chief goddess of the Gauls is called by Cæsar Minerva, but we have proof that they worshipped another mother goddess who, like the Roman Lucina, presided over births, and whose image, holding on her lap a child, is frequently dug up in France, and always taken by the peasantry for an image of the Virgin and Child. To this pantheon of nature-gods was joined a lower form of nature-worship, especially an adoration of trees and streams. As to the Teutons, the oak was to the Gauls an especially sacred tree. The Celtic worship of streams was more peculiar, and the traces of it still survive in the special reverence paid to wells in Brittany, in the more Celtic parts of Great Britain, and in Ireland.

Census, THE, a numbering of the population of Great Britain and Ireland, was appointed to be taken every tenth year by Act 41, George III., c. 15 (Dec., 1800). The first census was accordingly taken in 1801, and has been repeated every tenth year since. At each recurrence of the census it has been rendered more complete, and at the present time elicits a vast amount of valuable and accurate information. It is taken simultaneously throughout the kingdom by special officers. The official figures of the various enumerations since 1801 are as follows (the whole of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom being included):—

1811	18,508,116	1861	29,571,644
1821	21,272,187	1871	31,857,338
1831	24,382,485	1881	35,246,633
1841	27,239,404

The first Imperial Census of Great Britain and Ireland, the colonies and dependencies, was taken in 1871, when the population was found to be 234,762,593.

Central India. The official name for the group of feudatory native states in the centre of India, comprising the dominions of Holkar and Scindiah, and the states of Bhopal and Dhar. [HOLKAR, &c.]

Central Provinces, a chief commissionership of British India, formed out of the old Nagpore province and Nerbudda territories, in 1861, lie to the south of Rewah and Bundelcund. It is divided into nineteen districts and four divisions, and has an area of 84,000 square miles, and a population of about 8,200,000 (in 1872), of whom nearly six millions are Hindoos. [NAGPORA.]

Cenwealh, King of the West Saxons (643—672), was the son and successor of Cyne-gils. He tried to effect in Wessex a relapse into Paganism, but his expulsion by Penda, whose sister he had repudiated, led to his seeking refuge in East Anglia, where he was converted to Christianity. After having recovered his kingdom, he defeated Wulfhæ, the son of Penda, at Ashdown, and took him prisoner (661). He also won two great victories over the Britons at Bradford and Pen, and extended his dominions on every side.

Cenwulf, King of the Mercians (796—819), was descended from Cenwealh, the brother of Penda. His reign was a very prosperous one, and he retained for Mercia that supremacy which had been won by Offa. He completed the conquest of Kent, which he granted out to his brother Cuthred; while to conciliate the Church, he suppressed the archbishopric of Lichfield, which Offa had founded. He was victorious over the Welsh, and his army is said to have penetrated as far as Snowden.

Ceolnoth, Archbishop of Canterbury (833—870), made his episcopate important in many ways. In 838 he assisted at the Council of Kingston, when a treaty of peace and alliance was agreed upon between the Kentish clergy and the two kings, Egbert and his son Ethelwulf. This treaty laid the foundation of those amicable relations which we find existing ever after between the descendants of Cerdic and the successors of Augustine. Twice during Ceolnoth's life, Canterbury was sacked by the Danes, but the church and the monastery of St. Augustine were spared, probably by the payment of a heavy ransom on the part of the archbishop, who also contributed towards raising a fleet against the Danes.

William of Malmesbury; Hook, Archbishops.

Ceolwulf, King of the Northumbrians (d. 737), succeeded his brother Cenred. In 713 he was seized by his enemies, and confined in a cloister, but was afterwards released by his friends and reseat on the throne. He was a patron of learning, and to him Bede dedicated his Ecclesiastical History. After reigning eight years he abdicated, and spent the remaining years of his life as a monk at Lindisfarne.

Bede; Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

Ceorl is a word which occurs in the laws of the kings before the Norman Conquest in the following senses:—(1) man—vir, maritus; (2) peasant, rusticus; (3) the ordinary non-noble freeman. In this, its ordinary constitutional sense, we find (a) ceorl opposed to eorl, as simple to gentle; (b) the ceorlisc man opposed to gesithcundman and thegen, and in the Northumbrian ecclesiastical law to landdgend cyninges-thegen; (c) ceorl used as equivalent to tyrhyndeman in the West-Saxon and Mercian laws, and in opposition to the sirhyndeman and twelfhyndeman. Originally, the simple freeman was the corner-stone of the old German state. Even the good blood of the eorl only brought with it social estimation and easy access to political power, rather than a different position in the eye of the law. But in historical times the ceorl had fallen from his old status. He stood midway between the “ingenuus” of Tacitus and the mediæval villen. With the development of the constitution he gradually sinks towards the latter condition. Legally the ceorl still was a full citizen; but if he possessed no land, his position in a territorial constitution became extremely precarious. The establishment of private property in land had deprived him of his old right of sharing in the common land of the state. Though still a member of the local courts and of the host, though still fully “law-worthy,” and though his wergild was still paid to the kindred, the landless ceorl was compelled, by a law of Athelstan, to choose a lord to answer for his good behaviour. The right of selecting his own master alone distinguished him from the predial serf. In a later stage, even the small land-owning ceorl was practically obliged to commend himself for safety’s sake to some great proprietor; and the “liber homo qui iure potest cum terra quo voluerit” of Domesday represents this large class of voluntary dependents. Many grades of ceorls thus spring up according to their relations to their “hlaford.” But while the less prosperous ceorls thus lost their freedom, the disappearance of the blood nobility of the eorl helped the more thriving of their class to attain that higher status which no longer depended on birth alone. The ceorl with five hides of land (600 acres), with house and church, a special relation to the crown, and a special jurisdiction over his property, became “of thegn right worthy.” Yet, on the whole, the growth of thegnhood depressed the “ceorlisc man.” Its first principle was dependence; and, as on the Continent, the old freedom withered away before feudalism. The very name ceorl is not found in Domesday, and its equivalents, bordarius, cotarius, cotsetus, socmannus, villanus, indicate that the process which degraded him to the “unfree villen” had almost become complete. The lawyers of the twelfth century completed the process. The bad meaning attached to the word “churl” is an indication of the disrepute into which this once honourable title had fallen.

Cerdic, King of the West Saxons (d. 534 ?), is said to have been ninth in descent from Woden, and, in company with his son Cymric, to have come to Britain in 495, “at the place which is called Cordices-ora” (probably in Hampshire). His early wars were not attended with great success; but in 508, having made an alliance with Aesc and Aelle (Ella), he totally defeated the Britons. In 514, reinforcements having arrived, he continued his conquests, and in 519 “Cerdic and Cymric obtained the kingdom of the West Saxons.” In 530 they conquered the Isle of Wight, and made a terrible slaughter of the Britons at Whitgareshurh (probably Carisbrooke). Four years later Cerdic died. From Cerdic all our kings, with the exception of Canute, Hardicanute, the two Harolds, and William the Conqueror, are descended.

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

Cerones, THE, were an ancient Celtic tribe occupying the west coast of Inverness and part of Argyre.

Cessation, THE, was the name given, during the Ulster Rebellion of 1641, and the following years, to a truce for one year, agreed on Sept. 15th, 1643, between the Marquis of Ormonde and the confederate Irish at Drogheda. The English Parliament impeached Ormonde on account of it, and the Scots refused to recognise it. The native Irish party, headed by the Legate, were also opposed to it; it had a very bad effect on the Royalists in England; and, after all, the king’s object of getting help from Ireland in troops and money was only very partially gained.

Ceylon, an island in the Indian Ocean, lying south-east of India, and separated from it by the Gulf of Manaar, has been known since very early times. It was visited by the Macedonians, and was much frequented by merchants in the sixth century. It was first visited by the Portuguese in 1505, and a few years later a fort was built by them at Colombo. In 1656 the Portuguese were expelled from the island by the Dutch, who were in their turn driven out by the British in 1795, Ceylon, or at least as much of it as had belonged to the Dutch, being annexed to the Presidency of Madras; but, in 1801, it was made a separate colony. In 1803, on the refusal of the King of Kandy to accept the British terms, Kandy was attacked by a large force, under General Macdowall; but the expedition ended most disastrously in a massacre of the British troops. In 1815 Kandy was occupied by the British, and the king deposed; a few years later the natives rebelled, and tried ineffectually to drive the English out of the interior of the country.

In 1831 a commission was sent out from England to inquire into the condition of the island, with the result that a charter providing for the administration of justice by supreme district and circuit courts was issued; trial by jury was adopted; every situation was thrown open to the competition of the Singhalese; and three natives of Ceylon were appointed members of the legislative council, on a footing of perfect equality with the other unofficial European members. Notwithstanding the attempts at reform, insurrections took place in 1835 and 1848, both of which were organised by the Buddhist priests, who dreaded the diminution of their influence under British rule; but the rebellions were crushed before they had spread to any very alarming extent. The government of Ceylon was vested in a governor, assisted by an executive council of five members, viz., the Colonial Secretary, the Commander-in-chief, the Queen's Advocate, the Treasurer, and the Auditor-General. There is also a legislative council of fifteen, including the members of the executive council, four other official and six non-official members nominated by the governor. This form of government has existed since 1833. The Roman-Dutch law, as it prevailed in the colony in 1795, is that which is still suffered to apply, except where it has been modified by direct local enactments, which have introduced trial by jury, the English rules of evidence in criminal cases, and the English mercantile law in some important matters.

Chalgrove Field, THE BATTLE OF (June 18, 1643), was fought between the Royalist cavalry, under Prince Rupert, who had pushed forward from Oxford on a raid, and a body of Parliamentary troops, under Hampden. The encounter, which was more of the nature of a skirmish than a battle, is memorable as the one in which John Hampden received his death-wound. Chalgrove is a small village about twenty-two miles east of Oxford, between the Thames and the Chiltern Hills.

Chaloner, SIR THOMAS (b. 1515, d. 1565), a statesman, a soldier, and a man of letters, whilst quite a boy entered the service of the Emperor Charles V., whom he accompanied on the expedition to Algiers, 1541, barely escaping with his life. Soon afterwards he returned to England, and was present at the battle of Pinkie Clough, 1547, where he greatly distinguished himself. He was Clerk of the Council to Henry VIII., and a faithful servant to Edward VI., though his religion debarred him from the favour of Mary. Under Elizabeth he acquired considerable renown as an able diplomatist, and was sent as ambassador to Germany and Spain, remaining at Madrid for two or three years before his death. Sir Thomas was the author of a treatise, De Republica Anglorum Instauranda (Lond., 1579), and some other tracts.

Chalons, THE BATTLE OF (1274), began with a tournament, to which Edward I. was invited by the Count of Chalons-sur-Marne. Foul play endangered the king's life, and resulted in a fight between the English and French, in which a considerable number of the latter were slain.

Chalus-Chatrol, a castle in Poitou, belonging to the Viscount of Limoges, was besieged by Richard I. in 1199. It was before the walls of this fortress that the king received his death-wound. [RICHARD I.]

Chamberlain, THE LORD GREAT, is one of the great officers of state, the sixth in order of precedence. This office early became one of comparatively small importance, and has for many centuries been a purely titular dignity. It was granted to the De Veres, Earls of Oxford, by Henry I. in 1101, and was for many centuries hereditary in that family. On the death of John de Vere, sixteenth Earl of Oxford, his daughter Mary married Lord Willoughby de Eresby; and in 1625 the House of Lords declared that the office passed to this nobleman. On the death of the last male descendant of this peer, it was decided, after much litigation, in July, 1779, that the honour passed to his female descendants, the Lady Willoughby de Eresby and the Lady Charlotte Bertie.

Chamberlain, THE LORD, OF THE HOUSEHOLD, or King's Chamberlain, is still an officer of some importance. Notices of him are found early in the thirteenth century. In 1341 he was ordered to take an oath to maintain the laws and the Great Charter, and in 1 Richard II. it was enacted that he should be chosen in Parliament. He derived considerable political importance from the fact that it was his duty to endorse petitions handed to the king; and frequent complaints in Parliament show that this prerogative was generally exercised, and occasionally abused. In 1406 it was declared in Parliament that the King's Chamberlain should always be a member of the Council. Under the later Plantagenets and Tudors the Lord Chamberlain became the chief functionary of the royal household; and his duties are still not altogether nominal. By 31 Henry VIII. he takes precedence after the Lord Steward. By modern usage, he is always a peer of high rank, and he goes out with the ministry. He has also a peculiar authority over dramatic entertainments, which arises from the fact that the players attached to the Royal Household were under his jurisdiction. But the Lord Chamberlain's function as Licensor of all plays dates only from 10 George II., cap. 28, 1736, when Walpole brought in an Act of Parliament requiring that all dramas and plays should receive the licence of the Lord Chamberlain before being acted, power being given to this officer to prohibit the representation of any piece which seemed to offend against morality, decency, or public order. The duty of examining and licensing plays, however, is not actually exercised by the Lord Chamberlain himself, but by one of the officers of his department, called the Licenser or Examiner of Plays.

Chamberlain. THE RIGHT HON. JOSEPH, was returned as M.P. for Birmingham in 1876, having two years previously unsuccessfully opposed Mr. Roebuck at Sheffield. On the formation of the second Gladstone administration he was nominated President of the Board of Trade with a seat in the Cabinet.

Champion of England. THE, is an officer whose business it is to appear at the coronation of a sovereign, challenge all comers to deny the title of the king or queen, and, if necessary, to fight them. The office is a very ancient one, and is popularly supposed to have been instituted by William the Conqueror. According to Dugdale (Baronage of England) the Conqueror conferred the office on Robert de Marmion, with the castle of Tamworth and manor of Scrivelby, in Lincolnshire. At the coronation of Richard II. the office was claimed by Sir John Dymoke, of Scrivelby, and Baldwin de Treville, of Tamworth. It was finally decided that the office went with the manor, and belonged to Sir John Dymoke, in whose family it remained down to the coronation of Queen Victoria.

Chancellor. RICHARD (d. 1564), was the founder of the English-Russian Company. Whilst on a voyage of discovery, to find the north-west passage to China, under the direction of Cabot, in 1553, he doubled the North Cape (a feat never before accomplished by the English), and reached Archangel. Thence he made an inland journey to Moscow, and established the first trading relations between England and Russia. On his return to England he established a company to trade with Muscovy, which was incorporated by Queen Mary. He set out for Russia a second time; but on his return voyage, accompanied by the Russian envoys, he was wrecked on the coast of Norway, and perished.

Chancellor. [CHANCERY.]

Chancery. The Court of Chancery and its equitable jurisdiction have occupied in England a unique position, and exercised a paramount influence on the development of the English legal system, especially on the laws relating to land. But the Chancery and the office of Chancellor existed for more than three centuries before it became a court of jurisdiction at all. The office was at first purely ministerial. The cancellarius of Rome, the officer who sat behind the screen (cancelli) was merely a secretary; and the Chancellor of the Norman kings, under whom this official first comes into notice, was simply the chief of the royal clerks who superintended them in drawing up writs, and kept the seal. As a clerk he was an ecclesiastic; and as an ecclesiastic nearest to the royal person, he was the king's chaplain, and "keeper of the king's conscience." Becket, when Chancellor, is described as secundus a rege; he had fifty clerks under him; he held pleas with the constable and judges of the curia regis. This came to him only by way of delegation from the Council, when to the king in Council, as the fountain of justice, there came appeals from the lower royal courts, and petitions in cases where these courts would not or could not do justice. By the ordinance, 22 Edward III., all petitions that were "of grace" were to be referred to the Chancellor. Henceforth petitions are addressed to the Chancellor directly. Of these early petitions most seek redress under circumstances where ordinary justice might miscarry; as against a partial sheriff, an encroaching lord, or the keepers of a gaol. So far the Chancellor was exercising only the natural authority of a king's representative; since these were cases of trespass (vi et armis), in which cases the curia regis always interfered; and till modern times a bill in Chancery preserved the formal statement of a conspiracy to commit a trespass, as the ground on which the court was asked to interfere. The theory of trespass was soon enlarged, and the desire to avoid the procedures by compurgation or by ordeal of battle would cause many petitions for a hearing in the Chancery. The court was charged, too, with the preservation of royal rights, and the decision of technical points touching writs, patents, and grants issued by its clerks. Under Richard II. it was to supervise the justices of the peace; under Henry VI. to try Admiralty cases, and so on. But all this would not have created in the Chancery its distinctive jurisdiction, nor have thrown it into rivalry and even hostility with the common law courts. Many great lawyers have treated this as a necessity inherent in the nature of law, and one paralleled in the actual system of Roman law. But the anomaly peculiar to England is that the equity, which is more or less truly said to soften and correct while it follows the law, is administered by a separate tribunal; so that the law itself has been thrown into an attitude of jealousy towards the equity, which was to supplement and expand it, and "a man might lose his suit on one side of Westminster Hall and win it on the other." This anomaly may be historically traced to the common lawyers' own resistance to progress. They took up too early the view that their system was complete; for every wrong there existed a remedy, and the remedy must be by a form of writ. Cases, therefore, that could not be brought under the existing forms of writ, would fail to obtain a hearing in the courts. The statute 13 Edward I., cap. 24, therefore ordered that the Chancery should draw up new forms of writ "for like cases falling under like law and requiring like remedy." But the judges were now disinclined to allow their system to expand. In their jealousy of the Chancery clerks, they construed the statute as narrowly as possible, were loth to allow that any new case was a "like case," and declined to admit new forms of defence at all. It followed that new grounds of action and defence were left to the Chancery Court, which, in the next century, began rapidly to extend its action. The earliest recorded equity suit before the Chancellor is a married woman's petition on an ante-nuptial agreement for a settlement, in the reign of Edward III.

The hostility shown by the Commons in Parliament to this jurisdiction was due to the vagueness in the summons of the subpoena "to answer on certain matters," to the searching mode of inquiry pursued, perhaps also to the generous hearing ostentatiously offered to the poor. But their hostility embodied also the jealousy against investigation into land titles, and interference with the sacred franc-tenements, and the jealousy of a jurisdiction so closely connected, by its principles and its administrators, with the Church. It is to be noticed that except from 1371 to 1386, all the Chancellors down to Sir Thomas More were ecclesiastics. The device itself of "a use," or grant, of lands to A to hold to the use of others, had originated with the Church, which had then protected the use by spiritual sanction. On the other hand, this and other modes of acquiring rights in land for the Church had been checked by successive Mortmain Acts: those of Henry III., Edward I., 15 Richard II. The similar attempts made by the Commons to check this growing Chancery jurisdiction failed; the first recorded enforcement of a use by the Chancellor is in Henry V.'s reign; in that of Henry VI. uses were firmly established; till by the Wars of the Roses most of the land of England was held subject to uses. By this condition of things the legal was divorced from the actual ownership of land; the feoffee to uses merely served as a screen to cestui qui use; this latter, being "he that had the use," enjoyed the profits unburdened with the liabilities. The machinery of a use made it easy to evade in every direction the rigour of the feudal land-law; so that land could thus be conveyed by mere word of mouth, could be conveyed freely or devised by will, or charged in any way for the benefit of others; the Chancellor recognised and enforced all such dispositions. So far, it was a boon to society that the land system should thus have escaped from the feudal trammels; but it had now become an intolerable evil that the ownership of land should be just what the feudal law had guarded against, viz., secret, uncertain, and easy of transfer. Attempts had been made to remedy this; a statute of Henry VII., following a similar Act of 50 Edward IV., had set a precedent for regarding the beneficiary as the real owner in the case of debts secured on the land. So, 1 Richard III., cap. 1, allowed the beneficiary's conveyance to be valid without assent of the feoffees, and by 4 Henry VII., cap. 15, the lord could claim wardship over the heir to lands held through a use. But the final blow at the system of uses was dealt by Henry VIII. In 1534 he carried the Act which made uses forfeitable for treason, and two years later, introduced the great Statute of Uses, 27 Henry VIII., cap. 10, to put an end to the system once for all. But the narrow conservatism of the common lawyers, disguising itself as philosophical strictness of interpretation, was able to defeat the great legislative design. In the end the whole effect of the statute has been said to consist "in adding four words to every conveyance." For, following servilely the wording of the statute, the judges managed to exclude from its scope uses where the use was founded on a leasehold interest, where the use implied some active duties, or where a further use was raised upon the first use. It was held also not to apply to copyhold lands at all, nor where a use was held by a corporate body. Here, then, were a number of cases of obligation unrecognised by the common law, and left to be enforced by the Chancery courts, which had thus by Coke's time recovered under the name of "trusts" all that hold over transactions in land which the statute was to have transferred to the law courts. In the reign of Elizabeth the first collection of Chancery precedents was made and published, and by the time of the Stuarts the jurisdiction of the court was well settled to give relief in the same main subjects as it does now, viz.: trust, fraud, accident, extremity. Its chief developments since that time have been in the direction of "implied trusts," and especially in the protection of mortgagors' "equity of redemption," the settled property of married women, and the estates of minors. The doctrine of "specific performance" has been its own creation. The court's main instrument besides imprisonment has been the adjudication of costs, and its strongest arm the injunction. The benefits conferred on English society by the Court of Chancery have been immense. Much of its semi criminal jurisdiction has been renounced since the seventeenth century; but the year-books and petitions enable us to judge of the value of a strong court armed with the directest authority of the crown, and deciding on enlightened principles with a prompt and elastic procedure in the ages whose supreme and chronic grievance was lack of governance. It must be admitted that this equity was not always ideal justice; the very completeness of the inquiries necessitated the long delays of a Chancery suit, just as the very elasticity of the procedure introduced a certain confusion and prolixity into the pleadings. Too much was left to the Masters in Chancery and done in "secret chamber-work;" and above all, misled by the half truth that equity follows the law, there were hardships against which the Chancellors had not, in the face of the judges, the courage to grant relief. But there were others which they boldly followed up, as in resisting, on grounds of "public policy," the creation of perpetuities, or in acting on the maxims, "He that seeks equity must do equity;" "Equity looks to the intent rather than the form;" "Equity considers as done that which ought to be done." But the greatest triumph has been the influence exerted by equity on the common law, which adopted the rules of equity as to the construction of deeds, the admissibility of "set-off," the power to change the venue and grant a new trial, the repudiation of penalties in a contract. So, too, the right to make a will of land, denied at law, was granted by Chancery, and had to be adopted by statute (32 Henry VIII.). Finally, the Married Women's Property Act of 1883 is a practical monument of the victory of the Chancery and Roman law view as to the status of a married woman over the barbarous code in which her personality was merged in that of her husband. The lay Chancellors who succeeded Sir Thomas More down to Lord Nottingham, i.e., from 1532 to 1673, contrasted unfavourably with the clerical founders of the great edifice. The Reformation interrupted the traditions of the office, and broke up the study of civil law; in the want of precedents the Chancellors relied too much on intuition and common sense (as Lord Shaftesbury, in a more settled time, 1672, essayed to do, to his own discomfiture). This explains Selden's famous reproach, half-jesting, no doubt, "Equity is a roguish thing . . . 'Tis all one as if we should make the standard for the measure of a foot the Chancellor's foot. One Chancellor has a long foot; another, a short foot; a third, an indifferent foot." The Tudor Chancellors certainly seem to have deferred to the personal leanings of the sovereign. But no such reproach could be made of this or the last century, when equity became as much "a laboured connected system, governed by established rules, and bound down by precedents, as the common law" (Lord Eldon). Still the abuses of the court were numerous, and some of them had reached a monstrous pitch. Venality was the old canker of the court, and the memory of Bacon's offence was revived by similar charges against Lord Clarendon, by the impeachment of Lord Somers (1700) for corruption, by the flagitious sale of Church patronage by Sir N. Wright, till the accumulated popular indignation burst upon Lord Macclesfield, who was dismissed and heavily fined in 1725 for misuse of the "suits' fund" and open sale of offices. But even had every official had clean hands, the abuses of delay and prolixity would have remained an intolerable burden. The Restoration gave these abuses a fresh lease of life; the use of English was not enacted till 1730, nor registries till Anne's reign, and then only for Yorkshire and Middlesex. Meantime, the abolition of the ancient Courts of Wards and of Requests, increased the business, which accumulated with the wonderful growth of wealth and population in George III.'s reign, and with the proverbial dilatoriness of Lord Eldon, who held the scale almost continuously from 1801 to 1827. Even the new office of Vice-Chancellor of England, established in 1813, failed to relieve the congestion of causes, because an appeal lay against him to the Chancellor. A successful commission was at last appointed in 1825, whose labours were not wholly thwarted either by the apathy of Eldon or the presence of a number of Chancery lawyers; for the energy of Brougham, Campbell, and Westbury in time carried out these reforms, and that which was a necessary preliminary to them, the simplification and amendment of the law of real property. The present and preceding reigns have done more for these objects than all the previous centuries put together; additional Vice-Chancellors and clerks have been appointed, a court of appeal established, the common law side of the court and its bankruptcy business transferred elsewhere, the suits' fund re-arranged, and the procedure gradually simplified, while the court has been empowered (1858) to impose damages, try matters of fact by a jury, and take a judge as assessor without application to a common law court. When, about the same period (1854), common law courts were given the powers of an equity court as to examination of parties, discovery of documents, injunctions, &c., it became clear that the two ancient rivals were approximating to each other, and would soon be prepared to be reconciled or even amalgamated. The bill (1860) for this purpose was cut down by the influence of the Chancery lords; but in 1873 the Judicature Act was passed, which followed the advice of Lords Brougham, Westbury, and St. Leonards, and harmonised, without attempting completely to fuse, the two systems.

In IRELAND, there was a Lord Chancellor presiding over a separate court of equity, the growth of which has followed very closely the development of the English equity system. The earliest Chancellor was Stephen Ridel, appointed in 1189. In SCOTLAND, the functions of the Chancellor's Court in the thirteenth century were probably not very different from those of the same office in England. But as the Civil Law formed the basis of the Scottish legal system, the Chancellor became the chief administrator of law, not of an equitable system. In 1553, when the Court of Session was established, he became the chief judge of this court. In Scotland till the Reformation he was generally a churchman; and afterwards became a mere officer of state. On the union with England his separate functions were merged in those of the English Lord Chancellor.

Chandos, Sir John (d. 1369), was one of the most famous of the English generals during the French wars of Edward III.'s reign. He took part in all the great operations of the war. In 1362 he was appointed Constable of Guienne, and, in 1364, was sent over to Brittany to assist De Montfort, where he took Du Guesclin prisoner. In 1369 he was made Seneschal of Poitou, and, in the same year, fell in a skirmish with the French. Froissart gives him high praise both for his bravery and his clemency towards his prisoners.

Chandos of Sudeley (Sir John Brydges), Lord, accompanied Henry VIII. to France, 1513, when quite a boy. He greatly distinguished himself at the Battle of the Spurs (q.v.), and in 1549 successfully defended Boulogne, of which he was deputy governor, against the French. He subsequently became Lieutenant of the Tower, and had the custody of Lady Jane Grey and the Princess Elizabeth. He was a bigoted Papist, and assisted Mary, with whom he was a great favourite, in her persecution of the Reformers.

Channel Islands. THE, comprise the Bailiwicks of Jersey and Guernsey, the latter of which includes Sark, Herm, and Alderney, together with the small and unimportant islands of Jethou, Le Marchant, and the Casquets. They are interesting as being the last portion of the dukedom of Normandy remaining to England, which has possessed them ever since the Norman Conquest. In 550 they were granted by Childebert to a Saxon bishop, who soon afterwards converted most of the inhabitants to Christianity. The Channel Islands came into the possession of the Dukes of Normandy in the tenth century by the grant of Charles IV., and remained attached to the English crown when Philip II. conquered the rest of Normandy from King John. After the loss of Normandy by John, the Channel Islands were attacked by the French in the reign of Edward I., and again in that of Edward III., when Du Guesclin, the Constable of France, almost succeeded in reducing them. In the reign of Henry IV., they did fall into the hands of the French for a short time, but were retaken shortly afterwards by Sir Henry Harleston. Under Edward VI., Sark was also lost for a time. Towards the close of the sixteenth century, the Channel Islands were governed by Sir Walter Raleigh, and, during the Parliamentary wars, espoused warmly the side of the king, for which their government was put in commission by Cromwell. In 1779 the French made an ineffectual attempt to land, and in December, 1780, sent another expedition, under the Baron de Rullecourt, who succeeded in taking St. Helier in Jersey, although he was subsequently defeated and slain by the British troops. About the time of the Reformation, the islands became Protestant, and were attached to the diocese of Winchester. The Channel Islands, though under a governor appointed by the crown, have a constitution of their own. Jersey and Guernsey (with its dependencies) have each a lieutenant-governor and a bailiff, who presides over the States of Deliberation, and is nominated by the crown. The States of Deliberation of Jersey and Guernsey are composed of certain officials—the rectors of parishes, the judges of the courts, and constables of parishes (elected in Guernsey by the "States of Election," which consist of 222 ratepayers). The courts of justice are presided over by the bailiff, and judges elected by the ratepayers. This constitution has existed with but little alteration since the time of John. Guernsey is divided into ten parishes, and Jersey into twelve, some of which are included in municipal corporations, called "Central Douzaines." The official language of the law courts (whose procedure is based on the Norman) and of the legislature is French. The Queen's writ now runs in the Channel Islands.

Chapter, THE, is the body of clergy attached to the cathedral. Originally, this body was the assembly of the priests of the diocese round their bishop. It was the bishop's general council, and contained within it the bishop's officials for the administration of the diocese, and the clergy who had the care of the services of the cathedral itself.

The chapter in the bishop's council soon fell into disuse, and the name was applied almost entirely to the clergy of the cathedral church itself, who soon gained a position almost independent of their bishop. Chapters in England were of two kinds—monastic and secular [CATHEDRAL]. The monastic chapters were like monasteries, over which the bishop ranked as abbot, though the resident prior was the real head. These monks were in England Benedictines, except in the case of Carlisle, where they were Augustinians. In the secular chapters, the dean rises into prominence in the eleventh century. The work of his diocese, the necessity of constant journeys, and the increase of secular business undertaken by the bishop left the cathedrals without a head, and the chapters everywhere began to manage their business without their bishop. The theory that the chapter elected the bishops gave them at times a position of some importance, both towards the king and the Pope. Chapters frequently appealed to Rome against their bishops, and often were successful in obtaining privileges from the Pope. The separation of the chapter from the bishop became more and more definite, till the bishop was left with no powers save those of visitor over his chapter. The chief officers of the secular chapter were: the dean, who was head of the body; the precentor, who superintended the services; the chancellor, who was head of the educational and literary works of the chapter; and the treasurer, who had the care of all the treasures of the Church. Besides these there were the archdeacons, who were the sole survivors of the diocesan organisation of the chapter. Its other members were canons, as bound by the rule, or prebendaries, if they held an endowment besides their share of the corporate fund. This last body was generally non-resident, and their duties were performed by vicars, who are now called vicars-choral or minor canons. Under Henry VIII. the monasteries attached to the cathedrals were suppressed, and their chapters were refounded as secular chapters under a dean. After the same model the cathedrals of the new bishoprics founded by Henry VIII. were arranged. Hence came the two classes—Cathedrals of the Old Foundation and Cathedrals of the New Foundation. [CATHEDRAL.] An Act of 1838 reformed cathedral chapters by diminishing the number of canons, reducing their incomes, and bringing all chapters to greater uniformity. Chapters at present generally consist of a dean and four canons, though some of the richer cathedrals have six canons.

Anglo-Saxon Chron.; Henry of Huntingdon, Hist. Anglor.

Charlemont, JAMES CAULFIELD, 1ST EARL OF (b. 1728, d. 1799), was elected by the Irish Volunteers "General of the Patriot Army," in July, 1780. Soon after, he reviewed them in the north. In 1781 he opposed Catholic Emancipation, and was one of the leaders in the first and second conventions at Dungannon, and president of the Dublin convention. He went over to England with the Regency Bill, and signed the "Round Robin" of 1789. He was also the founder of the Northern Whig Club. On his estates the rebellion of 1798 assumed a peculiarly dangerous form. Mr. Froude speaks of him as "the most enthusiastic and the most feeble of revolutionary heroes."

Charles I., KING (b. Nov. 19, 1600, s. March 25, 1625, d. Jan. 31, 1649), second son of James I. and of Anne, daughter of Frederick II., King of Denmark, was born at Dunfermline. He was a handsome and athletic youth, with reserved and diffident manners. James's brilliant favourite, Buckingham, gained complete ascendancy over him, and in 1623 the two young men went to Madrid, with the object of bringing back with them, as Charles's bride, the Infanta. Buckingham, who had expected that he would readily prevail on the Spaniards to effect the restoration of the Palatinate, soon discovered his mistake; but the prince, unwilling to return home foiled in his object, refused to leave the country, making promises that it was impossible for him to perform, and allowing the Spaniards to suppose that he would become a Catholic. At last, finding that if he married the Infanta he would not be allowed to take her to England until his promises were performed, he returned, along with Buckingham, to England. In opposition to promises made to Parliament, Charles gained the hand of Henrietta Maria, sister of Louis XIII. of France, by consenting that the laws against English Catholics should not be enforced. Shortly before the marriage was consummated, James died, and Charles ascended the throne. Thus, he began his reign under ill auspices. He had made to Parliament and to the King of France promises incompatible with one another; and he was under the guidance of a man whose temerity and self-confidence were about to involve his country in a series of military disasters. Charles dissolved his two first Parliaments because they refused to support the policy of the duke. To war with Spain was added war with France. Money was raised by means of a forced loan, and persons refusing to lend were imprisoned. In 1628 a third Parliament met. Charles made concessions to public opinion by passing the Petition of Right (q.v.). Soon after the prorogation of Parliament, Buckingham was murdered by Felton; and the king for the future himself directed the policy of his government. Though Buckingham was removed, there was small hope of good understanding between Charles and the nation. Charles had no desire to make alterations in government. He, indeed, prided himself, when involved in any dispute with a subject, on having the law on his side; but he was content to rest his case on legal subtleties, or to obtain his end by the appointment of subservient judges. Moreover, while he claimed the right to nominate ministers at will, and to pursue whatever policy seemed good to himself, he failed to perceive that the authority of his predecessors had remained unquestioned only when they had ruled in accordance with national desires and aspirations. Charles had no sympathy for the holders of Calvin's creed, who formed the majority of thoughtful and earnest men at that time. Within the Church had grown up a small party, the so-called Arminians, holding doctrines akin to those of the Church of Rome. Each party desired to suppress the other, and Charles, who favoured the Arminians, was incapable of holding the balance evenly between the two. Parliament met again in 1629, only to be angrily dissolved, because the Commons refused to give the king a grant of tonnage and poundage until he should consent to pursue the Church policy approved by them.

For eleven years Charles ruled without Parliaments. His government became intensely unpopular. Peace was made with both France and Spain; but it was difficult to provide for the ordinary expenses out of the fixed revenue, and hence old rights of the crown were once more enforced, and money raised by means which brought little into the exchequer, while they irritated large numbers of persons. The system culminated in the imposition of ship-money, when Charles, being desirous of having a fleet in the Channel, imposed what was really a heavy tax on the country. North of the Humber, the Court of the North, under the presidency of Lord Wentworth, in the south, the Court of Star Chamber, punished by fines and imprisonment persons who refused to submit to demands of which the legality was questionable. At the same time, under the direction of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, an ecclesiastical policy was pursued which ran directly contrary to the current of popular feeling, and rendered both the bishops and the Court of High Commission objects of general odium. The attempt to impose a Church service, similar to the English, in Presbyterian Scotland, led to the rising in arms of the Scots. Charles summoned Wentworth, now created Earl of Strafford, to his side from Ireland, and called a Parliament, which he dissolved in three weeks, because it refused to support him in carrying on war against the Scots. The advance of a Scottish army into the kingdom compelled him in the autumn of this year (1641) to summon another—the celebrated Long Parliament.

Charles was for the time unable to resist the demands of the popular representatives. He gave his consent to whatever bills were offered to him, and passed a bill of attainder against his faithful servant Strafford, to whom he had promised that not a hair of his head should be injured. [STRAFFORD; LONG PARLIAMENT.] In 1641 he went to Scotland, with the object of forming a royalist party there, and on his return to London went in person to the House of Commons, to arrest five members, whom he accused of high treason (Jan. 3, 1642). [FIVE MEMBERS.] The attempt having failed, he left London, to prepare for war; and on Aug. 22 the royal standard was unfurled at Nottingham. A considerable army soon gathered round him. Men who thought that the concessions already made were sufficient to prevent abuse of the royal authority, as well as all lovers of the existing form of Church service, took his side. At Edgehill, his cavalry, composed of country gentlemen, readily proved its superiority to the Parliamentarian horse. But want of subordination prevented his officers acting in union, and deprived him of victory. Charles could not maintain discipline himself, nor did he depute authority to those who possessed the art. High commands were given to the wrong men, and officers were allowed to act independently of one another. Hence, the royal strategy broke down, while the gallantry of individuals was spent in vain against the disciplined troops that Cromwell brought into the field. The passing of the Self-Denying Ordinance (q.v.) placed all the forces of the Parliament under the control of the Independents. Led by Fairfax and Cromwell, the remodelled army destroyed at Naseby (June 14, 1645) the last army which Charles was able to bring into the field. The king now authorised Glamorgan to conclude a secret treaty with the Irish Catholics, promising to allow them the free exercise of their religion if they would place 20,000 men at his service (Aug. 12). In April, 1646, to avoid being made a prisoner by the Parliament's officers, Charles took refuge with the Scotch army near Newark. The Scots, however, were not ready to take the part of the king while he refused to allow the establishment of a Presbyterian Church in England; and on the withdrawal of their army into Scotland in January, 1647, they surrendered him into the power of the English Parliament.

The Parliament demanded of Charles that he should abandon his right to appoint either ministers of state or officers of the militia, and that he should consent to the establishment of the Presbyterian Church in England. On the other hand, the Independents were willing that Episcopacy should be maintained, if toleration were granted to Dissenters. Charles expected to be able to play one party off against the other, and by such means to recover the whole of his former prerogatives. During the war, he had negotiated at once with Presbyterians, Independents, and Irish Catholics; and, in spite of the distrust that his conduct excited, he still pursued the same course. From Hampton Court, where he was under the charge of the army, he fled to the Isle of Wight, and put himself under the protection of Colonel Hammond, the governor of Carisbrooke Castle. Here he concluded a secret treaty with the Scots, promising to establish the Presbyterian Church in England for three years if they would send an army into England to restore him to his throne. The Civil War again revived; zealots rose in arms, while the Scots, led by the Duke of Hamilton, crossed the border. Fairfax suppressed the Royalists, while Cromwell crushed the invaders at Warrington, in Lancashire (Aug. 19, 1648). The army returned to London, demanding that Charles should pay with his life for the blood that he had caused to be shed. The Commons, forcibly purged of the more moderate Presbyterians, voted that it was treason for the King of England to levy war against the Parliament and the kingdom, and passed an ordinance for instituting a High Court of Justice, composed of men of their own party. As the House of Lords refused to take part in the proceedings, they further resolved that whatever is enacted by the Commons has the force of law without the consent of the king or the House of Peers. The trial was held publicly in Westminster Hall. One hundred and thirty-five judges had been named on the ordinance; but only about eighty, amongst whom were Cromwell and Ireton, attended the sittings of the court. Bradshaw, Cromwell's cousin, presided. Charles was accused of having endeavoured to overturn the liberties of the people, and of being a tyrant, traitor, and murderer. He refused persistently to answer to the charge, on the ground that the court had no lawful authority derived from the people of England by which to try him. Sentence of death was pronounced against him; and on Jan. 30, 1649, he was executed on a scaffold raised in front of the Banqueting House at Whitehall, in presence of a vast crowd, which, had the decision rested with it, would eagerly have delivered him from death. [GREAT REBELLION; COMMONWEALTH; LONG PARLIAMENT.]

Internal affairs during the reign of Charles I. are best studied in the Calendar of State Papers (Domestic Series). The Hardwicke Papers contain materials relating to the French and Spanish matches, the expedition to the Isle of Rhé, and the Scotch troubles of 1637-41.

The Memorials and Letters published by Sir Daniel Dalrymple; The Court and Times of Charles I., by Thomas Birch; Halliwell's Letters of the Kings of England; The Letters of Charles I. to Henrietta Maria, edited for the Camden Society by John Bruce; The Arrest of the Five Men-bers, by John Forster—are works which throw light on the character of the king and the motives of his actions. A Royalist account of the years 1644 and 1645, and of the negotiations carried on in the Isle of Wight in 1648, is to be found in Sir Edward Walker's Historical Discourses; and of the king's personal history during the last two years of his life, in Sir Thomas Herbert's Memoirs. [B. M. G.]

Charles II., KING (b. May 29, 1630, s. May 8, 1660, d. Feb. 6, 1685), was the eldest son of Charles I. and Henrietta Maria. In his ninth year he was created Prince of Wales, and when the Civil War broke out he accompanied his father at the battle of Edgehill. In 1644 he was the nominal head of the royal forces in the west of England; but on the decline of the royal cause he was obliged to retire to Scilly, to Jersey, and eventually to France. When matters appeared to be drawing to extremity with the king, several of the ships of the Parliament went over to the prince, who made some attempts to blockade the Thames, and even landed near Deal, but was soon obliged to withdraw to Holland, whence, in the hope of saving his father's life, he despatched to the intending regicides a paper signed and sealed, but otherwise blank, for them to insert their own conditions. On the death of his father in January, 1649, Charles assumed the title of king, and in February he was proclaimed King of Scotland at Edinburgh. In 1650 he came over to Scotland, and, having taken the Covenant, was crowned at Scone on January 1, 1651. Charles exhibited courage and conduct in opposing Cromwell's troops before Edinburgh, but his cause was hopeless from the first, owing to the discord among his supporters. He suddenly determined to leave Scotland and march into England, and succeeded in getting as far as Worcester, where (September 3, 1651) he received so severe a defeat that his cause seemed utterly ruined. Charles escaped from the battle, and after an adventurous flight of forty-four days, through the western counties and along the south coast—during the early part of which he owed his safety entirely to the fidelity of a labouring family—he succeeded in finding a ship near Brighton, which landed him safely in France. For the next nine years he led a wandering life in France, Germany, and the Low Countries, sometimes relieved and sometimes repulsed, according as the various sovereigns or their ministers threw off or yielded to their dread of Cromwell. He was accompanied by a few faithful adherents; but his little court was also beset by intriguing turbulent men and spies, who betrayed his counsels and caused the numerous attempted risings of his friends both in England and Scotland. At length, on the death of Cromwell, it became obvious to most persons in England that the only hope of establishing a settled form of government and of saving the country from a military despotism, lay in restoring the monarchy; and, chiefly through the instrumentality of General Monk, Charles was invited to return to England. He at once complied, and entered London in triumph on May 29, 1660, having previously signed the Declaration of Breda (q.v.). During the first years of his reign, when the king was largely under the guidance of Clarendon, matters went smoothly. The Parliament was ardently Royalist, and supported the English Church by passing stringent laws against Catholics and Dissenters; but the failure of the Dutch War in 1665, the maladministration of the government, and the misappropriation of the public money, led to the downfall of Clarendon (1667). In 1668 (January) Sir William Temple concluded the Triple Alliance between England, France, and Sweden. But the "Cabal" ministry speedily came into office, and reversed this policy for one of alliance with the French king and hostility to Holland. Finally, the infamous Treaty of Dover was signed (1670); Charles became a pensionary of Louis, and war was declared against Holland. The attempt of the king to get toleration for the Catholics by issuing a Declaration of Indulgence caused the passing of the Test Act (1673) by Parliament, and the consequent fall of the Cabal administration. With this began the great struggle between the king and the opposition, headed by Shaftesbury, during which Charles showed the greatest prudence. He yielded to the storm caused by the pretended Popish Plot (q.v.), but steadily refused to alter the succession by excluding his brother James. The violence and cruelty of the Whig leaders, together with the discovery of the Rye House Plot (q.v.), turned the tide in the king's favour. He gained a complete victory over his opponents, and was able for the last three years of his life to reign without Parliament and free from all opposition. In 1662 Charles married Catherine of Braganza, daughter of John of Portugal, but had no children by her. His private life was characterised by great profligacy, and he had a large number of mistresses, and no less than twelve illegitimate children, among whom were James, Duke of Monmouth; Henry Fitzroy (son of the Duchess of Cleveland), ancestor of the Dukes of Grafton; Charles Beauclerc (son of Nell Gwynn), ancestor of the Dukes of St. Albans; and Charles Lennox (son of the Duchess of Portsmouth), ancestor of the Dukes of Richmond. Charles, in spite of his licentiousness and his extreme selfishness, was possessed of much talent. The natural champion of the principle of hereditary right at a time when hereditary right was exposed to attack, Charles's position was one of considerable difficulty. He played his part dexterously, and with considerable ability, and it cannot be denied that he showed much capacity for governing.

Clarendon, Life, and Burnet, Hist. of His Own Time, both of which must be read with caution; Barillon's Letters, and Temple's Works (and especially the Memoir from the Peace), contain much information on the diplomatic history. Charles, EDWARD. [PRETENDER, THE YOUNG.]

Charlotte Augusta, PRINCESS (b. Jan. 7, 1796, d. Nov. 6, 1816), was the daughter of George IV. and Caroline of Brunswick. Owing to the disunion of her parents, her earlier years were passed in retirement, away from the court, under the care of the Dowager Duchess of Leeds, Lady Clifford, and the Bishop of Exeter. She early gave proofs of a noble character and intellectual qualities above the average. She was destined by her father to marry William, Prince of Orange; but her own affections had been fixed on Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, who became, in 1830, King of the Belgians. Yielding to her father's desire, the princess agreed to marry the Prince of Orange, and the betrothal was arranged between them, when the princess broke off the match, partly in anger at her father's conduct to her mother, partly because of her repugnance to the prince. In 1815 she was married to Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, and in the following year (Nov.) died in giving birth to a son, who did not survive her. Her death caused great grief throughout the entire nation.

Charmouth is a village on the Dorsetshire coast, about two miles from Lyme Regis. In 836 Egbert was defeated here by the Danes, and in 840 his son Ethelwulf met with a like disaster at the same place.

Charnock, ROBERT (d. 1696), a Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, became a Roman Catholic, and supported James in his illegal ejection of the Protestant Fellows of his college by means of the Court of High Commission. After the Revolution, he became one of the most active of the Jacobite conspirators, and was among the chief organisers of the Assassination Plot (1696). He was arrested, and his trial began on March 11. The new Act for regulating procedure in cases of high treason was not to come into force until the 25th. It allowed the prisoner to examine his witnesses on oath, compel their attendance at court, and have the service of counsel. The prisoners, Charnock, King, and Keyes, claimed, not without reason, to have their trial postponed till that date. Their request was, however, refused, and they were all condemned. Charnock left behind him a paper in which he justified the plot, on the ground that William was a usurper, and by an appeal to the laws of human society. [ASSASSINATION PLOT.]

Charter, THE GREAT, &c. [GREAT CHARTER, &c.]

Charter Schools (IRELAND). In 1730, an association, with the primate, Archbishop Boulter, and the Lord Chancellor, at its head, was formed to provide Protestant education gratis for the Catholic poor. Before that time, in spite of a statute of Henry VIII., Protestants had to rely on private enterprise entirely as far as education was concerned. In 1733 a charter was granted to the association, but only on condition that the endowment was not to exceed £2,000 a year. On Oct. 24, 1733, the corporation began its work; day-schools and boarding-schools were established. They were really industrial schools. After five years' schooling, children were bound out as apprentices at the expense of the society (girls got a small portion on marrying), and the whole cost of education for one child came, in the day-schools, to only £9 per annum. The boarding-schools increased from four to fifty, and George II. granted £1,000 from his privy purse in their support. The day-schools soon came to an end, but the boarding-schools were supported by parliamentary grants after 1746, when a special tax was devoted to this object. Altogether, by 1767, £112,000 had been devoted to the Charter schools. In 1750, parents were forbidden to take back their children, when once they had entered, and thus to prevent their becoming Protestants. Soon afterwards the society was allowed to take up all children between five and twelve found loitering about, and put them into their schools. However, by 1757, whether it was on account of the determination of the Catholics not to be enticed into changing their children's religion, or for other reasons, it became clear that the Charter schools were a failure. Howard, in 1758, investigated this school system, and brought to light great abuses; a parliamentary committee appointed in consequence found children who had been at school for twelve years unable to spell. Still, for twenty-five years after the Union they continued to exist, and vast sums were spent on the education of some 2,000 children. Mr. Froude calls the Charter schools "the best-conceived educational institutions which existed in the world," while Mr. Lecky says of them that they "excited in Ireland an intensity of bitterness hardly equalled by any portion of the penal code." Of one thing there can be no doubt: they completely failed in their object—the conversion of the Irish peasantry to Protestantism.

Chartists (1838—48) was the name given to the members of a party in England who supported certain reforms which were generally known as the "People's Charter." The Charter consisted of six points, viz.: (1) manhood suffrage; (2) equal electoral districts; (3) vote by ballot; (4) annual Parliaments; (5) abolition of property qualification for members; (6) payment of members. These points seem first to have been urged together at a meeting held at Birmingham on August 6, 1838, where the chief speakers were Attwood, Scholefield, and Feargus O'Connor. A similar meeting was held in London in the following September. During the following year the cause was advocated by tumultuous meetings and processions, which had to be put down by the law, and a petition, the size of a coach-wheel, said to be signed by a million and a quarter petitioners, was rolled into the House of Commons. Riots took place at Birmingham, Newcastle, and Newport. Feargus O'Connor was arrested. On May 2, 1842, another monster petition, purporting to contain more than three million signatures, was brought to the House of Commons. Mr. T. Duncombe proposed that the petitioners should be heard at the bar by counsel, while Macaulay, Peel, and Roebuck spoke on the other side. After this the agitation slumbered till 1848, when a huge meeting was held on Kennington Common on April 10. The intention was to carry to the House of Commons a monster petition with five million signatures. There was great fear lest London should be the scene of a rising, and the Duke of Wellington took measures for protecting the Bank, Custom House, Exchange, Post Office, and other public buildings. A quarter of a million inhabitants of London were enrolled as special constables. The duke disposed his troops with masterly skill, so as to keep them out of sight. The meeting proved a failure, owing to dissensions between the leaders of the Chartists, and no disturbance took place. Similar precautions were again taken in June, but the threatened demonstration ended in smoke. On August 16 an arrest of armed Chartists was made at the "Orange Tree" public-house, in Orange Street, London, and some more in Green Street. It was understood that there was a plot to attack the different clubs about midnight, and also the principal buildings in the metropolis. The chief ringleaders were tried and punished. This latter outbreak of Chartism was connected with the revolutionary disturbances which took place throughout Europe in 1849. After this, Chartism expired, and agitation took a different form. It is strange that reforms so unequal in importance, and some of them so little calculated to effect the end aimed at by their promoters, should have been advocated with such an amount of passion.

[O. B.]

Chartley Manor, in Staffordshire, was at one time the place of Mary Queen of Scots' imprisonment. In 1585—86 she was at her own request removed here from the care of Sir Amyas Paulet at Tutbury. Chartley was well known to Walsingham's spy Gifford, and this afforded the latter exceptional facilities for copying the treasonable correspondence of the captive queen.

Chatham was a village of small importance till the establishment of a dockyard and naval arsenal in the time of Queen Elizabeth, when preparations were being made to resist the Spanish Armada. The dockyards were improved under Charles I. and the Commonwealth, and the fortifications strengthened after the attack of the Dutch in 1667. These were enlarged and strengthened between 1757 and 1808, and during the present century Chatham has been rendered one of the most important dockyards and strongest naval fortresses in the world.

Chatham, WILLIAM PITT, 1ST EARL OF (b. Nov. 15, 1708, d. May 11, 1778), was the grandson of a former governor of Madras, who had returned to England to buy estates and rotten boroughs, one of which, Old Sarum, he represented in Parliament. His son Robert succeeded him, and sat in turn for the two boroughs of Old Sarum and Oakhampton. Of Robert Pitt's two sons, William was the younger. He was educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Oxford, but he left Oxford, without taking a degree, to travel on the Continent on account of the gout, to which he was throughout his life a victim. He came back from his tour to find his father dead and himself but slenderly provided for. As a profession he chose the army, and obtained a cornetcy in the Blues; but his family interest in 1735 procured for him the seat of Old Sarum. In April, 1736, the Prince of Wales married Augusta, Princess of Saxe Gotha; and it was on the address which was presented to the king on this occasion that Pitt took the opportunity of delivering his first speech, which made a deep impression on the House. This impression was soon justified, as he became so troublesome to the government, that Sir Robert Walpole dismissed him from the army. The Prince of Wales, however, recompensed him by making him his Groom of the Bedchamber, from which position he could in security de-claim against the peace policy of the ministry. In 1741 Walpole resigned; and it was for some time doubtful who would succeed him. Pitt seems to have made overtures to Walpole, which the retiring minister rejected. In the new government that was formed under Carteret, Pitt was entirely left out. He vented his disappointment in the fiercest invectives against Walpole, and in advocating the most violent measures for his prosecution. All his violence failed to injure Sir Robert, now the Earl of Orford, who retired into private life, and left Pitt free to transfer his attacks to Carteret, who now held the reins. The chief object of his indignation was the prevailing method of subsidising with English money petty German States, for the benefit of the family estates of the House of Brunswick. The old Duchess of Marlborough died in October, 1744, and left Pitt a legacy of £10,000 "in consideration of the noble defence he had made for the laws of England, and to prevent the ruin of his country." But Pitt's ambition did not lie in the direction of money; and on the elevation of Carteret to the House of Lords he saw a chance of advancement. To take advantage, however, of the chance, it was necessary for him to conciliate the king; and he accordingly resigned his office in the household of the Prince of Wales, and by the exertions of the Pelhams, against the king's wishes, he was appointed early in 1746 to the post of Paymaster of the Forces. The government continued in security until the death of Henry Pelham, in 1754, threw it into confusion. It devolved on the Duke of Newcastle to form a ministry. His great difficulty was as to the leadership of the House of Commons; and the rival claims of Pitt and Fox to that office were settled by a compromise in the person of Sir Thomas Robinson, an inoffensive mediocrity. Pitt was appointed secretary of state, and Fox retired to the lucrative Pay Office; but before a year was over they had combined to render their leader so ridiculous that Newcastle was compelled to make a change. Pitt was intractable on the subject of subsidies; and the duke turned to Fox, who became secretary of state, with the entire lead of the House of Commons and the management of the funds for corruption. On the resignation of Newcastle, in November, 1756, the Duke of Devonshire succeeded him as first lord of the Treasury, with Pitt as first secretary of state and virtual prime minister. The ministry was odious to the king, who said that he was not a king while he was "in the hands of these scoundrels;" and in April, 1757, Pitt and Lord Temple were dismissed from their offices. But the contumely which Pitt had experienced from the court only served to raise him in the estimation of the country at large. The freedom of the City was granted to him; all the great towns of England followed the example set by the Corporation of London; and "for some weeks," says Walpole, "it rained gold boxes." During his short term of office Pitt found time and courage to pass several important measures, including his bold scheme of pacifying the discontented Highlanders by embodying them in the regular army. Newcastle having failed to form a ministry, an agreement was at length arrived at between the duke and Pitt, through the mediation of Lord Chesterfield. The king, however, refused to receive Pitt as a minister, and persuaded Lord Waldegrave to accept with great reluctance the premiership. But without Pitt it was impossible for any ministry to work; and Lord Waldegrave's broke up almost before it was formed. The king was obliged to yield to necessity. Newcastle took the Treasury; Pitt became secretary of state, with the lead of the Lower House; and Fox was silenced by the gains of the Pay Office. Pitt had told the Duke of Devonshire that he was sure he could save the country, and that no one else could. And he lost no time in setting about the task. His early plans, however, were not attended with success. An expedition against Rochefort failed through the bad management of the land forces. In Germany, Cumberland was compelled to sign the humiliating Convention of Kloster-Seven. In India, the conspicuous success of Clive in some measure compensated for these misfortunes. The war was vigorously carried on throughout 1758 in every part of the globe where Frenchmen could be found; still the year was marked by no great victories on either side. But in 1759 Pitt's energy, and his tact in choosing men, were everywhere rewarded by the extraordinary successes by land and sea which marked that year of victory. These victories gave Pitt a position of extraordinary influence. He was known as the "great commoner;" and the Houses of Parliament no less than the people at large were hushed into awe and reverence by the success of his measures. But the death of George II. on October 25, 1760, changed the face of affairs; and it was clear that the new king's partiality for Lord Bute would be more powerful than the nation's love of Pitt. In March, 1761, Parliament was dissolved; and with it the ministry began to break up. Bute was made secretary of state in the place of Lord Holderness. But Pitt was determined, if possible, to save the country from a degrading peace; and he held on until finding his brother-in-law, Lord Temple, alone supported him in the council in his desire for war with France and Spain, he resigned on October 5, 1761. He had scorned all promotion and all gains for himself, but accepted a peerage for his wife, who was created Baroness Chatham. In Nov., 1762, peace was made with France; and Bute could no longer stand before the open opposition of Pitt and the fury of the nation, and in April, 1763, he resigned. A new ministry was formed out of the followers of the Duke of Bedford and those of Grenville, whose tenure of office was signalised by the persecution of Wilkes, and the still more fatal attempt to tax the American colonies. Pitt meanwhile opposed all his eloquence to the doctrine of the legality of general warrants, and pointed out the mischief of Grenville's scheme for colonial taxation. His health became very bad, and he retired into the country and took no part in the debates on the Regency Bill. This bill, however, was the ruin of the Bedford ministry; and the king resolved to be rid of Grenville's bullying arrogance. Overtures were twice made to Pitt through the Duke of Cumberland; but they failed. He retired to his estate in Somersetshire, as if bent on finally withdrawing from public life; and the Rockingham ministry was formed. In January, 1766, Pitt came up to London, and by his able assistance enabled the ministry to carry the repeal of the Stamp Act. The government was, however, too weak to stand; and in July Pitt at length consented to break with Temple, and to form a ministry without him. But he was suffering both mentally and physically: he could not stand the strain of the House of Commons; he accepted the Privy Seal, and was created Earl of Chatham. It was felt throughout the country that he had been gained over to the court; and the popularity, which had been so lavishly bestowed on him as the "great commoner," failed to follow him to the Upper House. His policy was as energetic and comprehensive as ever; but his mind was unhinged, and at last gave way so far as to incapacitate him for all public business. He was taken to Hayes, and remained there in gloomy seclusion for two years. In October, 1768, he resigned the Privy Seal, and the ministry came to an end. Soon after his resignation, Chatham's mental malady passed away before an attack of the gout sharper than usual. In July, 1769, he once more appeared at court, after a reconciliation had been effected with the Grenvilles, and in the following January he again took his place among the Lords. He had lost none of his old power, and his first speech, inveighing against the policy pursued by the government towards America and in relation to the Middlesex election, was the signal for the resignation of Lord Camden and the Marquis of Granby. The Duke of Grafton himself, wearied by the continual onslaughts made upon him, and finding it impossible any longer to prop up his falling ministry, sent in his resignation on January 22. Lord North proceeded to form a ministry after the king's own heart, which would be content to carry out the king's wishes. Wilkes and America continued to be the chief topics; North in both points adhered to the policy of his predecessors, and Chatham continued to wage war against it. He warmly advocated the repeal of the Test Acts, for which a bill was introduced. During the greater part of 1773 he employed himself in the study of India, and became strongly convinced of the "necessity of a reformation of Indian iniquities." But as the clouds every month thickened in America, they dispelled all other thoughts, and caused him more and more to dread the application of coercion to the colonists. The Boston Port Bill heightened his alarm; and in May, 1774, he appeared in Parliament "to stand for England and America." In Jan., 1775, he moved an address to the king, praying him to adopt a conciliatory policy towards America by removing the forces from Boston, and he followed up this motion by presenting to Parliament a plan for the prevention of civil war. The object of his conduct was, as he himself briefly expressed it, "to secure to the colonies property and liberty, and to ensure to the mother country a due acknowledgment on the part of the colonies of their subordination to the supreme legislative authority and superintending power of the Parliament of Great Britain." As long as there was any hope of the attainment of these two ends, Chatham was as warm an advocate as anyone for granting liberty to the colonies; but when the news of the capitulation of Burgoyne came in Dec., 1777, followed almost immediately by the announcement of the alliance of America and France, it became clear that the Americans would be content with nothing short of entire independence; and Chatham was as firm in his opposition to this concession as he had been zealous in favour of granting them liberty and justice. At this point Chatham broke away from his long agreement with Rockingham's party, but carried Shelburne with him. On April 7th, 1778, he made his last speech in Parliament; and the effort was too much for him. He was carried to Hayes, and there died on May 11th. A monument was raised to him in Westminster Abbey at the expense of the nation. Lord Chatham was essentially a war minister. It has been said of him that whenever a cannon in Europe was fired he required to know the reason. The epitaph on his monument in Westminster Abbey says, truly enough, that during his administration Great Britain was exalted "to a height of prosperity and glory unknown to any former age."

1570, 1578, and 1581 the prison of Mary Queen of Scots. It was subsequently garrisoned by the Roundheads in 1643, and by the Cavaliers two years later.

Cheke, SIR JOHN (b. 1514, d. 1557), is well known as the tutor of King Edward VI., whose education he undertook in conjunction with Sir Anthony Cook. In reward for his services he was made Provost of King's College, Cambridge, and a Privy Councillor. On the accession of Mary, Cheke was imprisoned for the sympathy which he had shown for the cause of Lady Jane Grey, from whom he had accepted the office of Secretary of State. On his release he went abroad and settled at Strasburg, but, having gone to visit Sir John Mason at Brussels, was captured on the way, and sent to England, where he was confined in the Tower. Cheke, who was a zealous Protestant, and "one of the most godly men of those days," was kept in confinement until hard usage wrung from him a renunciation of his real convictions. He was then released, but is said to have died of shame at his recantation. He was a voluminous and able writer, and did much for the literature of England. Besides being the tutor of King Edward VI., he was also the tutor of William Cecil, Lord Burleigh. He was one of the earliest and greatest of English Greek scholars of the Renaissance; and in particular set himself to reform the corrupt pronunciation of his time. His fame was still living at Cambridge in Milton's days, and the poet refers to him in Sonnet XI. :—

"Thy Age, like ours, O soul of Sir John Cheke, Hated not learning worse than loud or ass,
When thou taughtst at Cambridge and King Edward Greek."

Chester was probably a Roman military station, as its Celtic name, "Caerleon Vawr," would seem to attest. It is called Deva in the Roman geographical writings, and would seem, at any rate, to have been a trading-place of importance. In 894 it was captured by the Danes, who were, however, forced to surrender it to the English. It was a place of considerable importance as being the frontier town of the Welsh Marches. The Conqueror established an earldom of Chester, and Hugh Lupus, his nephew, became its palatine. He built the castle and founded the abbey of St. Werburgh. In 1237 the earldom was seized by Henry III., and has since been a royal appanage. In 1300, Edward, Prince of Wales, received the homage of the Welsh princes at Chester; and here for a time Henry IV. held Richard II. captive. The city suffered severely in the plagues of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and especially in 1602-5. In 1642 Charles I. arrived in Chester. The citizens were warmly Royalist. From July, 1643, until 1646, the city was continuously besieged or blockaded by the Parliamentarian forces, and at last honourably surrendered in February of the latter year. Great riots, however, occurred on the occasion of the visit of the Duke of Monmouth in 1683. Chester was created a bishopric by Henry VIII. in 1541, and its fine abbey church of St. Werburgh became the cathedral.

Chesterfield, PHILIP DORMER STANHOPE, 4TH EARL OF (b. 1694, d. 1773), was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. On the accession of George I., he was made Gentleman of the Bodchamber to the Prince of Wales. He sat as member for St. Germain's in 1715. The division between the Prince of Wales and the court soon drove him into opposition in spite of the entreaties of his relative, General Stanhope, and he joined the discontented Whigs. [WALPOLE.] He had great expectations from George II. on his accession; but had the misfortune to offend Queen Caroline. The death of his father in the previous year removed him to the Upper House. In 1728 he was sent as ambassador to the Hague, and on his return was made High Steward of the Household, but was dismissed in 1733 by Walpole for his opposition to the Excise scheme. Forthwith he became a prominent member of the Opposition, and in 1737 made a magnificent speech against the Playhouse Bill. In 1741 he went abroad; and at Avignon met Ormonde, with whom it is said he attempted to concert measures for a Jacobite combination against Walpole. He was excluded from office under Pelham's administration; and continued in opposition, directing his attacks especially against the employment of Hanoverian troops, and the foreign policy of Carteret. At length, in 1744, the king's repugnance was so far overcome that he was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. His administration of this office deserves the highest praise, and his firm government checked any tendency there might be to imitate the example of the Scotch revolvers in 1745. In 1745 he was again sent to Holland, where his negotiations induced the Dutch to send troops to the campaign which terminated in the battle of Fontenoy. In 1746 he became Secretary of State. He aimed at governing the king through his mistress, Lady Yarmouth, but finding that he could make no progress in bringing about a peace, he resigned in 1748. He still continued to speak, and in 1751 proposed and carried out the reformation of the calendar. In 1752 he lost his hearing. In 1757 he was asked to negotiate between Pitt and Newcastle during the intrigues which led to the formation of that great ministry known by their names. In 1768 his natural son, Philip, the object of the greatest care and affection on his part, and to whom he had addressed his famous Letters to his Son on which his literary fame largely rests, died, and from that time Chesterfield's life was desolate and cheerless. "Chesterfield was," says his biographer, Dr. Maty, "a nobleman unequalled in his time for variety of talents, brilliancy of wit, and elegance of conversation." Lord Stanhope, referring to his political career, says that "diplomacy was especially suited to his tastes and talents. At home, his career, though never inspired by a high and pervading patriotism, deserves the praise of humane, liberal and far-sighted policy. His defects were a want of generosity, dissimulation carried beyond justifiable bounds . . . and a looseness of religious principle."

Cheyne, SIR THOMAS, Treasurer of the Household to Henry VIII., was appointed one of the Council of Executors by the king's will, 1547. Having served in the Scottish expedition of 1547, he was made Warden of the Cinque Ports, and in 1549 he was sent on behalf of the Council to the Emperor Charles V. In 1553 he is found in strong opposition to Northumberland's scheme of altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey, and in Wyatt's Rebellion (q.v.), 1554, he did good service for the queen in Kent.

Chichele, HENRY (b. circa 1362, d. 1443), is said to have owed his education to William of Wykeham, and certainly was a student on Wykeham's foundations at Winchester and Oxford. He was frequently employed on diplomatic business by Henry IV., and in 1408 was made Bishop of St. David's. In 1409 he was one of the English delegates to the Council of Pisa, and in 1414 was raised to the see of Canterbury. He accompanied Henry V. on his second and third expeditions to France, and crowned Queen Catherine. Chichele has been greatly blamed for inciting Henry V. to go to war against France, and it was generally believed that the French war was encouraged by the clergy, to divert popular attention from the wealth, luxury, and corruption of the Church. But this view rests on no historical basis, though it is not improbable that Chichele and the other bishops did lend their sanction to the king's ambition. Chichele is also accused of being a persecutor, but it would seem that his aversion to the Lollards was political rather than religious; for that sect was regarded as hostile to the dynasty, and a foe to all social order as well as to the Church. During Henry VI.'s reign, Chichele seems to have confined himself almost entirely to his clerical duties. In 1437 he founded All Souls College at Oxford, and was meditating the resignation of his see when he was removed by death. Chichele boldly resisted the pretensions of the Pope, who was desirous of getting the Statute of Præmunire repealed, and when the papal party retaliated by accusing him of avarice, the barons, the bishops, and the University of Oxford came forward to bear testimony to the merits of the archbishop.

Chichester, ARTHUR, LORD (d. 1625), was Lord-Deputy of Ireland from 1604 to 1616, when he became Lord High Treasurer. It was under his government that the Plantation of Ulster was carried out. In 1613, he held a Parliament for the first time in twenty-seven years; but in order to diminish the Catholic majority he was lavish in the creation of new boroughs. The opposition was in the end overcome after some disgraceful scenes, but only on the understanding that the Penal Laws would not be enforced. They then consented to the attainder of O'Neil and his associates. The lands of Sir Cahir O'Doherty of Innisowen were granted to Chichester, and formed the bulk of the large estates left by him to the present representatives of the family, the Marquises of Donegal.

Chichester, a cathedral town, is built on the site of a Roman settlement, and is generally identified with Regnum mentioned in the Itinerary of Antoninus. It appears to have been a place of some trade. The town was destroyed by Ella, and restored by his son, Cissa, from whom it received its modern name. In 1083 the Sussex bishopric of Selsey was removed to Chichester. The cathedral, consecrated in 1108, was burnt down, and rebuilt at the close of the twelfth century. The city was incorporated in 1213. The town was Royalist in the Civil War, and was captured and held for the Parliamentarians by Sir W. Waller.

Chief Justice. [JUSTICES.]

Childers, HUGH CULLING EARDLEY (b. 1827), was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and proceeded to Australia in 1850. He was a member of the Victoria government from his arrival till his return to England as agent-general for that colony in 1857. He was elected member for Pontefract (1860), and served on various commissions and select committees. He became a Lord of the Admiralty in April, 1864, and Financial Secretary to the Treasury, 1865, retiring with his party, 1866. In 1868 he accepted office under Mr. Gladstone as First Lord of the Admiralty, but was soon compelled to resign owing to ill health. In Jan., 1872, he again accepted the office of agent-general for Victoria in this country, and the same year became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In 1883, he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer in Mr. Gladstone's second ministry.

Chillianwalla, THE BATTLE OF (Jan. 14, 1849), was fought during the second Sikh War. After an interchange of shots from the Sikh and English pickets, Lord Gough gave the word to attack the position of Shere

Sing at three in the afternoon. General Campbell [CLYDE] moved forward his division in two brigades. His own victoriously advanced to the front, seized and spiked the guns; but the second was torn to pieces by a fire of grape and musketry, and the attack would have failed had not General Campbell advanced rapidly to the rescue, and captured the guns which were pouring in this deadly fire. Sir Walter Gilbert's two divisions were successful on the right, but not without serious loss. The cavalry brigade under Brigadier Pope got entangled in trees and brushwood, and owing to some mistake, retreated, but the left brigade, under Sir Joseph Thackwell, behaved with great gallantry. The result was that when darkness put an end to the struggle Lord Gough found himself master of unknown ground in the dark, and uncertain as to the whereabouts of the enemy, after a victory which was the nearest possible approach to a defeat. He was compelled, therefore, to withdraw to Chillianwalla. [SIKH WARS.]

Chillingworth, WILLIAM (b. 1602, d. 1644), was educated at Oxford, and obtained a fellowship at Trinity College. By the efforts of a Jesuit, John Fisher, he was converted to the Roman Catholic communion, and went to Douay; but he was induced by Laud to return to England and re-enter the English Church, in 1631. He became Chancellor of Salisbury and Prebendary of Brixworth. In the Civil War he was zealously Royalist, and took an active part in the operations at the siege of Gloucester, and was taken prisoner at the capture of Arundel Castle. Being very ill, he was allowed to remove to the palace of Chichester, where he died. He was the author of a famous tract, called, The Religion of Protestants: a Safe Way to Salvation, first published in 1638, and very frequently reprinted.

Chiltern Hundreds, THR, as the hundreds of Bodenham, Desborough and Stoke, in Buckinghamshire, are called, have attached to them a Stewardship, the holder of which office was charged with the duty of keeping down the robbers who infested the woods of the Chiltern Hills. At the present time the office is used for an interesting purpose. As a member of the House of Commons cannot by parliamentary law resign his seat unless he becomes disqualified, a member wishing to retire applies for the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, the acceptance of which, as a place of honour and profit under the crown, necessarily entails the vacation of the seat. This method of evading the restriction as to the resignation of a member of Parliament appears to have come into practice in the reign of George II., about 1750. In the event of two applications being made for the post at the same time, the stewardship of the manors of East Hundred,

Hempholme and Northstead, is bestowed on one of the applicants.

China. RELATIONS WITH, cannot be said to have existed much earlier than the beginning of the seventeenth century, though there was, no doubt, indirect intercourse at a much earlier date between English merchants and "Cathay." For instance, the Florentine house of Bardi, which had extensive monetary dealings with Edward III., had also a considerable trade with China. The first attempts of the East India Company to establish a commercial station at Canton, in 1637, were unsuccessful, as were others made in 1668, but in 1670 a trade was opened with Formosa, and a treaty concluded. Ten years later, a factory was established at Canton. After the accession of the Manchoo or Tartar dynasty, however (1679), a hostile policy, caused, perhaps, by the misconduct of the Portuguese, was adopted towards foreign traders. Trade, which had spread to several ports, was confined to Canton, and was there conducted with difficulty, owing to the dishonesty of the Hong merchants and the extortions of the mandarins. This unsatisfactory state of affairs, varied by quarrels between the East India Company, the French, and Portuguese, continued down to 1792, when Lord Macartney was sent as the first English ambassador to the court of Peking, but he was unable to effect the removal of the restrictions on trade, and Lord Amherst, who was despatched thither in 1816, was dismissed for refusing to perform the "kowtow," or prostration, before the emperor. In 1834, when the monopoly of the East India Company expired, it was determined to send out a trade commissioner to the port of Canton. Lord Napier was the first, but he soon gave way beneath the anxieties of his position. Soon afterwards the Chinese authorities began to protest against the introduction of opium by English traders, an import forbidden by law. The irritation grew, until, in 1839, the Chinese authorities insisted on the confiscation of a large quantity of the drug, which they burnt. This proceeding Captain Elliott, the Commissioner of Trade, seems to have considered as a declaration of war. With the arrival of the fleet from India in the following year, the First Chinese War (April, 1839—March, 1841) began. The island of Chusan was promptly taken, and the capital threatened. The Chinese thereupon sued for peace, but negotiations were broken off, and Hong Kong and Amoy fell, and Nanking was menaced. Thereupon hostilities were again suspended, and in 1842 Sir Henry Pottinger concluded a treaty by which the Chinese agreed to throw open five additional ports to European trade and pay an indemnity of some four and a half millions sterling, together with a million and a quarter as compensation for the destroyed opium, which sum the English merchants declared to be below their loss. The relations between England and China continued to be fairly pacific until 1855, when the seizure of the Iorchu (or cutter), Arrow, by the Chinese authorities, on the charge of piracy, was the cause of the Second Chinese War (Oct., 1855—May, 1858). The vessel was undoubtedly of a suspicious character, but she had obtained a British registration, and in consequence Sir John Bowring demanded the surrender of the captured men, which was done, but all apology was refused by Yeh, the governor of Canton. Thereupon the town was bombarded and taken by the English, the Taku forts fell in 1858, and the English commissioner, Lord Elgin, concluded a treaty at Tientsin by which transit-dues were considerably reduced, and an indemnity of four millions agreed upon. In 1859, however, the English minister, Sir F. Bruce, was fired upon from the Taku forts while sailing up the river to carry out the ratification of the treaty at Peking. Lord Elgin was promptly sent out, together with a force under Sir Hope Grant, who was assisted by the French. The Taku forts fell, and the emperor, in order to save Peking, agreed to the ratification of the Treaty of Tientsin. Shortly afterwards Major Charles Gordon entered the Chinese service, and aided the government in crushing the Tai-ping rebels. Once more (1875) the relations with England became strained, partly owing to the murder of Mr. Margary on the Chinese frontier, and partly to the refusal of the government to publish the treaties by which the British were empowered to establish a trade route from China to Burmah. At one time war seemed imminent, but it was averted by the firmness and tact of Sir Thomas Wade, who, in the following year, by the Chefoo Convention, established the rights of foreigners to travel and protection. The question of the opium traffic—to the importation of which the authorities are opposed, though the plant is cultivated to a large extent in the interior of the country—still remained unsettled.

Chivalry. This word, which variously meant "horsemanship," "knighthood," "a fully-armed array of horsemen or knights," "the knightly ideal of conduct," and other things akin to these, in its widest application embraced the whole brotherhood of trained, approved, and dedicated men of the sword, who had undertaken with elaborate and solemn ceremony to do their fighting in a peculiar spirit, on principles and with aims of a special character, as well as the whole body of laws and usages that these select warriors were bound to observe. Defined by a friendly historian, it was "a fraternal association, or rather an enthusiastic compact between men of feeling and courage, of delicacy and devotion," who had chosen the profession of arms and fitted themselves for it by a long and severe apprenticeship. It was an institution in which each faithful member was animated by a sentiment of conscious dignity, and regulated his life in conformity with a code of military ethics that raised a naturally demoralising occupation into a chastening discipline and ennobling pursuit. It owed to feudalism the conditions which enabled it to play its part; but it was no essential feature or direct offspring of feudalism; it was rather a corrective of the ferocity and injustice that make the chief reproach of feudal institutions.

The times of its beginning and ending, and its origin, are still controverted points among historians. But we cannot be far astray in limiting its flourishing period as an efficient and earnest motive and rule of action to the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, though its spirit and forms can be traced much earlier, and, in show at least, are perceptible much later. Mr. Freeman sees the dawn of English chivalry in William Rufus's making a certain line of conduct "a point of honour;" and the French wars of Edward III. display the glitter and affectations, the serious mockeries, that outlived the decay of real chivalry. As to its origin, some find it in the Crusades, some in the necessity of confronting the evils that harassed France in the eleventh century by "a consecration of the arms of the strong;" and some in the slow rise to ascendancy of certain ideas and customs—one or two as old as the days of the Germania—amid the anarchy that followed the death of Charlemagne. This last seems the safest conclusion: the ceremonial with which a young German warrior assumed arms; the duty of serving on horseback laid on certain landholders in later times; and the personal attachment to a superior obligatory on an aspirant to a military career, needed but the glow of religious feeling and the sense of individual honour as the master-motive of action, to complete the chivalrous character. For the grand creation and central figure of chivalry was the knight; and it is the union in him of religious fervour and sense of duty, with a recognition of honourable obligation, devotion to all women and constancy to one, and a horror of doing anything unworthy of a true knight, that is the very essence of the chivalric idea. Yet chivalry owed to the Crusades its summons into energetic life; in Milman's words, "all the noble sentiments which, blended together, are chivalry—the high sense of honour, the disdain of danger, the love of adventure, compassion for the weak or the oppressed, generosity, self-sacrifice, self-devotion for others—found in the Crusades their animating principle, perpetual occasion for their amplest exercise, their perfection, and consummation." As the unit of chivalry was the knight, or chevalier, care was therefore taken to make and keep knighthood select. In most places, though not in all, gentle birth was a necessary qualification; from his seventh to his fourteenth year the aspirant must serve in some noble or knightly household as page or varlet; he had then to choose, from among the well-born ladies of the society he lived in, some one as a special object of loyal devotion, and was allowed to receive at the altar from the hands of the priest the consecrated sword that proved him an esquire. His manifold duties as an esquire had as their general drift to make him perfect in the virtues and accomplishments of a knightly character. Having "borne him well" in his long and trying noviciate, he was "ordained" a knight with a most impressive ritual. After being bathed, and clothed in symbolic garments, he fasted for twenty-four hours, watched the arms he was to wear for a whole night in a church, confessed, communicated, had the sword that hung from his neck blessed by the priest, was armed by ladies or knights, and from one of the latter received the accolade. His most imperative obligations, taken on oath, were: to serve God and his prince; to uphold the weak; to be true to his word; to despise gain; to love honour; to persist to the end in any adventure he undertook; to reverence purity in women; to be faithful, courteous, and humble; and to protect maidens from danger and insult.

Chivalry had its absurd side: in its name men now and then played very fantastic tricks. Single combats, tournaments, jousts, the splendid frivolities dear to an age of empty show, were its outcome. But its nobler gifts to mankind far outweigh these; from it sprang the Knights Hospitaller and the Teutonic Order, which, along with not a little that is questionable, certainly bore excellent fruit. Above all, it set a curb on the passions of men, and thus softened the horrors of war; held up before them an elevating ideal; made active the virtues of loyalty, courtesy, respect for women, valour, justice, and veracity. Its chief bequest to mankind was the "chastity of honour which felt a stain like a wound," which still lives. It is significant, too, that the clearest English eye of the fourteenth century saw in the knight "who loved chivalrie"

"Trouthe and honour, fredom and curtesie."

Chivalry, THE COURT OF, was held before the Constable and the Marshal of England for the trial of military offences, and for the decision of questions relating to coat armour, personal honour, and the like. By 13 Rich. II., cap. 2, it is declared that this court has cognizance over all matters of this kind, except such as may be determined by the common law. The court has long ceased to be held; the last instance of its sitting being in 1377.

Chunda Sahib (d. 1752) married the daughter of Dost Ali, deputy of the Carnatic, and became chief minister. He was made use of by Dupleix as a pretender to the throne of Arcot against the English candidate, Mahomed Ali. In alliance with Mozuffer Jung, the French candidate to the throne of Hyderabad on the death of the Nizam-ool-Moolk (1748), he overran the Carnatic, and obtained investiture from Dupleix and Mozuffer Jung. Clive's defence of Arcot and the death of Mozuffer broke the confederacy; and Chunda Sahib surrendered to Monackjee, the Tanjore general, who was in alliance with Mahomed Ali and the English. The general took a solemn oath to convey him to a French settlement, but immediately afterwards caused him to be assassinated at the instigation of Mahomed Ali.

Church of England. Christianity came to Britain in the wake of the Roman occupation, and the British Church was so far organised that it sent three bishops to the Council of Arles in 314. [CHURCH, THE CELTIC.] The English invaders were heathens, and British Christianity was swept westward before them. The conversion of the English was effected by missionaries from Rome in the south, and missionaries from Iona in the north. As the ritual of these two sets of missionaries differed in some points, different usages were found to be productive of confusion, till at the Synod of Whitby (664) the Northumbrian kingdom adopted the Roman use; and from that time England obtained ecclesiastical unity as a daughter of the Church of Rome. The work of ecclesiastical organisation was begun by Archbishop Theodore in 668, and the example of unity given by the Church was one of the chief influences to produce unity in the State. Church and State worked harmoniously together, and there were no questions to bring them into collision. The bishop sat by the side of the ealdorman in the shire court, and ecclesiastical causes were decided in the same way as others. The period of the Norman Conquest coincided with that of the ecclesiastical reforms wrought by Hildebrand on the Continent; and the influence of his ideas is apparent in the ecclesiastical policy of William I. Ecclesiastical courts were established for ecclesiastical causes, which were to be tried by canonical, not by customary, law. This change was considered necessary for the sake of a uniform system of law, to introduce more regular discipline into the Church; but it brought with it a vexatious extension of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and led to the recognition of the right of appeal to the papal court, which ultimately proved ruinous to the authority and independence of bishops. But while making this change, William I. was careful to protect himself from papal interference by laying down three rules:— (1) That the Pope of Rome should not be recognised as apostolic, except at the king's command, and that letters for the Pope be first shown to the king. (2) That the resolutions of ecclesiastical synods should have no legal force till sanctioned by the king. (3) That no baron or royal servant be excommunicated, except by the king's consent. These regulations of William I. show a feeling of distrust about the relations between Church and State which was speedily realised. Under Henry I., Archbishop Anselm raised the question of the lawfulness of lay investiture to a spiritual office. The tenure of clerical lands was, by the growth of the royal power, assimilated to that of lay. The nomination of bishops, and their investiture with the emblems of their spiritual dignity, had passed into the hands of the crown. Hildebrand strove to check the growing secularisation of the Church; but the State answered, with some show of reason, that it could not allow of the existence of powerful land-holders who did not recognise the king as their lord. In England a compromise was at length made between Henry I. and the Pope. The king agreed that chapters should elect their bishops, but the election was to be made in the King's Court; he gave up the investiture with ring and crosier, but the bishops were to do homage for their temporalities. The crown retained the real appointment of bishops, and the rights of suzerainty over them, but abandoned its encroachments upon their spiritual dignity. Anselm showed that the Church was the only power which could withstand the tyranny of the crown. In like manner, Becket resisted Henry II.; and Bishop Hugh, of Lincoln, offered a constitutional resistance to the demands for money made in the name of Richard I. During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the Church fought the battle of the people, while it defended its own rights against the threatening power of the king.

But though the Church succeeded in a measure in holding its own against the king, it was less successful against the Pope. The Pope, as judge in all disputed cases, gained considerable power over episcopal elections, where disputes were frequent. In 1204 Pope Innocent III. rejected the contending candidates for the see of Canterbury, proposed Stephen Langton, and confirmed his informal election without the king's consent. Gradually, the king and the Pope came to a sort of tacit understanding that they would share between them the appointment to bishoprics, and the result was that the powers of the chapters became more and more shadowy, till they practically died away. Papal provisions and reservations over-rode the rights of patrons, and though the Statute of Provisors (1350, 1364, 1390) was enacted and re-enacted to check this abuse, the Pope and the king found their interests to coincide in keeping a tolerably close partnership in the disposition of patronage. Yet the Statute of Præmunire (16 Rich. II., c. 5, 1393), which forbade the prosecution of suits in foreign courts, gave the king a powerful weapon against the Pope, and was resented as an infringement of the papal supremacy. Papal taxation weighed heavily on the clergy, and the attempt made by Pope Boniface VIII. to exempt them from national taxation was powerless before the resolute character of Edward I. [PAPACY.]

In the fourteenth century, the results of the organisation of the Constitution by Edward I., and the steady growth of royal and papal interference with the appointment and powers of the bishops, gradually diminished the political influence of the Church, and its spiritual activity declined. The teaching of Wiclif marked dissatisfaction against the Papacy, social discontent, and, in a minor degree, desire for doctrinal change. The social side of the Lollard movement was the most largely developed, and it was this especially that led to legislation against heresy. In 1401 was passed the statute De Hæretico Comburendo (2 Hen. IV., c. 15, 1401). The Church lost its hold upon the people, and became more and more dependent on the Pope and the king. There was an acknowledgment of abuses on all sides, but there was no power to work a reformation. The machinery of the Church had been ruined by papal interference. Reform was possible only at Rome; but the Popes showed no inclination to undertake it. The clergy gradually put themselves more and more under the royal protection as against the Pope, till Henry VIII., freed from any power of the baronage, and willing to serve the interests of the commons, found the Church reduced to obsequious dependence on the crown. Henry VIII. quarrelled with the Papacy about one of the few points in which the papal interference with legislation was possible without the king's consent. At length he put forth the fulness of the royal power. By suppressing the monasteries, he deprived the Church of a third of its revenues. He severed the union between the English and the Roman Churches, and compelled the reluctant clergy to recognise the king as supreme head of the Church in England. He practically deprived the Church of legislative power by requiring the royal licence for all decrees of Convocation. Henry VIII. broke with the Papacy because the Papacy was an obstacle in the way of his personal gratification; but he aimed at a reformation of ecclesiastical practice and a re-adjustment of the ecclesiastical system to the needs of England as it was. Still, the breach with Rome would have been impossible to Henry VIII. if there had not been a serious breach in the European obedience to the Papacy. New theological opinions were rapidly spreading in Germany, and had already attracted the attention of scholars in England; and Henry VIII.'s wish to confine his changes to mere points of ecclesiastical organisation was impossible. Yet, so long as he lived he held the balance between the old and the new learning, and checked the progress of doctrinal change. Under Edward VI. the reforming party came into power, and Archbishop Cranmer moved forward towards the German Protestants. The steps in his advance may be traced in the history of the formularies of the English Church. [ARTICLES.] But the reforming party was a minority of the nation, and its rapid changes shocked the popular mind; it owed its political support to the selfish greed of a body of courtiers, who were willing to use the Reformation as a means of enriching themselves. Hence, the reaction under Mary was greeted with delight; but it was too complete to be permanent. The Catholicism of Mary was anti-national, and the successive failures of Protestants and Catholics under Edward VI. and Mary prepared the way for the religious settlement of Elizabeth.

Elizabeth reverted to the policy of her father, and strove to effect a compromise between the now hostile parties of the Catholics and Protestants. The Catholics held to the old formularies; the more advanced Protestants, who had been in exile during Mary's reign, had adopted the logical system of theology laid down by Calvin, and demanded that nothing should be adopted but what could be proved by Scripture to be true. Elizabeth favoured the opinion of the moderate Reformers, who held that nothing should be discarded but what could be shown from Scripture to be false. The Prayer Book of Edward VI. was revised, and two statutes were passed in 1559 which established the legal relations between Church and State. The Act of Supremacy required all benefited ecclesiastics, and all laymen holding office, to take the oath of supremacy, and renounce all foreign jurisdiction. The Act of Uniformity prohibited the use by any minister of any liturgy save that contained in the Prayer Book, and imposed a fine on all who absented themselves from Church. The Liturgy and the Articles, under the direction of Archbishop Parker, were devised so as to retain much of the old uses, while purging them of much that might offend the Calvinistic party. The ideal of Elizabeth was comprehension uniformly enforced. It was impossible that such a scheme should be entirely successful; yet it so far succeeded that the national feeling of England gathered round the Church, which embraced the large majority of the people. But a considerable Catholic party stood aloof; and the excommunication of Elizabeth by the Pope in 1570, the secret visits of Jesuit missionaries, and the plots in favour of Mary Queen of Scots, occasioned a rigorous persecution of the Catholics. Similarly, the Calvinistic party, or Puritans, disliked many practices of the prescribed ritual as superstitious, and disregarded them. In 1565, Archbishop Parker issued a book of regulations, known as the "Advertisements" (q.v.), which afterwards received the royal sanction. He attempted to enforce regularity in the conduct of services, and thereby only drove the Calvinists into more pronounced opposition. It is true that their spirit was narrow, and their opinions tended towards the establishment of the tyranny of an ecclesiastical democracy. Yet the persecution of Archbishop Whitgift was injudicious and ineffective. The High Commission Court, to which was entrusted the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the crown, grew to be a means of royal tyranny.

One result of the legislation of Elizabeth was that the Church became definitely subordinate to the State; jurisdiction and legislation for the Church could only be exercised with the consent of the crown, and the rites and discipline of the Church could not be altered without the consent of Parliament. The appointment of bishops was exercised by the crown, and Elizabeth demanded that they should be crown officials, for the purpose of enforcing the ecclesiastical uniformity which she required. They became, and have to some extent still continued to be, disciplinary officers executing the law, rather than Fathers in God to their clergy. The Elizabethan bishops were not men of lofty or commanding character, and were indecorously dictated to by Elizabeth and her Council. On the death of Elizabeth there were loud demands for concessions. But James I. lectured the Puritan ministers in the Hampton Court Conference (1604), and agreed to a few insignificant alterations in the Prayer Book which reconciled no one. Archbishop Bancroft continued the persecution of the Puritans, and deprived many Puritan clergy of their benefices. The Puritan party became more and more identified with the party of constitutional opposition to the crown; and in the Church itself a party began to arise which insisted on the necessity of Episcopacy as a divine institution, and, by excluding Presbyterians from the Catholic Church, seemed to draw nearer to the Church of Rome. This party advocated the divine right of kings, and preached the doctrine of passive resistance. Under Archbishop Laud it attained to great influence, and aided Charles I. in his arbitrary and unconstitutional conduct. The result was that Puritanism in England combined with Presbyterianism in England, Charles I. lost his throne and his life, and the Church of England was abolished. But rigid Presbyterianism would have laid a heavier yoke on England than the rigid Anglicanism of Laud. Cromwell gathered round him the sects, especially the Independents, and saved England from Presbyterianism by advocating the liberty of each congregation. But the Puritan supremacy was intolerable to England, and the restoration of Charles II. brought back the Church of England, endeared to the people as a bulwark against Puritanism. There was some show of desire to meet the scruples of the Puritans, and a Conference was held in the Savoy Palace, 1661. But Dr. Sancroft, who presided, was of an unyielding temper, and the demands of the Puritans were unreasonable. Both parties separated in anger. A few changes were made in the Prayer Book—but they increased rather than diminished the objections the Puritans had to it. Then, in 1662, was passed an Act of Uniformity, which required all beneficed clergy not only to use the Prayer Book, and that only, but also to declare "unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in it." About two thousand of the clergy were ejected from their benefices for refusing to make this declaration. Charles II. was willing to grant indulgences to the Puritans, that he might also grant them to the Catholics. Parliament and the bishops regarded the maintenance of the Established Church as the only means of saving England from the dangers of complications in foreign politics which might come through Catholicism and the dangers of the tyranny of an organised minority in domestic affairs. The royal indulgence was opposed, and Acts against Nonconformity rapidly succeeded one another; the Corporation Act, the Conventicle Act, the Five Mile Act, the Test Act, and the Act for disabling Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament, were all passed between 1661 and 1679.

In 1664 an important change was made in the relations between Church and State. Hitherto the clergy had taxed themselves in Convocation, but it was found that they consequently were taxed more heavily than the laity. In 1664 it was quietly agreed that the clergy should be taxed in the same manner as the laity—by Parliament. Though Convocation had lost its power of making canons without the king's consent, it still could petition for redress of grievances before granting supplies. Now that it ceased to grant supplies, its proceedings became merely formal, and after giving occasion to a theological controversy in 1717, it was not again summoned for business till 1861, when it was revived. [CONVOCATION.]

persecution of the Catholics in consequence of the false evidence of a pretended Popish plot. Notwithstanding a vigorous attempt to exclude James II. from the throne, on the ground that he was a Catholic, the general desire of England for a settled government led men to accept him as king. But James II. strove to impose by his prerogative a toleration which would enable him to put Catholics in all the important offices of state. He ordered a general declaration of liberty of conscience suspending all penal laws about religion, to be read in all the churches. Seven bishops, headed by Archbishop Sancroft, petitioned the king to recall this step. They were committed to the Tower, and were brought to trial for uttering a libel against the king, and their acquittal was a sign of the public opinion against James, which led to the Revolution. The accession of William III. and Mary was largely due to the fact that the Dissenters preferred to wait for toleration from the Church rather than to accept it unconstitutionally from the king. In 1689 a Toleration Act was passed, which granted some relief to the Dissenters, but none to the Catholics. Moreover, the Revolution overturned the doctrine of the divine right of kings, which had been a tenet of Anglicanism; and Archbishop Sancroft, with three hundred others, resigned their offices rather than take the oath of allegiance to William. The sect of the Non-jurors soon died away, and Anglicanism was strong enough to resist the changes which William III., in the interests of comprehension, wished to introduce into its system. Anne showed herself favourable to the Church, and in 1704 formed the fund which is known as Queen Anne's Bounty, by giving up for the augmentation of small benefices certain ecclesiastical dues which the English crown had inherited as the heir of the papal claims. The old High Church doctrine of passive obedience was revived in a modified form, and the impeachment of an obscure divine, Dr. Sacheverell, for a sermon embodying this view, was one of the causes of the fall of the Whig ministry. The toleration given to Dissenters under William III. was diminished by the Act of 1711 against occasional conformity, and the Schism Act of 1714, which required all teachers to have a licence from a bishop. But these were the last Acts which savoured of exclusiveness. With the accession of George II. a more tolerant spirit prevailed. A yearly Act of Indemnity began to be passed in 1727 for Dissenters who held office contrary to prohibitive Acts. From this time forward there was a gradual progress in practical tolerance, and in the last thirty years of the century efforts were made, with some success, to repeal the disabling Acts. The Corporation and Test Acts were not, however, repealed till 1828, and in 1829 the Catholic Relief Bill became law.

Meanwhile, religious lethargy had invaded the Church and Nonconformists alike. This was broken by the efforts of the Wesleys and Whitfield, and their movement to Christianise the masses met with great success. It was looked upon by the Church with coldness that deepened into dislike, and Wesley's followers formed themselves into a sect known by the name of Methodists. This movement largely swelled the ranks of Nonconformity, but also awakened the zeal of the Church. Still, at the beginning of the present century, the Church was violently assailed by Nonconformists; ecclesiastical abuses were remorselessly exposed, and claims resting solely on the fact that they were "by law established" were seen by their champions to be untenable. The wave of Liberalism that carried the Reform Bill was seen to be dangerously threatening the Church itself. In the earlier portion of the present century, the most active party in the Church were the revived Puritans, under Simeon and Melvill. A movement which had its seat at Oxford, and was begun by Newman, Keble, Pusey, and Hurrell Froude, revived the old High Church party. In a flow of tracts and pamphlets, the leaders of this movement laboured to restore the dogmatic basis of the Church. Their propositions awakened considerable alarm, which increased when some of the leading minds, notably Newman and Ward, joined the Church of Rome. Theological activity again awakened, and questions as to the limits of comprehension allowed by the formularies of the Church of England to its clergy were raised with much frequency. When these questions had slightly subsided, another of equal importance emerged—the question of the limits allowed to the clergy in criticising the Scriptures, and of individual opinion as to their interpretation. The result of this revival of theological interests was to bring forward many points for settlement. In early times appeals in cases of dispute were decided by the Pope; after the Reformation they were decided by the king in council, and a Court of Delegates was appointed when occasion required. In 1832 this Court of Delegates was abolished, and ecclesiastical appeals were transferred to the appellate jurisdiction of the king in council. In the first heat of party feeling, the composition of this court was not much regarded; but more recently this question has become one of the chief difficulties in the relations between Church and State. Another consequence of theological differences was to show that the Church was powerless to influence the election of bishops by the crown. In 1847 objections were made on theological grounds to the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the see of Hereford; but it was found that there was no legal means of having these objections brought to trial. In 1861 the meetings of Convocation were revived, and though the constitution of that body is not entirely representative of the clergy, it gives expression to many of their grievances. By its agency a revision of the translation of the Bible was undertaken. The Church has become in the present century more vigorous, and more highly organised, and has recognised within its body considerable variations of theological opinion. On the other hand, Nonconformists have been freed from all disabilities and from all legal obligations towards the Church. An Act passed in 1868 abolished compulsory Church rates for the maintenance of parish churches, and the Burials Act of 1880 permitted Nonconformists to bury their dead in the parish churchyards with their own rites and ceremonies. In Ireland, the Established Church, being a mark of English ascendancy, had never commended itself to the Irish people, who remained Catholics. It was felt to be a grievance that the Church of the minority should be upheld by the State, and in 1869 the Irish Church was disestablished and partially disendowed.

The relations between Church and State are closer in England than in any other country. The Church, after the Reformation, drew up its own services and formularies, and is recognised by the State on that basis. It cannot alter its services without the permission of the State, and the interpretation of its formularies is in the jurisdiction of the State, while the appointment of its bishops is likewise in the hands of the State.

Church, THE EARLY CELTIC. Two sharply-contrasted periods are to be distinguished in the early Church history of Celtic Britain. So long as the Romans ruled in South Britain, the Christianity which gradually permeated from Gaul into the island was weak, mainly confined to the Roman settlements, and affected very little the native population. The efforts made by Ninian, Palladius, and Patrick at the conversion of the Celts outside the province had very little result; but a very remarkable ecclesiastical revolution seems to have closely followed the withdrawal of the Roman legions. A wave of religious enthusiasm, excited perhaps by reaction from the Saxon conquerors, ran through the whole Celtic portion of the island. The first impulse came, as before, from Gaul. Gallic churchmen, like Germanus of Auxerre, re-kindled the dying embers of Christianity in Britain, and led the orthodox alike against Pelagian heretic and Saxon or Pictish heathen. Monasticism, brought by St. Athanasius from the East, found in St.

Martin of Tours its greatest Western exponent. From St. Martin's great Abbey of Marmoutier the monastic current flowed through Brittany into Wales and Cornwall, and thence into Ireland, where it developed itself to its extreme limits, and to Scotland, to which the monastic movement first gave Christianity. But the Saxon Conquest cut off all communication between the Celts of Western Britain and the Continent. Separated from civilisation by a wedge of heathenism, the Celtic Church gradually acquired a character of its own that marks it off sharply from the Churches of the Continent. When, in the seventh century, the conversion of the English again renewed intercourse between the Celtic Christians and the Western world, the differences between the Celtic Churches and the Catholic Christians had become so great that intercommunion was regarded as impossible, and a struggle for mastery between the two Churches set in that terminated only with the defeat of the Celts. It was not that the Celtic Christians were in any formal sense heretics. The only points that could be alleged against them were their habit of celebrating Easter according to an erroneous cycle, which the better-instructed Romish Church had abandoned, their peculiar form of tonsure, a few unimportant liturgical differences, and a willingness to respect the Roman Church as the caput ecclesiarum, but a steadfast refusal to yield it that canonical obedience which the Popes had now begun to claim. But though the formal differences of the Celtic and Catholic Churches were thus few—though not on that account the less hotly contested—the difference of organisation, system, and spirit between the two Churches was of the last importance. The child of the monastic revival, Celtic Christianity had become through and through monastic. Monasticism had in many places absorbed diocesan episcopacy. Great monasteries had grown up everywhere, which faithfully reproduced the tribal characteristics of the Celtic State, whose abbots, themselves often of royal houses, exercised a jurisdiction that left nothing to the bishops save the mere maintenance of the apostolical succession. In the great abbeys of Ireland, and still more at Iona—the great foundation of Columba (q.v.), which was the source of the Christianity of Scotland and the seat of a jurisdiction practically episcopal over its dependent Churches—the swarms of bishops were, despite their higher rank in the Church orders, subject to the jurisdiction of the abbot, who was generally a mere presbyter. As centres of education, of Church worship, of spiritual life, of an extreme asceticism, and of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the monasteries enjoyed a far-reaching influence. Their intimate relation to the tribe enabled them to permeate the whole life of the nation with a real, if irregular, spiritual enthusiasm. The sixth and seventh centuries were the great period of the Welsh and Irish saints, of the earliest Welsh literature, of successful resistance to the English, to whose conquests a limit was at last set. Heathenism was driven out of Celtic Britain. When Augustine and Paulinus failed, Aidan from Iona succeeded. At least half of the conversion of England is due to the Columban monks. On the Continent Celtic missionaries carried their own usages and planted their own monasteries. Columba founded Luxeuil, in the Vosges, St. Gall the great abbey called after him in Upper Swabia. In Gaul, Italy, and Germany a new wave of religious enthusiasm was excited by the strange missionaries from Britain. [ABBOT; MONASTICISM.]

But the monastic Church of Celtic Britain, though fertile in saints and missionaries, had a fatal weakness in its want of definite organisation. Even in Wales, where the functions of abbot and bishop were generally conjoined—the founders of the great Welsh monasteries were also founders of the Welsh sees (St. David, for example)—the work of discipline and supervision which belonged to the bishop could be very imperfectly performed by a recluse who chose the remotest solitudes for his abode. Efficient in exciting religious emotion, the Celtic Church failed in its more regular and routine duties. The monks were better missionaries than parish priests. A society that aimed at abjuring the world could not thoroughly make its influence felt in the world. Shut up in an extreme corner of the universe, rigidly opposed to all external influences, its doom was sealed when the triumph of Wilfred at Whitby and the alliance of Oswy of Northumbria and Theodore of Canterbury expelled the Celtic customs from Britain. [WHITBY, SYNOD OF.] Henceforth confined to the north and west of the island, the monastic Church lost, with its capacity for expansion, its powers of vitality. It was affected by two opposite influences from without and from within. The triumph of the Roman party in England gave the secular clergy a position side by side with the Celtic regulars. The ascetic impulse which had established the monasteries continued so far that monasticism itself was no sufficient expression of the severe spirit of renunciation that saw in the life of the solitary anchorite the highest expression of spiritual emotion. Even the tribal connection which in the first flow of the movement had done so much service to the monasteries ultimately proved a snare. The secular aspect of the tribe began to assert itself, and an abbey whose head was an hereditary official soon became a monastery simply in name. As the abbey had earlier absorbed the tribe, so the tribe now absorbed the abbey.

Thus assailed from within and without, the monastic Church could offer no efficient opposition to the strong reaction in favour of communion with Western Christendom, even at the expense of a loss of the national usages. In 634 the Southern Irish, in 692 the Northern Irish, accepted the Roman Easter. On the death of Adamnan (704), an effort to introduce the Roman customs into Iona itself led to a schism in that monastery. In 717 the Columban monks were expelled from the kingdom of the Picts. In the middle of the eighth century the Welsh gave up the Celtic Easter. Formal schism was thus ended, but it was centuries before the monastic peculiarities of the Celtic Churches entirely disappeared. The Danish invasions, the English overlordships, both had their effect, yet it was not until the days of Matilda, wife of Malcolm Canmore, that complete diocesan episcopacy and the rule of St. Benedict were imposed on the Scots, and the Culdees (q.v.) reduced to the position of canons regular. In the same way the Norman kings reorganised the Church of Ireland on a territorial, instead of a tribal, basis. Wales, where the Celtic Church had never developed so far, where diocesan episcopacy always continued in a way, gradually became subject to Canterbury, as well as to the English kings. The Norman Conquest imposed on the Welsh Church a foreign hierarchy, that completed the process of union. Centuries earlier the Scottish monks on the Continent had been compelled to accept the Rule of St. Benedict.

The true history of the old Celtic Church has been obscured by a cloud of fable and legend which has seen in it a Protestant witness against the errors of Rome, and a Presbyterian polity worthy of Calvin, which has regarded its characteristics as survivals of the mystic rites of Druidism, and which has found the explanation of its Easter observance in the Quartodeciman practice of the Churches of Asia.

The chief materials for the history of the Celtic Church are in Haddan and Stubbs's Councils and in Adamnan's Life of Columba. Dr. Reeve's introduction and notes to Adamnan, and Mr. Skene's Celtic Scotland, vol. II., may be mentioned as leading modern authorities for Ireland and Scotland. In the Lives of the Cambro-British Saints, amidst much that is wild legend, something authentic may be gleaned. Rees's Welsh Saints is an ingenious attempt at reconstructing one aspect of early Welsh Church history. Fryce's Ancient British Church is a useful compendium of that portion of the subject. The essays on the Churches of the British Confession and The Scots on the Continent, in A. W. Haddan's Remains, are a masterly summary of the whole question. Montalembert's Monks of the West gives an eloquent, if often misleading, picture of the monastic aspect of the Church.

Church Rates, or rates levied (for the maintaining of the church and churchyard in good condition) from the parishioners and occupiers of land within a parish, are voted and assessed by a majority of the parishioners assembled in a vestry meeting. Church rates are of very ancient origin; and as early as 970, Archbishop Elfric ordained that Tithes (q.v.) should be divided into three parts, one of which was to be set aside for the repairing of the church. This Church rate, at first voluntary, became gradually obligatory, and though up to 1817 the only method of enforcing payment was through the action of the ecclesiastical courts, it was in that year enacted that the payment might be enforced by the county justices. The objection of the Dissenters to pay these rates led to much litigation on the subject. Frequent bills were brought in for their abolition, and in 1858 a bill of Sir John Trelawney actually passed the House of Commons, but was rejected by the Lords. The opposition of the Dissenters at the vestry meetings was frequently so strong as to prevent the levying of any rate at all, and "in 1859," says Sir J. Erskine May, "Church rates had been refused in no less than 1,526 parishes or districts." The question was settled in 1868 by the abolition of compulsory Church rates and the substitution of voluntary payments.

Churchill, ARABELLA (b. 1648, d. 1730), was the daughter of Sir Winston Churchill, and sister of the Duke of Marlborough. She became the mistress of the Duke of York (afterwards James II.) and by him the mother of James Fitz-James, Duke of Berwick, and three other children. She subsequently married Colonel Charles Godfrey.

Churchill, ADMIRAL GEORGE, was a younger brother of the Duke of Marlborough. In 1693, when in command of a brigade, he took his nephew, the Duke of Berwick, prisoner at the battle of Landen. On the accession of Queen Anne he was placed on the Admiralty Board. He had complete ascendancy over the head of the Admiralty, Prince George of Denmark, the husband of the queen, and thwarted the councils of Admiral Rooke. In 1707 he was vehemently attacked by the Whigs for his mismanagement; it was alleged that he had altogether neglected to counteract a junction of the French fleets, by means of which several men-of-war acting as convoys to merchant ships had been destroyed. He was again attacked by Wharton, with a view to injuring the Duke of Marlborough. His reply to the Commission of Inquiry, written in a spirit of cool defiance, served to exasperate his enemies still more. On the death of Prince George he was dismissed from office (1709). "The mental constitution of this man," says Mr. Wyon, "was the opposite of that of his illustrious relative. He was a Tory of the extreme school—virulent, domineering, and foolish."

Churchwardens are parish officers who are charged with the duty of looking after the condition of the parish church, of providing what is necessary for the celebration of the sacrament and the services, of summoning vestries, and of superintending church matters generally. They are usually two in number (though occasionally there is one only), and are chosen either by the parson and the parishioners jointly, or one by the minister and the other by the parishioners. In the Canons of 1603 it is enacted that the "churchwardens shall be chosen yearly in Easter week by the joint consent of the minister and parishioners, if it may be, but if they cannot agree, the minister shall choose one and the parishioners the other." Practically, in nearly every parish, one churchwarden is chosen by the minister and the other by the people.

Cinque Ports, THE, are a group of seven towns, situated in Sussex and Kent, which still possess, in some degree, their old and peculiar jurisdiction. The original members of the group were Hastings, Romney, Hythe, Dover, and Sandwich, to which the "ancient towns" of Winchelsea and Rye were afterwards added. They still retain the privilege of holding two courts—viz., the Court of Brotherhood and the Court of Guestling; but these exercise now only a very small part of their former functions. The Cinque Ports owe their existence as a corporate body to the fact that in our early history there was no standing navy. Hence, whenever invasion was threatened or contemplated, it was necessary to rely mainly on the services of the seaboard towns, although even before the Conquest the inland counties had, under Ethelred, to furnish their quota of ships. Dover is returned in Domesday as owing twenty vessels in return for its liberties, and other towns of the later group had similar duties. But as yet we have no record of the Cinque Ports as a body possessed of special privileges in return for definite duties. By the beginning of Henry III.'s reign, however, the name has emerged. It was the Cinque Ports that contributed largely to the defeat of Eustace the Monk in 1217, and four years later we find the same body summoned before Hubert de Burgh for piracy against the men of Calais. In 1242 Henry issued orders to the officers of this corporation to prey upon French merchants and travellers—an order whose terms they enlarged upon, to the hurt of their fellow-countrymen. By this time, then, we may consider the Cinque Ports to be a recognised institution, with its own officers and warden, and in this capacity its members espoused the cause of De Montfort, and were summoned to send "barons" to the Parliament of 1265. Local historians have claimed for these barons a position higher than that of the borough members, or even the knights of the shire. It is not, however, till the reign of Edward I. that we have absolute proof that the Cinque Ports possessed a charter. But, on the other hand, the terms of Edward's charter speak definitely of certain rights possessed by this body in the time of Henry II., and more vaguely of others dating back through almost every previous reign to that of the Confessor. And we may consider Edward I.'s charter, though somewhat enlarged by later sovereigns, as a fair summary of the privileges of the Cinque Ports. By the terms of this charter the Cinque Ports were to have criminal and civil jurisdiction within their limits; exemption from all taxes, aids, and tollages; the right of assembling in their own parliament at Shepway, near Hythe, for the purpose of making by-laws; and several other privileges, including the right of regulating the Yarmouth fishery and fair. In return for these concessions, they were to furnish the king at call with fifty-seven ships for fifteen days each year, and there is at least one instance where they had to victual the ships supplied by another town (London). The officer in command of the ships furnished by the Cinque Ports was called the Warden; and under Edward I. the Warden of the Cinque Ports acted as admiral of the fleet from Dover to Cornwall.

The Cinque Ports continued to be the main strength of our navy till the time of Henry VII. In the reign of this king we find signs that they had already fallen, or were falling, under the ordinary taxation of the kingdom, though they are still allowed to deduct £500 from their own share of any tenth or fifteenth levied on the counties of Sussex and Kent—a privilege which Elizabeth confirmed as a reward for their services against the Armada. The Charters of the Cinque Ports were surrendered to the crown in 1685, and most of their peculiar privileges and obligations were abolished by the Reform Act (1832), and Municipal Corporations Act (1835).

Cintra. THE CONVENTION OF (Aug. 30, 1808), was an agreement made at the beginning of the Peninsular War between the French and English after the battle of Vimiero. The conditions would have been much more favourable to the British had not the timid caution of Sir Harry Burrard and Sir Hew Dalrymple prevented Sir Arthur Wellesley from following up the advantage gained in the battle. An advance was cautiously begun towards Lisbon; and almost immediately an envoy was sent by Junot to treat. Terms were drawn up, subject to the approval of the English admiral, and this he would not give. Negotiations were accordingly begun afresh, while the English advanced still nearer to Lisbon. Junot on his side threatened to fire the public buildings of Lisbon; and the threat had the effect of hastening on the negotiations. Finally, the Convention of Cintra was signed at Lisbon, the terms being that the French troops should evacuate Portugal, and should be transported to France in English ships. After some trouble it was also decided that the Russian fleet in the Port of Tagus should pass into the hands of the English. Much indignation was felt in England on the news of the convention, although four months previously it would have been hailed with delight. Burrard, Dalrymple, and Wellesley were ordered home to take their trial, and Sir John Moore was appointed to the command in the Peninsula.

"Circumspecte Agatis" was the title of a writ or statute issued by Edward I. in 1285, defining the duties of the ecclesiastical courts, and fixing the boundaries between the temporal and spiritual jurisdictions, thus putting a stop to the gradual encroachment of the ecclesiastical courts in matters of which the cognisance belonged to the crown. By this statute breaches of morality, such as adultery and false swearing, are assigned to the Courts Christian, together with questions of tithes, mortuaries, or battery of a clerk.

Cirencester is situated on the site of an important Roman military station, named Corinium. It was captured by the Danes in 878. An abbey of some importance was founded by Henry I., and a fine church built in the fifteenth century. During the Civil War the town was held by the Parliamentarians, and captured by Prince Rupert in 1642, and surrendered again to the Roundheads, in 1643.

Cissa (d. 520 P) was the son of Ella (q.v.), whom he is said to have succeeded in 517. His name is traced in Chichester (Cissaceaster) and possibly in Cissbury Camp.

Cistercians, THE, were a religious order, an off-shoot of Benedictines, founded in 1098 at Cîteaux. The order owed much to its second abbot, Stephen Harding, an Englishman, who enjoined especially the strictest adherence to the austere Benedictine rule, from which the Benedictines themselves had long departed. It was Stephen Harding also who, at the chapter of the order in 1119, established the system of government which allowed a large amount of independence to each abbey, under the supervision of the general chapter of the order. The order became very popular all over Western Europe, and in no country more than in England. They first settled at Waverley, in Surrey, in 1129, and from thence spread all over England. Their houses were very numerous, especially in Yorkshire. [MONASTICISM.]

Ciudad Rodrigo, THE SIEGE OF, during the Peninsular War, January, 1812, was the opening operation of Wellington's campaign of 1812. The fall of the works was hastened, in spite of many natural and artificial obstacles, on account of the approach of Marmont with a relieving force. On the 13th the Santa Cruz convent was taken: a well-organised sally, however, delayed the bombardment; but on the evening of the 14th it was begun, and in the confusion that arose, the 40th Regiment seized the convent in the suburbs to the east of the town. The bombardment was kept up almost continuously, till on the 18th the great breach became a wide gap. On the 19th, soon after seven o'clock, the assault was begun: the fausse-braye was cleared by the stormers; but the French, driven back, held their ground behind the retrenchment, and wrought great havoc among the British. Meanwhile, the attack at the smaller breach had been made with reckless impetuosity, which carried the fausse-braye; and sweeping onward, led by Major Napier, the light division dashed into the narrow opening, and at the point of the bayonet broke down all resistance, until they had gained a foothold in the town. Then part of the light division, driving all before them, fell upon the flank of the defenders at the great breach, and by their overthrow made a way for the entrance of the storming party; while the rest of the light troops cleared the streets and houses in the town. The town very soon became the scene of the wildest excesses and frenzied disorder. The loss of the allies was 90 officers and 1,200 soldiers.

Civil List, THE, is a sum of money granted annually by Parliament for the support of the royal household, and the personal expenses and bounty of the sovereign. It originated in the reign of William and Mary, and at first comprised the payment of civil offices, and pensions. Its amount was fixed at £700,000 (£400,000 being derived from the hereditary revenues of the crown and £300,000 from the Excise duties). This continued to be the nominal sum—although frequent debts were incurred—until the reign of George II., when it was increased to £800,000, being further raised in 1777 to £900,000; this sum, however, proved quite inadequate for the necessary expenditure, and debts on the Civil List had continually to be paid throughout the whole of the reign of George III.; and it was found advisable to remove from the list many charges, such as salaries of state officers and the like. On the accession of William IV. these extraneous charges were further reduced, and the Civil List fixed at £510,000, a sum which included a pension-list of £75,000. The Civil List paid to the Queen by 1 Vict., c. 2, amounts to £385,000, and is exclusively devoted (with the exception of £1,200 annually, which may be granted in pensions) to the payment of her Majesty's household and personal expenses.

Civil Wars. [BARONS' WAR; ROSES, WARS OF; GREAT REBELLION.]

Claim of Right, THE, passed by the Scottish Estates in April, 1689, declared that James VII. had forfeited the crown for various offences committed against the constitution of the kingdom and the privileges of the subjects, and that no Papist could ever in the future rule over Scotland; it further declared the necessity of frequent Parliaments, and the burdensome nature of prelacy. It was, in fact, a statement of the term on which the Scottish crown was offered to William of Orange. [CONVENTION OF ESTATES.]

Claimants of the Scottish Crown in 1291. On the death of the Maid of Norway (1290), the last of the descendants of Alexander III., a number of competitors for the Scottish crown appeared. Chief amongst them were John Baliol, Robert Bruce, and John de Hastings, the descendants of three sisters, daughters of David, Earl of Huntingdon. Baliol claimed as the grandson of the eldest sister, Bruce as the son of the second, and Hastings, as the son of the youngest daughter, claimed one-third of the kingdom, contending that it was divisible like other inheritances. This disputed succession Edward I. determined to settle, and accordingly summoned a conference of Scottish and English nobles to meet at Norham, May, 1291. It was there determined to accept Edward's appointment as lord paramount, and to appoint commissioners to decide upon the merits of the claimants. Forty were named by Baliol, forty by Bruce, and twenty-four by the English king. In June, 1292, these commissioners, after much deliberation, reported in favour of Baliol, saying that "By the laws and usages of both kingdoms, in every heritable succession the more remote in one degree lineally descended from the eldest sister, was preferable to the nearer in degree issuing from the second sister." Edward accordingly declared John Baliol king.

Besides these three chief, there were ten minor, competitors: Nicholas de Soules, the grandson of Marjory, natural daughter of Alexander II., whom he declared to have been legitimatised; Florence, Earl of Holland, great grandson of Ada, daughter of Prince Henry, and sister of William the Lion; Robert de Pinkeny, great grandson of Marjory, daughter of Prince Henry; William de Ros; Patrick, Earl of March, and William de Vess and Roger de Mandeville, the descendants of illegitimate daughters of William the Lion; Patrick Salythly, son of an illegitimate son of William; John Comyn of Badenoch, who claimed as the descendant of King Donald Bane; and Eric, King of Norway, who claimed as the heir of his daughter, the Maid of Norway. None of these claims were of any validity, and they were not pushed to an open trial.

Claims. THE COURT OF, was established in 1662, in accordance with the first Act of Settlement to examine the case of all dispossessed Irish proprietors. It decided very largely in favour of the natives, and very soon such large grants were made to the Duke of York and others, that it became impossible to provide for any other claimants. Thus, after it had heard about 600 claims its labours came to an end, and the second Act of Settlement, 1665, became necessary.

Clanricarde, ULICK BURKE, OF DE BUCH, 1st MARQUIS OF (b. 1604 ? d. 1655), was so created in 1645. Though a Roman Catholic, he continued faithful to the king all through the Rebellion of 1641 (q.v.). His sympathies were largely with the insurgents, but he refused the supreme command they offered him. At court, in 1647, he was able to combine his loyalty with his attachment to the ancient faith, and began to take a prominent part in affairs. When, in 1649, Ormonde left the country, he made Clanricarde Lord Deputy, who in 1650 induced the Irish to reject the terms offered them by Parliament. He continued to hold out for some time longer, but was finally compelled to surrender to Coote on the usual terms of personal freedom, and the restoration of part of his estates. He was succeeded by his cousin as Earl of Clanricarde, the marquise dying with him as he had no issue. At the Restoration all his estates were at once restored to his heirs. His Memoirs Concerning the Affairs of Ireland from 1640 to 1655 were published in 1722.

Clare, JOHN, EARL OF. [FITZGIBBON.]

Clare Election (July, 1828) was the famous contest in which Daniel O'Connell was, after five days' polling, returned against Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, a supporter of Catholic Emancipation, but a Protestant, who was seeking re-election on becoming President of the Board of Trade. O'Connell was the first Catholic returned to Parliament since 1690. He owed his election to the "forties;" the £50 freeholders and the gentry without distinction of political opinion voting to a man for his opponent. When he was elected he refused to take the oaths; but after the Catholic Emancipation Bill he was re-elected without opposition, and took his seat April, 1829.

Clarence, GEORGE, DUKE OF (b. 1449, d. 1478), was the third son of Richard, Duke of York, and brother to King Edward IV. After the battle of Wakefield and the death of his father, he was taken to Flanders for security, but returned to England in 1461, on the accession of Edward IV. He was made Lieutenant of Ireland for seven years in 1462. Being greatly vexed at the king's marriage, he intrigued with the Earl of Warwick against him, and, in 1469, married Warwick's eldest daughter, Isabel, contrary to Edward's wishes, at Calais, whither he had retired with Warwick. In 1470 Edward fell a prisoner into their hands, and for a time Clarence and Warwick had everything their own way. But the escape of the king and the defeat of the Lincolnshire insurgents, whose avowed intention it was to place Clarence on the throne, changed the aspect of affairs, and Clarence and Warwick had once more to flee to Calais. Thence they invaded England towards the end of the year, landed in Devonshire, and soon found themselves at the head of a large army. Edward was again obliged to flee from the kingdom. Warwick with Clarence entered London, and re-crowned Henry VI. But Clarence was playing a double game. When Edward IV. landed at Ravenspur and marched southwards, Clarence was in correspondence with him, and when Edward advanced towards London, Clarence marched out and joined him, and fought against his old confederate at Barnet. But Clarence soon quarrelled again with his brother. He claimed the inheritance of Warwick as the husband of Isabel, and was unwilling to divide the earl's possessions with Richard of York, who married the second daughter, Anne. On the death of Isabel, Clarence was anxious to marry Mary of Burgundy, but the marriage was prevented by Edward IV. A violent quarrel ensued. A gentleman of Clarence's household was condemned for using necromancy against the king. Clarence interfered with the execution of the sentence, and was impeached by the king in person before the House of Lords. He was condemned to death in 1478, and was made away with secretly in the Tower. According to a well-known story, which is not supported by authentic evidence, he was drowned in a butt of malmsey wine.

Clarence, THOMAS, DUKE OF (b. 1389, d. 1421), was the second son of Henry IV. In 1401 he was made Lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1412 created Duke of Clarence. He played an important part in the French wars of Henry V.'s reign, and in 1421 he was defeated and slain at Beaugé by a combined force of French and Scots. He married Margaret, daughter of Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent, and widow of John Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, but left no issue.

Clarendon, ASSIZE OF. [ASSIZE.]

Clarendon, THE CONSTITUTIONS OF (1164), received their name from the royal hunting-lodge of Clarendon, near Salisbury, where they were enacted. They were the outcome of the determination of Henry II. to settle the relation between Church and State in matters of jurisdiction. The ecclesiastical courts which had been separated from the national courts by William the Conqueror had gradually extended their jurisdiction, and their pretensions had been favoured by the anarchy of Stephen's reign. Now, however, that justice was once more fairly administered in the civil courts, it became an absolute necessity to assert the supremacy of the State over clergy and laity alike, the more so since the ecclesiastical courts had shown themselves unable to perform the work they had undertaken. Many other points connected with the relations between Church and State had to be settled, such as questions of advowson and excommunication, of election to bishoprics, and of ecclesiastical appeals, and on all these points the Constitutions are very firm in insisting on the rights of the crown. "They are," says Bishop Stubbs, "no mere engine of tyranny or secular spite against a churchman: they are really a part of a great scheme of administrative reform, by which the debateable ground between the spiritual and temporal powers can be brought within the reach of common justice, and the lawlessness arising from professional jealousies abolished." The Constitutions were drawn up by a committee of bishops and barons, the Justiciar, Richard de Lucy, having the chief hand in them. Their purport is as follows:—

1. Any controversy concerning advowson or presentation to livings to be tried in the king's court.
2. Churches in the royal demesne not to be given away in perpetuity without the king's leave.
3. Clerks accused of any civil offence to be brought before the king's court, and there to claim their benefit of clergy.
4. No archbishop, bishop, &c., to leave the realm without the king's consent.
5. Excommunicated persons not to give excessive bail.
6. Laymen not to be accused, save by certain legal accusers and witnesses, in presence of the bishop. If those who are arraigned are such that no one is willing or dares to accuse them, the sheriff shall, on demand of the bishop, cause twelve lawful men of the neighbourhood to swear before the bishop that they will declare the truth in that matter according to their conscience.
7. No tenant-in-chief to be excommunicated or to have his lands put under interdict without the king's leave.
8. Appeals shall be from the archdeacon's court to the bishop, from the bishop to the archbishop, and no further (that is, to Rome) without the king's leave.

9. If a dispute arise between a cleric and a layman, whether a fief is held by ecclesiastical or lay tenure, it shall be settled by the declaration of twelve lawful men, in the presence of the king's justice.

10. A man refusing to appear before an ecclesiastical court shall not be excommunicated till an officer of the king has inquired into the matter.

11. Archbishops, bishops, &c., shall hold their possessions of the king as baronies, and answer for the same to the king's justices, and do suit and service and observe all the king's customs, except in cases of life and limb.

12. When an archbishopric, bishopric, &c., in the royal demesne shall be vacant, it shall remain in the king's hand, and he shall receive from it all the revenues and proceeds.

13. If any of the barons refuse justice to an ecclesiastic, the king shall give him justice.

14. The chattels of those who are in forfeiture to the king shall not be detained in a church or churchyard.

15. All pleas concerning debts are to be tried in the king's court.

16. The sons of villeins are not to be ordained without the consent of their lords.

It is important to notice that the mention of a jury in clause 6, and of the principle of recognition by twelve lawful men in clause 9, are the earliest instances of such mention in anything like statute laws, though, no doubt, the practice of such recognitions prevailed long before this date. Clarendon, EDWARD HYDE, 1st EARL OF (b. Feb. 18, 1609, d. Dec. 9, 1674), son of Henry Hyde of Dinton, Wilts., entered Magdalen Hall, 1622, the Middle Temple, 1625. When the Short Parliament was summoned, Hyde, who had obtained considerable reputation as a lawyer, was elected member for Wootton Bassett. In the Long Parliament he represented Saltash, and took a prominent part in the attack on the maladministration of the last twelve years. Legal abuses, such as the extraordinary courts, the ship-money judgment, the misconduct of the judges, and other causes which had brought into contempt "that great and admirable mystery the law," met with his chief attention. He shared in the earlier portion of the proceedings against Strafford, and his name is not among the list of those who voted against his attainder. But the question of Church government led to his separation from the popular party, and brought him into connection with the king. In the autumn of 1641 he became, though without any official position, the confidential adviser of Charles, and the real leader of his party in the Commons. He thoroughly disapproved of the king's attempt to seize the Five Members, but nevertheless continued in his service, drew up in secret the royal replies to the manifestoes of the Parliament, and finally joined the king at York. His great work was the formation of the party of Constitutional Royalists, whose leader and spokesman he was, and he now succeeded in persuading the king to abstain from unconstitutional action, and take his stand on his legal rights. Thus he gave the king a policy, and gathered round him a party. In the spring of 1643 he was knighted, made a Privy-Councillor, and appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was by his counsel that the king summoned the Parliament which met that autumn at Oxford. In all negotiations he was the king's chief agent and adviser, and the Parliament recognised his importance by excepting him from pardon. When, in 1645, the Prince of Wales was sent into the West of England, Hyde accompanied him as one of his council, and also accompanied him in his flight from the advance of Fairfax, first to the Scilly Isles, then to Jersey (April, 1646). In September, 1648, the outbreak of the second Civil War, and the rumour of an expedition to England called him to Holland to join Prince Charles, but in the spring of the next year he was sent as ambassador to Madrid, and remained in Spain till 1651. At the end of 1652 he rejoined the young king, and from that time till the Restoration acted as his chief minister, being promoted in 1658 to the dignity of Lord Chancellor. During these years he managed the king's finances, conducted his negotiations with foreign courts, and carried on a constant correspondence with the disaffected in England, which survives in the collection entitled the Clarendon State Papers. At the Restoration he drew up the Declaration of Breda, and it was by his suggestion that the king, instead of attempting to arrange the terms on which he should be restored, referred them unreservedly to the future judgment of Parliament. The king's return placed him at the head of the administration; he was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and created Earl of Clarendon (April, 1661). His daughter's (Anne Hyde) marriage with the Duke of York, which had at first seemed to endanger, in the end confirmed, his power. In his domestic policy he tried to maintain the balance of the Constitution against both king and Parliament. He opposed the attempt to convert the king's Declaration of Indulgence into law (1663). It was afterwards charged against him that, when he might have secured for the king a revenue which would have made the king independent of Parliament, he preferred not to do so. "He had the mind," it was said, "to put the king out of the necessity of having recourse to his Parliament." On the other hand, when the Cavalier majority of the House of Commons wished to repeal the Act of Indemnity (1662), he set his influence against it, and kept the king to his promises. "He often said it was the making those promises had brought the king home, and the keeping them must keep him at home." When Parliament introduced the principle of appropriation of supplies (1665), and the system of auditing expenditures (1666), it was against his advice that the king yielded to them. In ecclesiastical matters he aimed at restoring the state of things which had existed before 1640. The Declaration of Breda had held out to the Nonconformists promises of comprehension and indulgence which were not observed. Clarendon, after some hesitating attempts at a compromise in favour of the Presbyterians, urged the re-establishment of the old ecclesiastical system in all its rigidity, and supported the enactment of the Corporation Act (1661), the Act of Uniformity (1662), the Conventicle Act, and the Five Mile Act (1665). Abroad, the alliance with France, which began under Cromwell's rule, was continued under Clarendon. He favoured the Portuguese match (1662) and negotiated the sale of Dunkirk (1662). He opposed the war with Holland (1665), but continued in office, and was made responsible by public opinion for its mismanagement. He had already been unsuccessfully impeached by the Earl of Bristol (1663). In August, 1667, he was dismissed from the Chancellorship, and two months later the House of Commons decided on his impeachment. The charges brought against him were corruption, the intention of introducing arbitrary government, and treachery in the late war. In obedience to the king's command, Clarendon fled to France. Parliament summoned him to return and stand his trial, and as he did not do so, sentenced him to exile for life. He therefore remained in France until his death, which took place on December 9th, 1674. As a statesman Clarendon was honest, and constant to his principles. His attachment to the Church never failed, and his influence with both his masters was always used to prevent changes in its government or discipline. "He did really believe the Church of England the most exactly formed and framed for the encouragement and advancement of learning and piety, and for the preservation of peace, of any church in the world." For the Constitution he had "a most zealous esteem and reverence; and believed it to be so equally poised that if the least branch of the prerogative was torn off or parted with, the subject suffered by it and that his right was impaired; and he was as much troubled when the crown exceeded its just limits, and thought the prerogative hurt by it." During his first exile he wrote the first seven books of the History of the Rebellion and portions of the three subsequent books (1646-1648). His object was to explain to posterity the success of the Rebellion, and "to vindicate the memory of those few who out of duty and conscience had opposed and resisted that torrent," i.e., to justify the Constitutional Royalists. The rest of the History of the Rebellion was written during the second exile. Clarendon at first (1668—70) set to work on an Autobiography in which he recounted his life down to the Restoration, and related over again much that he had written in the History. He then changed his mind, and decided to unite the two works, incorporating portions of the Life in the earlier work, and also using it to form the latter books of the History. Thus the History of the Rebellion consists of two parts, written at two periods; the first composed with the intention of writing a history, the second with the intention of writing a biography. Of these parts the first is the most valuable and the most accurate. The Continuation of the Life is an apology for Clarendon's administration, written in 1672 for the information of his children. The History of the Rebellion in Ireland was written to vindicate Lord Ormonde.

In the first edition of the History of the Rebellion, edited by Sprat, Bishop of Worcester, some small alterations were made in the text; these were in part restored in the edition of 1826, and the original text was exactly printed in 1840. [C. H. F.]

Clarendon, HENRY HYDE, 2ND EARL OF (b. 1638, d. 1709), was the son of Charles II.'s great minister. In 1685 he was appointed Lord Privy Seal. At the end of the year he was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. He found himself completely eclipsed in that country by the influence of Tyrconnell and (as he was a sincere Protestant) his alarm was great when several Roman Catholics were sworn of the Privy Council. He, nevertheless, submitted to Tyrconnell's dictation, and when James threatened to dismiss him for his reluctant compliance in the reform of the army and administration, he wrote humble letters of apology. He was, however, dismissed in 1687, shortly after his brother, Rochester. He was invited to the consultation in aid of the Seven Bishops. When the Declaration of the Prince of Orange was published, he told the king that he had had no part in summoning him to England. He was much grieved at hearing that his son, Lord Cornbury, had deserted James, but at length joined the Prince of Orange at Salisbury. Finding that he was coldly received by William, he soon resumed his Tory principles, and endeavoured to persuade the Princess Anne to insist on her rights to the throne. He took part in the Jacobite plots of 1690. Before setting out for Ireland William sent warning to him through his brother, Rochester. He was subsequently arrested by order of the Privy Council. He again engaged in Jacobite plots, and letters from him to James were seized among Preston's papers. He was confined in the Tower for six months, but afterwards suffered to go free. On the death of Queen Mary he lost his influence with the Princess Anne. The remainder of his life was spent in obscurity.

Clarendon, SIR ROGER (d. 1402), was a natural son of the Black Prince. He was a personal attendant of Richard II.; and in 1402, on a rumour that Richard was still alive, attempted to raise a rebellion, but was seized and executed.

Clarendon Code, THE, is the name given to the four Acts passed during Lord Clarendon's administration, directed against Nonconformists—viz., the Act of Uniformity, the Corporation Act, the Conventicle Act, and the Five-Mile Act.

Clarkson, THOMAS (b. 1760, d. 1846), was born at Wisbeach, and educated at St. Paul's School, and St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1785 he carried off the Latin Essay, the subject being, "Is it lawful to make men slaves against their will?" He was so thoroughly convinced by what he read on the subject of the horrors of the slave traffic, that he resolved to devote all his energies towards its abolition. Clarkson began with indefatigable zeal to prosecute inquiries at every port. The result of his researches he embodied in a pamphlet, entitled, A Summary View of the Slave Trade. Most of the leading men among the Whigs encouraged the movement, and Pitt, in 1788, supported a bill for mitigating the horrors of the Middle Passage. Clarkson's next publication was an Essay on the Impolicy of the Slave Trade. When the French Revolution broke out, he went over to Paris to try to induce the National Assembly to set an example to the world by introducing real equality for both white and black men. So unceasingly did he labour that in 1794 his health completely broke down, and he had to cease from all active work. He occupied his enforced leisure in writing a History of the Abolition of the Slave Trade, which appeared in 1808, the year after the Act for its abolition had passed through Parliament. In 1823 he was appointed one of the vice-presidents of the Anti-Slavery Society, which had just been formed. To Clarkson's exertions is the abolition of the slave trade in large measure due, since it was his researches which enabled Wilberforce to bring such convincing proofs of its horrors before Parliament.

Classes, THE ACT OF (1649), passed by the Scotch Estates, disqualified four "classes" of men from sitting in Parliament or holding office for various periods. The classes consisted of the enemies of the Covenant, Maligants, those who had entered into the "Engagement" with Charles I., and persons of immoral life.

Claverhouse. [DUNDEE.]

Cleanse the Causeway (1520) was the name given to a street fight in Edinburgh, between the partisans of the Douglas family and the followers of the crown and the Hamiltons. The Douglasses overpowered their antagonists, and drove them from the streets; hence the name of the combat, in which the Earl of Angus, the head of the Douglasses, slew Sir Patrick Hamilton, brother of the Earl of Arran.

Cleargrits, THE, was the name given to the extreme democratic party in Canada, about 1860, who were in favour of seceding from England and annexing Canada to the United States. They were at different times joined for a short period by discontented members both of the conservative and liberal parties.

Clergy is the general name given to the body of men set apart in England for the performance of public worship. Christianity in England was at first monastic, and churches were chiefly served by monks. [CHURCH, THE CELTIC.] The clergy were maintained by the offerings of the people or by the lords. The ecclesiastical organisation of Archbishop Theodore began from the top and was diocesan; but it spread downwards, and parishes were formed on the basis of townships. The Levitical ordinance of giving a tithe to God was first recommended, and in 787 was enacted by ecclesiastical councils which had the authority of witenagemots. At first this tithe went to the bishop, who distributed it into four parts: one for himself, one for the fabric of the church, one for the poor, and one for the incumbent. It was, however, frequently given by the lords of lands to monasteries, and so the system of appropriation began. The appropriators were bishops, monasteries, or spiritual corporations who received the tithe, and paid only a portion which they deemed sufficient to the vicar or curate who discharged the spiritual duties of the parish. Where the parson received the endowments of his office he was styled rector. This system of appropriation led to the growth and wealth of monastic orders, and to an inadequate provision for the parochial clergy. Its prevalence in England rendered easy the transference to Henry VIII. of ecclesiastical revenues which were held by appropriators in this anomalous way.

In early times the clergy were the civilisers and educators of England. Their system, their councils, and their learning made them powerful in influencing the growth of the organisation of the state. After the Norman Conquest their status became more definite, as everything else became more definite likewise. The growth of the canon law into a regular system, and the establishment of ecclesiastical courts gradually led to clerical exemptions from ordinary jurisdiction, which produced disorders. Henry II. strove to remedy this by the Constitutions of Clarendon; but criminal clerks were still handed over to ecclesiastical tribunals if they claimed Benefit of Clergy (q.v.), a privilege which was not entirely abolished till 1830.

The tenure of Church property was regulated by the concordat between Henry I. and Anselm, which established the obligation of homage on all temporalities. This led to the taxation of Church lands on the same footing as lands held by other barons. The taxation of the spiritual revenue of the clergy was attempted by John, but was withstood. The claim of the Pope to tax the clergy for a crusade gradually helped the king to break down clerical immunities on this head. The crown demanded grants from the spirituality, who considered these demands in Convocation. In this way the clerical assembly took part in secular business, and the clergy became more definitely organised into an estate of the realm. They were recognised as such by Edward I. in his Parliament of 1295, to which he summoned the proctors of chapters and of the parochial clergy. But the clergy preferred to tax themselves in Convocation, and therefore did not form a clerical estate. Probably they considered that they were sufficiently represented by the lords spiritual. [CONVOCAATION.]

The clergy in the Middle Ages were a wealthy body. Their share of indirect taxation was nearly a third of the whole amount. Their landed estates were spread over England, and their revenues from tithes and offerings were still greater. The monastic orders especially were good farmers, and did much to bring the soil of England under cultivation. The clergy were mild landlords, and stimulated the national industry. The numbers of the clergy were very large, and they were taken from every class of society. Even villeins sought ordination as a means of obtaining freedom. But the wealth of the Church was unequally divided. Pluralities were common, and many of the higher clergy were devoted to the business of the State. Parishes were not well served, in spite of the number of clergy. Very many of them were chaplains, or were endowed by private persons to say masses for their dead. Abuses grew up in proportion as the mechanism of the English Church was broken down by Papal interference, and appeals to Rome rendered futile the authority of the bishops. Till the beginning of the thirteenth century the clerical order was amongst the most resolute supporters of natural liberties against the crown. The growth of clerical corruption gave weight to the attacks of the Lollards upon the clergy, and the clergy finding themselves threatened made closer alliance with the crown. Yet the clergy, though ready to unite in defence of their own privileges, never made a compact political power. They were divided amongst themselves. The regular clergy opposed the seculars, the monks disliked the friars, Dominicans were set against Franciscans. In current politics the clergy were as much divided as the nation. They represented the education of the country, and their influence was spread into every class. Their moral influence was not so good. The excessive number of clergy, their wealth and idleness, rendered them on the whole frivolous. The obligation of celibacy was frequently evaded by concubinage, for which in some cases licences were purchased from bishops.

After the Reformation the wealth of the Church and the number of the clergy were greatly diminished. The connection with the Papacy ceased, and the clergy became closely united with the crown. Ecclesiastical courts were not, however, abolished; and under Elizabeth a new court, the Court of High Commission, was created for the purpose of exercising the powers of the royal supremacy. Elizabeth used the bishops as State officials for the purpose of reducing to uniformity the body of the clergy. The clergy were allowed to marry, but were ill-provided for, and no longer had an intellectual superiority over the laity. In the struggle against Popery on one side and Puritanism on the other, the clergy became more and more firm adherents of the royal prerogative. The State, in its desire for internal unity, recognised no other religious system save that of the Church of England, and refused to extend its limits. At the same time the Court of High Commission was used to sanction oppressive proceedings on the part of the crown. The Great Rebellion destroyed monarchy and Church alike, and at the Restoration the clergy returned as staunch Tories. Even the avowed intention of James II. to re-establish Romanism did not, in the eyes of some of the clergy, justify the Revolution. Nearly four hundred followed Archbishop Sancroft in resigning their benefices rather than take the oath of allegiance to William III.

The clergy of the seventeenth and the early part of the eighteenth century as a body were poor, and very many of the incumbents laboured with their own hands. Ecclesiastical incomes were still very unequally divided, and there was a great difference between the wealthy and learned clergy and the ordinary incumbents, who were on the same level as their people. The first attempt to raise the position of the poorer clergy was made by Queen Anne, who resigned the claims of the crown on annates and first-fruits, dues levied by the Pope on benefices which had passed into the hands of the crown. Out of these dues was formed a fund, known as "Queen Anne's Bounty," for the augmentation of small livings. From this time the average position of the clergy has slowly increased. In 1836 a body called Ecclesiastical Commissioners was established for the improved management and distribution of the revenues of the Church. The number of clergy attached to cathedrals was reduced, and the surplus revenues are applied to the increase of small benefices. In the same year the Tithes Commutation Act converted tithes into a rent-charge upon the land; and so ended the numerous disputes between the clergy and their parishioners which the system of tithes encouraged.

From the reign of Anne the clergy ceased to have any direct political importance. In 1717 the sittings of Convocation were practically suspended. Since Anne's reign no bishop has held any office of State. During the eighteenth century the clergy were not zealous in the discharge of their duties, till a new stimulus was given to religious zeal by the Wesleyan movement. The clergy were content to rest on their position as officers of a Church "by law established," and there were many scandals in reference to simoniacal appointments. The Tractarian movement of 1833 did much to deliver the Church from Erastianism, and to develop the zeal of the clergy. In 1838 the Pluralities Act did away with many of the abuses caused by the non-residence of wealthy clergymen at the benefices whose revenues they received.

Politically the clergy have been gradually deprived of exclusive privileges, and the State has removed all the disabilities which it had formerly placed on those who were not members of the Established Church. The clergy are now subject to the same jurisdiction as laymen in all civil matters. As regards their orthodoxy, their morals, and the conduct of their ministrations, they are subject to the jurisdiction of their bishops and to the law of the Church. The procedure of the Bishops' Court is regulated by the Church Discipline Act, 1840. Appeals from this court were formerly made to a Court of Delegates appointed by the king; but in 1832 this was transferred to the king in Council. [CHURCH.]

Admission into the clerical body is given by episcopal ordination. Candidates must have reached the age of twenty-three, must prove themselves fit in character, education, and orthodoxy, and must show that they have a definite sphere within which they can exercise their clerical functions. By canon law, ordination conferred an indelible character on the recipient, and a clergyman could not relinquish the priesthood. The Clerical Disabilities Act (1870) provides that a clergyman may execute a deed of relinquishment, which is to be recorded by his bishop in the diocesan registry. After this registration, the priest or deacon is incapable of officiating as such, and loses all his rights as a clergyman.

To enable the clergy to discharge their duties more efficiently, the State exempts them from certain civil responsibilities. They cannot be compelled to serve on a jury or to hold any temporal office. Ecclesiastical revenues cannot be seized in payment of debts, but are subject to sequestration, i.e., the churchwardens pay the sum due out of the profits of the benefice, after making provision for the performance of the services of the Church. On the other hand, the clergy labour under certain disabilities owing to their spiritual avocations. They are prohibited from trading, and may not sue for debts due from commercial transactions. In 1800 they were declared incapable of being elected members of the House of Commons.

"Clericis Laicos" are the opening words of the famous Bull issued by Pope Boniface VIII., forbidding the king to take, or the clergy to pay, taxes on their ecclesiastical revenues. The result of this was that, in 1297, Archbishop Winchelsey refused to agree to a money grant, whereupon Edward I. outlawed the clergy, and confiscated the estates of the see of Canterbury. Upon this, many of the clergy gave in; but the archbishop still held out, till eventually a compromise was made, whereby Winchelsey promised that if the king would confirm the charters, he would do his best to obtain money from the clergy, the Pope having declared that his prohibition did not affect voluntary grants for purposes of national defence. Cleveland, BARBARA VILLIERS, DUCHESS or (b. 1640, d. 1709), was the daughter of Lord Grandison, and wife of Roger Palmer. About 1659 she became one of Charles II.'s mistresses. In 1662 her husband was made Earl of Castlemaine, and it is as Lady Castlemaine that his wife is generally known. Her beauty and strong will gave her immense influence at court, while in the number of her intrigues she almost eclipsed the king. In 1670 she was created Duchess of Cleveland, and shortly afterwards left England for France, where she spent the rest of her life. In 1705 she married Robert (Beau) Fielding; but the marriage was subsequently annulled, on the ground of the husband's having committed bigamy. Of her sons by Charles II., the eldest became Duke of Cleveland, the second Duke of Grafton, and the youngest Duke of Northumberland.

Clifford, JOHN, LORD (d. 1461), was the son of Thomas, Lord Clifford, who fell in the first battle of St. Albans. He was a strong Lancastrian, and took part in the battle of Wakefield, after which, in revenge for his father's death, he killed in cold blood the young Earl of Rutland, son of the Duke of York. In 1461 he was defeated and slain at Ferrybridge.

Clifford, THOMAS, LORD (b. 1630, d. 1673), descended from an old Catholic family, highly distinguished himself by his bravery in the Dutch War of 1665, and in 1666 was made a Privy Councillor. He joined the Cabal ministry in 1667, and took a prominent part in the Treaty of Dover, and in advocating the war with Holland. In 1672 he was made Lord High Treasurer and a baron. In 1673 the passing of the Test Act compelled him, as a Catholic, to resign his office, and shortly afterwards he died. Clifford was one of the most zealous Catholics at court, and therefore a strong advocate of tolerance of all religious opinions. [CARAL.]

Clinton, EDWARD, LORD (b. 1512, d. 1584), an able commander and astute diplomatist, was, in 1550, appointed Lord High Admiral of England, having in the previous year held the post of Governor of Boulogne. On the accession of Elizabeth, he was confirmed in his office of Lord High Admiral, though he had just before shown some want of energy whilst commanding the fleet in the expedition against Brest, 1558. He subsequently became a trusted adviser of Elizabeth, and in 1569 did much to suppress the rising in the North. In 1572 he was created Earl of Lincoln, and in the same year sent to Paris to ratify the treaty with France. His policy was strongly anti-Spanish.

Clinton, GEORGE (b. 1739, d. 1812), Vice-President of the United States, entered Congress May 15, 1775, and voted for independence. In 1776 he was a deputy to the New York Provincial Congress. He was appointed brigadier-general, and defended Forts Montgomery and Clinton against Sir H. Clinton, Oct., 1777. He was chosen Governor of New York in 1777 and 1795, and Vice-President of the Union 1804-12.

Clinton, SIR HENRY (b. 1738, d. 1795), a grandson of the sixth Earl of Lincoln. On the prospect of a rupture with the American colonies, he was sent out with Howe and Burgoyne in command of reinforcements. He distinguished himself at Bunker Hill, and was soon afterwards despatched to Charleston. He was appointed commandant of Long Island. He did not, however, hold it long, as he was compelled to capitulate to Gates. In January, 1778, he was appointed commander-in-chief in America, and was fairly successful in this position. In 1780 he made an expedition to South Carolina and captured Charleston, and at one time had almost won back the Carolinas and Georgia. This campaign was stained by his tampering with General Arnold to induce him to deliver up West Point—a transaction which cost Major André's life—he failed also to succour Cornwallis. Circumstances which would have tried a much greater general than he, were opposed to him, and he was superseded. On his return to England a pamphlet war of mutual recriminations ensued between the two generals. He was afterwards Governor of Limerick, and in 1793 was transferred to Gibraltar, in command of which post he died in December, 1795.

Clinton, Sir Henry, G.C.B. (d. 1830), entering the army in 1787, first saw active service, as aide-de-camp to the Duke of York, in the campaigns of 1793–4 in the Netherlands. On his return to England in 1795, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 66th, and proceeded to the West Indies to join his regiment. There he served under Sir Ralph Abercromby, and was present at most of the expeditions against the different islands. On his return from the West Indies, he served under Lord Cornwallis in Ireland, as his aide-de-camp, and was present at the surrender of the French invading force at Ballinamuck. In April, 1799, he was attached to Lord William Bentinck on a mission to the Austro-Russian army in Northern Italy, and was present at the battles of Trebia and Novi, and the siege of Alessandria. Being afterwards appointed to join Suwarof, he was with him throughout the enterprising campaign in Switzerland. On his return to England he was appointed adjutant-general in India, where he served under Lake at the battle of Lasswaree, and where he remained until the spring of 1805. In 1806 he commanded the Guards in Sicily, and held Syracuse from December, 1806, to the following November. He was then appointed to the command of a brigade in Sir John Moore's expedition to Sweden, and on his return became adjutant-general to the army in Portugal, in which capacity he was present at the battle of Vimiero. Almost immediately afterwards, he accompanied Sir John Moore through the Spanish campaign and the retreat to Corunna. His next employment was in Ireland, where he remained two years, until he found a more congenial sphere in the command of a division under Wellington. He rendered conspicuous service at Salamanca, and was left in command on the Douro when Wellington advanced to Madrid, and was present at the siege of Burgos. For his services he received the thanks of Parliament, and obtained promotion, but continued to serve in Spain, and was present at nearly all the battles and sieges in the north of Spain and the south of France. His last public services were rendered to the country at Waterloo, where he commanded a division of infantry. During the peace that followed, he had no opportunity of displaying his great tactical abilities.

Clive, Robert, Lord (b. 1725, d. 1774), was the son of an obscure country gentleman of good lineage, but small fortune. He had been sent to India in the capacity of a writer in 1744, and was present at the surrender of Madras to Labourdonnais in 1746. The counting-house was little adapted to his genius, and he soon exchanged the pen for the sword. Having obtained an ensign's commission, he distinguished himself in the operation before Devicotta, where he attracted the admiration of Major Lawrence (1749). He was also present at the disastrous siege of Pondicherry, under Admiral Boscawen. By this time, the success of the confederation which Dupleix had aroused against the English had rendered the French masters of all South India. Clive successfully persuaded Mr. Saunders, Governor of Madras, to allow him to undertake the celebrated expedition to Arcot, which, by dividing the forces of the enemy, saved the English garrison cooped up in Trichinopoly. Clive's defence of Arcot laid the foundation of the British Empire in India. After fifty days, the troops of Chunda Sahib raised the siege. A series of successes, culminating at Trichinopoly, led to the surrender of the French general D'Auteuil to Chunda Sahib, and this in its turn brought about the recall and disgrace of Dupleix. After the capture of Couloum and Chingleput—two strong places in the Carnatic—Clive returned to England, in 1762, with his health greatly impaired. He was received with great distinction by the Company and by the ministers, and on his return to India was appointed Governor of Fort St. David. In 1756 Clive was entrusted with the task of revenging the tragedy of the Black Hole of Calcutta (q.v.) on Surajah Dowlah. With Admiral Watson in command of the fleet, he soon recovered Calcutta, and forced the nabob to treat for peace. But no sooner had Clive been called away than Surajah Dowlah began to intrigue with the French. It was evident that the English power was in serious danger unless a prompt blow were struck; and Clive, after entering into negotiations with the nabob's discontented subjects, utterly defeated the native army at Plassey (1757). Meer Jaffier was appointed to the government of Bengal; but his fellow-traitor, Omichund, whose services had been secured by a forged promise of £300,000, received nothing. From the new nabob Clive obtained for the Company a concession of the land 600 yards around the Mahratta Ditch, and the zemindary rights of the country lying to the south of Calcutta. The victory of Plassey was followed by the assassination of Surajah Dowlah; the reconstitution of the government of Calcutta, with Clive at its head; the rout of the invading army of Ali Gehur, the heir of the Mogul Empire (1759); and the return of Clive to England, in 1760. On his return, he was received with great distinction by all ranks, and honoured with an Irish peerage. In 1765 he returned once more to India, as Governor of Bengal, pledged to reform the luxury and corruption of the civil servants of the Company—who had made large fortunes by the cruellest extortion—and to settle the disturbed affairs of Bengal. He put an end to these practices by enforcing the laws prohibiting the acceptance of presents from the natives; while, at the same time, he raised the pay of the civil service by appropriating to this purpose the proceeds of the salt monopoly. The Nabob of Moorshedabad [MBER COSSIM] was pensioned off, the dewanny of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa was obtained for the Company by imperial firman, and a mutiny in the army was successfully quelled. In 1767 Clive finally returned to England, with his health shattered by severe attacks of disease, when his enemies in the India House tried to impeach him for corrupt practices; but the House of Commons passed a resolution that "Robert Lord Clive had rendered great and meritorious services to his country." Broken, however, by the pressure of bodily and mental suffering, he put an end to his existence in November, 1774. [INDIA; EAST INDIA COMPANY.]

Clontarf, THE BATTLE OF, was fought on Friday, April 23, 1014. Brian Boru (q.v.) and his son, at the head of the Irish of Munster, Connaught, Meath, and Ulster, were opposed to the Ostmenn (q.v.) of Ireland, reinforced by their countrymen from the Baltic and the Orkneys, and supported by the Leinster Irish. The result was a victory for Brian; but both he and his son fell in the fight. The Danes are said to have lost 6,000 men, and they never became formidable to the native Irish after this defeat.

Clontarf, MEETING AT. A monster meeting in support of the Repeal of the Union was to be held on this historical spot on Oct. 8, 1843. The government issued a proclamation for its prevention, and military precautions were taken. O'Connell (q.v.) and the priests exerted themselves to keep the people from assembling, and succeeded, in spite of the short notice given. But it thus became evident that O'Connell would not fight, and that the Repeal movement was virtually dead.

Close Rolls, THE, are certain Records of the crown containing letters, mandates, &c., of a private nature. They begin in 1204, and treat of an infinite variety of subjects. They are of very great importance in the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth centuries as containing materials for local and family histories, and also as shedding light on many obscure parts of our national annals. The Close Rolls of John and the first eleven years of Henry III. have been printed by the Record Commission under the editorship of Sir T. Hardy.

Closter-Seven, THE CONVENTION OF (1757), was one of the incidents of the Seven Years' War. In July, the English commander, the Duke of Cumberland, was defeated at Hastenbeck by the French. Hameln, Göttingen, Hanover, Bremen, and Verben were occupied by the French. Cumberland retired under Stade, but his communications with the Elbe were soon cut off. He therefore accepted the mediation of the King of Denmark, and on Sept. 8 signed a convention with the Duke of Richelieu. The terms were, that the assailing troops, such as those of Hesse and Brunswick, should be sent home, and that the Hanoverians under Cumberland should pass the Elbe, and be dispersed into different quarters of cantonments, leaving only a garrison at Stade. The convention was very violently denounced in Prussia, and in England it was generally looked upon as extremely disgraceful. But perhaps Cumberland took the wisest course under the circumstances. The French were in vastly superior force, and his own army was ill-disciplined and not to be depended on in any way. The convention was not rigidly kept on either side, and was subsequently, at the suggestion of Pitt, repudiated by the English, and the Hanoverian army equipped afresh.

Clovesho was the place where synods were held in Anglo-Saxon times. There have been numerous conjectures as to its situation, but it may perhaps be identified with Cliffe-at-Hoo, in Kent, though it is also said to be a place nearer London.

Club, THE, was a name given to the Parliamentary majority of the Scotch Parliament, 1689, who used to meet in a tavern in Edinburgh to concert their measures against the government. The Club, which was composed of various elements, including Tories, discontented Whigs, and men of other political creeds, soon attained considerable power, and proved an immense hindrance to the government. In 1690 its chief members, Annandale, Ross, and Montgomery, began to intrigue with the Jacobites, the result being the revelation of the Montgomery plot.

Clyde, COLIN CAMPBELL, LORD (b. 1792, d. 1863), entered the army at an early age, and first saw service in the Peninsular War. He received his lieutenant-colonelcy in 1832, and in the Chinese War in 1842 went out in command of his regiment, the 98th. In the Sikh War of 1848—9 he obtained considerable distinction, was wounded at Chillianwallah, and largely contributed to the victory of Goojerat. In the Crimean War he was in command of the Highland Brigade, and greatly distinguished himself at the Alma, after which battle he received the personal thanks of Lord Raglan. On the morning of the battle of Balaklava, the Highland Brigade, under Campbell, was entrusted with the defence of the British landing-place, and the repulse of a squadron of Russian cavalry was one of the results of the day's fighting. In July, 1857, Sir Colin Campbell was ordered to India to assume command against the mutineers. Leaving England at twenty-four hours' notice, he arrived at Calcutta on Aug. 13, and hastily collecting what troops he could, he marched on Lucknow, the relief of which city was effected with consummate skill and generalship. One after another the rebel strongholds were reduced, and Sir Colin's talents as a commander-in-chief were hardly more conspicuous than his tact and temper in the difficult position in which he was placed. On the complete suppression of the Mutiny by this able general and his brilliant lieutenants, Campbell was raised to the peerage, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, with a pension of £2,000 a year. He was created a field-marshal shortly before his death.

Cobbett, WILLIAM (b. 1762, d. 1835), the son of a Surrey farmer, was born at Farnham. After spending some years as a solicitor's clerk and a private in the army, he went to America in 1792, and opened a bookseller's shop in Philadelphia. Here he issued a series of pamphlets under the title of "Peter Porcupine." In 1801 he returned to England and set up a morning paper, in which he warmly supported Mr. Pitt. This failed, and he afterwards started the Weekly Register. At first he was patronised by the ministry, but in 1805 he became an eager Radical, and a formidable opponent to the ministry. In 1810 he was prosecuted for some remarks on a military flogging, and imprisoned for two years, but still continued to write. It was at this time that he issued Twopenny Trash, a series of papers wherewith he harassed the administration. In 1817 he again settled in America; but returned in 1819 and took an active part in the trial of Queen Caroline. He also unsuccessfully contested Coventry and Westminster. Renewing his attention to agriculture, he took a farm, and attempted to introduce Indian corn as a staple article of English produce, but the project proved a failure. In 1831 he was prosecuted for publishing a libel with intent to rouse discontent in the minds of the labourers. In defending himself he made a defiant speech, declaring that "the Tories had ruled the country with rods, but the Whigs scourged it with scorpions." The jury disagreed and he was discharged. In 1832 he was returned to the Reformed Parliament for Oldham. The exertion of speaking on the Marquis of Chandos's motion on agricultural distress on May 25, 1835, and remaining late to vote were too much for him. He went down to his farm early next morning, and died three weeks afterwards. He was a most prolific and popular writer, and the vigour of his style and his extraordinary mastery of the resources of the language have been deservedly praised. Among his works are the Parliamentary History to 1803, in 12 vols., a well-known and useful compilation; the Political Register; Cottage Economy; and a translation of Marten's Law of Nations.

There is a good sketch of Cobbett in Lord Dalling, Historical Characters.

Cobden, RICHARD (b. 1804, d. 1865), was born at Midhurst, in Sussex, and became early in life a traveller for a cotton firm, settling in Lancashire. In 1830 he started a business in partnership with some of his relatives. He was highly successful in his new sphere of work, and travelled abroad in Greece, Turkey, and the United States, in the interest of the house to which he belonged (1834—35). On his return from the latter country he addressed several letters on economical and political subjects to the Manchester Times, strongly advocating the theories of his later years, peace, retrenchment, non-interference, and free trade. Meanwhile the Anti-Corn-Law League had been established at Manchester (1838), and when Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright joined its ranks, they roused its energies to the full. At the election of 1841, when Lord Melbourne made his appeal to the country in favour of a fixed duty on corn, Mr. Cobden was elected member for Stockport. He now had every opportunity of advocating his views; and at last Sir Robert Peel declared himself in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws (1846) and repealed them the following year. Sir Robert Peel on this occasion paid a just tribute to Mr. Cobden's efforts. While absent on the Continent, Mr. Cobden was returned for the West Riding of Yorkshire (1847). He had before this refused to join Lord Russell's ministry, but offered a strong opposition to the Derby government of 1852, and the Coalition cabinet of Lord Aberdeen. He condemned the war with Russia entirely; and in this matter, though he succeeded in causing a dissolution of Parliament by carrying a vote condemning the proceedings of Sir John Bowring in China, his course was so distasteful to his constituents that he did not offer himself again for the West Riding, and remained out of Parliament till 1859, when he was elected, in his absence, for Rochdale. In 1860 he negotiated the commercial treaty with the French; but always steadily refused to take office. To his latest years he continued an ardent advocate of free trade, and was one of the few English politicians who, in the early years of the American Civil War, were steady supporters of the Northern States. He died on the 2nd April, 1866.

Cobham, ELEANOR, was first the mistress and then the wife of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, to whom she was married in 1426. She was the daughter of Reginald, Lord Cobham. In 1441 she was arraigned on a charge of treason and witchcraft, and it appeared that two of her accomplices had by her orders constructed a waxen image of King Henry VI., which they gradually melted before a fire, it being expected that the king's life would waste away as the image was acted upon by the heat. In the event of Henry's death, the Duke of Gloucester, as the nearest heir of the house of Lancaster, would have succeeded to the throne. For these crimes Eleanor Cobham was compelled to do public penance in the streets of London, and was imprisoned for life in the Isle of Man.

Cobham, WILLIAM BROOKE, LORD (d. 1598), was Warden of the Cinque Ports when Bailly's treasonable letters were captured in 1571; by his connivance, Leslie, Bishop of Ross, was enabled to change the packet before it was laid before the Council. In 1578 he was sent on a mission to the Low Countries, in conjunction with Sir Francis Walsingham, and again in 1588 with Lord Derby, Sir James Croft, and Sir Amyas Paulet, as his companions. He was subsequently created Lord Chamberlain.

Cobham, LORD. [OLDCASTLE.]

Cochrane, ROBERT, a stonemason, was the favourite and principal adviser of James III. of Scotland, whom he is said to have instigated to murder his brother, the Earl of Mar. On Mar's death, Cochrane obtained a grant of his estates, a circumstance which roused the Scotch nobles to fury. No audience could be obtained with the king except through his favourite. He was hanged, together with some other favourites of the king, at the bridge of Lander, by Archibald "Bell-the-Cat," in 1482.

Codrington, CHRISTOPHER (b. 1668, d. 1711), was born in Barbadoes, and having served with distinction in Europe, being present at the siege of Namur, was rewarded with the post of Governor of the Leeward Islands. In 1703 he planned and carried out the attack on the French at Guadaloupe.

Codrington, ADMIRAL SIR EDWARD (b. 1770, d. 1851), entered the navy in 1783, and was present at the battles off the De Croix and Trafalgar; he accompanied the expedition to Walcheren; and was employed off the coast of Spain co-operating with the Catalonian patriots during the Peninsular War. During the war with the United States which followed, he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. In 1815 he was nominated a K.C.B., was promoted to the rank of vice-admiral, 1821, and was appointed commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean squadron, 1826. It was in this capacity that he took the leading part in the battle of Navarino, Oct. 20, 1827. In reward for this, Codrington was advanced to the dignity of the Grand Cross of the Bath; while from the Emperor of Russia he received the Grand Cross of St. George; and from the King of France the Grand Cross of St. Louis. But at home opinions were divided as to the necessity of what the Duke of Wellington called "an untoward event," and Sir Edward was thought to have been unduly influenced by his Philhellenic ideas; he was recalled in April, 1828. He obtained the rank of full admiral, and was appointed in 1839 commander-in-chief at Portsmouth. In 1832 he had been elected for Devonport in the Liberal interest, and was re-elected in 1835 and 1837; but resigned his seat upon taking the command at Portsmouth.

Coggeshall, RALPH OF, wrote a chronicle extending from 1066 to 1224. The earlier part is a compilation from various sources, but from 1187 this chronicle is important and valuable. Beyond the fact that Ralph was Abbot of Coggeshall from 1207 to 1210, and resigned in the latter year on account of ill-health, nothing is known of him.

Ralph of Coggeshall's Chronicle is published in the Rolls Series.

Coinage. The Britons first learnt the art of coining from the Gauls about a hundred years before the invasion of Julius Cæsar. The Gaulish native coinage at this era consisted chiefly of rude imitations of the gold staters of Philip II. of Macedon, which almost from the time that they were struck, or say from about a.c. 300, began to have a currency in that country. These copies passed over into Britain, and were again in their turn copied still more rudely by the Britons. The coins of Philip which thus afforded a prototype to both the Gaulish and British coins, represented upon one side the laureate head of Apollo (or possibly Arès or Heracles), and on the reverse a two-horse chariot or biga. The British imitations of these pieces are so rude that at first sight no resemblance between the original and the copy can be detected. The barbarous artists, unable to copy the head, have represented it by only a few lines and dots, and have at last confined their attempts at copying to the hair and the laurel wreath. On the reverse, the chariot and charioteer have almost, or totally disappeared, and the horse is barely recognisable. At first the British currency was entirely of gold, but a short time before the Roman invasion, silver, copper, and tin coins were also issued. These began by being imitations of the gold coinage, but afterwards copied the silver and other metal coins of Gaul. The British coins were at first entirely without legend; but about the time of the Roman invasion names began to appear upon them. Some of these names are otherwise known to history, as is, for example, Cunobelinus, the Cymbeline of Shakespeare. Although Cæsar's invasion did not immediately affect the political condition of the country, a tendency to imitate the Roman civilisation (which was beginning to take a firm hold in Gaul) set in in Britain, and of this there is abundant evidence on the coins. The Macedonian type gradually disappears, and we have designs copied from the contemporary Roman coinage.

After the subjugation of South Britain by the Romans, the regular imperial series was substituted for the native currency, the British towns of mintage being Londinium and Camulodunum (Colchester). The last Roman coins struck in Britain were probably some which bear the name of Magnus Maximus the usurper, and which were apparently issued in A.D. 383.

From this time forward a considerable interval occurs. Doubtless, Roman coins were still current in Britain, though as time went on they must have diminished in numbers. Then came the rise of the Saxon currency. The first coins issued by the Saxons seem to have been some small silver pieces usually called sceattas, weighing twenty grains, and bearing generally no name, whose precise date, on this account, it would be very hard to determine. Those of the sceattas which are probably the latest are some which have Runic letters, and which can be dated in the middle of the seventh century. While we are speaking of these coins it is the proper place to notice a series of copper pieces, very like the sceattas in size and shape, which were confined altogether to the kingdom of Northumbria, and which belong to a rather later period than the sceattas, namely, to the eighth and part of the ninth centuries. They are called styccas.

We then come to the coin which long remained almost the sole money of the English, with the insignificant exception of a few gold coins, which were struck from time to time. This was the penny. It was copied from the silver denarius, which in the course of the eighth century, and under the Carolingian dynasty had come to supplant the gold currency of the Merovingian time. The penny, like the Carolingian denarius, was a thin and flat silver coin, weighing some twenty to twenty-four grains; the full weight being twenty-four, whence the twenty-four grains which make up our pennyweight. The usual type of the penny showed on one side a rude head or bust, intended conventionally to represent that of the king, whose name was written round the head, while on the reverse, the piece showed some device, most frequently a form of cross: around this device was written the name of the moneyer, i.e., the fabricator of the coin, and of the town in which the piece was made. The pennies begin with Offa, King of Mercia (A.D. 755—794), and they continue (with trifling exceptions) the sole English coins until the reign of Edward I. (1272).

The student must be placed upon his guard against confounding the actual denominations of coins with the denominations of money of account. In early times calculations were constantly made in money of account which was unrepresented by any coined pieces. This was a reminiscence of the days when money was computed altogether by weight. In fact, it may be said that the name of almost every coin which has ever existed has denominated a weight before it denominated a coined piece (e.g., the Greek stater, the Jewish shekel, &c.). The Saxon money of account was of two kinds. One was derived from their weight system, which was a combination of the Roman, and a non-Roman Teutonic system, and whose chief denominations were the pound and the mark. The second money of account was simply taken from the Roman (or Byzantine) gold coin, the solidus, which in English was called the shilling. We frequently read of sums computed in pounds, marks, and shillings. Occasionally a solidus in gold was actually struck. The value of these moneys of account relative to the current coin has remained unaltered. The pound contained twenty shillings, or 240 pence; the mark two-thirds of the pound, or 160 pence. The mark eventually fell out of use, leaving the three forms of money by which we still compute—the pound (liber), the shilling (solidus), and the penny (denarius). From these Latin names come our symbols, £, s., d.

The Norman Conquest produced at first no material alteration in the English coinage. The penny continued to be the sole currency down to the reign of Edward I. The pennies of the first two Williams were as varied in their types as those of any previous monarch; but after these reigns the types diminished rapidly in number, and from the time of Edward I. downwards, through many subsequent reigns, this coin was made upon one uniform pattern, which showed on the obverse a full face crowned, and on the reverse a long cross; the whole displaying a distinctly architectural design. The groat (first coined in the reign of Edward I.) was in type almost identical with the penny. The next important change was made by Edward III., who introduced a gold currency into England. For a long period in the Middle Ages—that is to say, from the beginning of the ninth century to the middle of the thirteenth—the gold coins in use in Western Europe had been supplied by the Emperors of Byzantium, whence these pieces acquired the name of bezants. Florence and Venice, in the course of the thirteenth century, instituted a gold currency of their own, and this example was speedily followed by other countries of Europe. Henry III. had made the experiment of a gold coinage by striking gold pennies worth thirty times as much as the silver coins; but this was only an experiment. Edward III. introduced a regular gold currency, first of florins (named after the gold coin of Florence), and afterwards of nobles, so called on account of the fineness of their metal. In value they were equal to eighty pence—i.e., to half a mark. The noble represented on one side the king in a ship (an allusion to the victory of Sluys), and on the other a highly ornamental cross. Half and quarter nobles were issued at the same time. The type was slightly altered by Edward IV., who replaced the reverse cross by a sun, and on the side of the ship placed a rose, from whence his pieces got the name of rose nobles. They were also called royals (royals). Silver having declined in value in comparison to gold, the rose nobles were now worth ten shillings, and to represent the older value of half a mark a new piece was struck, having on one side the figure of St. Michael trampling upon Satan, and on the other a ship bearing a cross. This coin was called the angel noble, or, more shortly, the angel; its half was the angelet.

Further changes of importance are to be noted in the reign of Henry VII. In the gold currency, the pound sovereign was added to the pieces already in circulation. This coin, which was larger than any previously struck and current for twenty shillings, represented upon the obverse the king enthroned, and on the other side the royal arms over a rose. Shillings were now first struck, and the type of the groat was changed from a front to a side face. Henry VIII. struck some double-sovereigns, as well as half-sovereigns, and crowns, or quarter-sovereigns, in gold, and he issued a new type of noble (not continued in subsequent reigns) called the george noble. It nearly resembled the angel, but displayed St. George in place of St. Michael on the obverse. This king is unfavourably distinguished as the first who persistently debased the coinage of this country. The debasement continued during the two following reigns; but in the reign of Elizabeth the coinage was restored to its former purity. Edward VI. first struck the crown and the half-crown in silver, as well as the sixpence. In the reign of Mary we have sovereigns, rose nobles, angels, half-angels, half-crowns, shillings, groats, pence, and the divisions of the penny; but in the reign of Elizabeth we find the highest complement in the number of its denominations which the English coinage ever attained. It now consisted of no less than twenty distinct kinds of coin, viz., in gold, of the sovereign, half-, quarter-, and half-quarter-sovereign, rose noble or ryal, angel (now equal to a half-sovereign), angelet and quarter-angel, crown and half-crown; in silver, of the crown, half-crown, shilling, sixpence, groat, half-groat, three-penny, and three-halfpenny pieces, the penny, the three farthings, the half-penny, and farthing. Queen Elizabeth also struck coins for the use of the East India Company, which may be reckoned the beginning of the English colonial coinage. In the reign of James I. there was no substantial alteration, though some of the above denominations were changed, and some abandoned. The sovereign was now generally known as the broad, and this name was continued through the reign of Charles I. and through the Commonwealth. Charles I. struck some pieces of the value of three pounds, and subsequently, during the scarcity of gold which he experienced during the Civil War, he melted plate and coined it into silver pieces of the values of twenty and of ten shillings.

From the accession of James I. until the reign of Charles II., considerable fluctuations took place in the value of gold, and therefore in the value of the chief gold coin. At one time the broad was worth as much as thirty shillings. In the reign of Charles II. it became fixed to the somewhat arbitrary value of twenty-one shillings, and as the gold from which the money of this reign was made came chiefly from the Guinea coast, the highest gold coins of this period acquired the name of guinea-pounds, or of guineas. Henceforth, until nearly the end of the reign of George III., the guinea entirely replaced the sovereign, and the gold currency, from the reign of Charles II. to George III., uniformly consisted of pieces of five, two, one, and half guineas. In 1817 George III. reintroduced the sovereign, and the guinea was abandoned save as a money of account. The first copper pennies, halfpennies, and farthings were coined in 1672, and the first bronze coins in 1861.

The coinage of Scotland began at a much later date than did that of England. With the exception of a few rude pennies (imitative of the contemporary English coins) struck by Danish invaders during the eleventh century, we have no Scottish money until the reign of David I., about the year 1124. The first coinage of Scotland followed as closely as possible the types of the English money, consisting, like the English coinage, at first exclusively of pennies, and about the end of the thirteenth century (David II.) of the penny and the groat. The noble was likewise introduced by David II., but not continued in subsequent reigns. But after her long struggle for independence had come to an end, Scotland began to issue a series of new denominations, which we will briefly mention in the order in which they were introduced. Robert II. coined gold pieces called from their types, St. Andrew and Lion (having the shield of Scotland upon one side), and equal respectively to a half and a quarter of the noble. These two names and types were afterwards united for one piece. James I. struck a coin called demey, and equal in value to half an English noble. In the reign of James III. were issued the first coins in base silver, or billon, and of a very low value, which went by the names of placks and half-placks. The Scottish coinage was now completely separated from the English, though some of the nominal values were still retained. The actual values of the Scottish currency deteriorated so rapidly that when, in the reign of James VI. (I.), the coinages of the two countries had to be brought into agreement, the Scottish shilling was found to be worth only one-twelfth of the English shilling. Therefore, when we read of a certain number of shillings Scots, we may pretty generally reduce that to the same number of pence in English reckoning. In the reign of James III. we notice the introduction of two new gold coins, the rudder, which shows the king on horseback, and the unicorn, on which that animal is holding a shield. Divisions of these pieces and of the St. Andrew were struck. Two other gold coins, not differing much from these in value, but different in type, belong to the reign of James V.—viz., the ecu, or crown, giving (as the name implies) the shield of Scotland on the obverse, and the bonnet piece, where the king's bust is represented in a square cap. The same prince coined a billon piece, known as the baubee, a corruption from bas piece in Scottish French. In the reign of Mary we have a number of new coins, which by their names show an approach to the contemporary English coinage—viz., the twenty shilling piece, the ryal in gold, the testoon, equal in value to an English sixpence, and a billon piece called hardhead. A separate Scottish coinage was continued in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., but the coins were more and more assimilated to the English type.

The Irish coinage calls for little remark. The Danish kings of Ireland in the tenth and eleventh century struck pennies, some of which bear the names of known kings. The first coins struck after the Anglo-Norman Conquest were issued by John while still a prince, and governor of Ireland. Henceforward the Irish coinage follows that of England, with these differences—that it contains no gold coinage, nor the higher denominations of silver, and is generally of a more alloyed metal. The harp for Ireland and the three crowns are the most distinctive types. The principal Anglo-Irish mint places were Dublin and Waterford. Edward IV. struck a considerable Irish currency, and at various mints, Dublin, Cork, Drogheda, Limerick, Trin, Waterford, and Wexford. During the period that James II. remained in Ireland, after his flight from London, he issued a coinage of bronze, generally called gun-money, which assumed the denomination of coins of corresponding size and type in silver. On the accession of William and Mary this coinage fell to its metal value, that is to say, a nominal value of £22,500 was bought back for £640.

Coke, SIR EDWARD (b. 1552, d. 1633), Chief Justice of England, was born at Mileham, in Norfolk. After leaving Cambridge, he became a member of the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar early in 1578, when his extraordinary ability speedily became manifest. Appointed Recorder of Norwich, 1586, he fulfilled the duties of his office with such acuteness that, in 1592, he was made Recorder of London, and in the same year Solicitor-General. As Speaker of the House of Commons, in 1593, he distinguished himself by the flowery nature of his addresses to Elizabeth, and a few months later became Attorney-General, in which capacity he conducted the prosecution for the crown of the Earls of Southampton and Essex (1601). In 1603, Coke, who had received the honour of knighthood from James I., was the crown prosecutor at the trial of Sir Walter Raleigh, on which occasion he displayed unfeeling harshness and arrogance. Three years later Sir Edward Coke was engaged to prosecute the conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot, and displayed great ability in his management of the case. Shortly afterwards he became Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and, in 1613, was transferred to the King's Bench and made a Privy Councillor. His enemies were, however, many and powerful; Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, Buckingham, and Sir Francis Bacon were his implacable foes, and in 1616 Coke refused to assist the court by giving judgment for the king in the case of Commandams, and thus gave them an opportunity to procure his downfall. The Chief Justice was removed from his office on the charge that in his reports of decided cases he had introduced several things in derogation of the royal prerogative. The amity of Bacon continued, but Coke, by the alliance of his daughter with a brother of Buckingham, regained some small share of the royal favour, and was subsequently one of the managers of Bacon's impeachment. In 1621 he entered Parliament, where he speedily drew upon himself the hostility of the court by his opposition to monopolies, and by his determined assertion of the power of Parliament. At the end of the year he was imprisoned in the Tower, but was released after a few months, and continued to take an active part in Parliamentary affairs, whilst, in 1628, he originated and carried the Petition of Right (q.v.). Sir Edward Coke's reputation as a lawyer and as a judge was unequalled in his age. As the author of the celebrated Reports, 1600—1615, and the Commentary upon Littleton, 1628, he is still a writer of the greatest importance to those who would know anything of the history of English law and practice. [F. S. P.]

Coke, ROGER, was the author of a work called Detection of the State of England during the Four Last Reigns, Lond., 1697, which is of some historical value.

Coke, WILLIAM, in 1552, was made a judge of the Common Pleas. He is said to have been one of the witnesses to the will of Edward VI., altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey; but there is some doubt as to whether he actually signed the document. He died 1553.

Colchester, generally identified with the Roman Camulodunum, was one of the most important Roman stations in England. Immense quantities of Roman relics have been found here. It was an important centre under the kings of the West Saxon line, and was strongly fortified by Edward the Elder. It appears in Domesday as a place of considerable importance. In 1218 it was taken by Louis of France. The town enjoyed considerable trade all through the Middle Ages. During the Great Rebellion it was captured by the Royalists under Lord Goring in 1648. Fairfax besieged it for eleven weeks, and finally took it. The abbey was a Benedictine foundation, instituted in the reign of Henry I., and suppressed after the execution of the last abbot for treason in 1539. The town has returned two members to Parliament since 23rd Edward I. It received a charter from Richard I. in 1089.

Colchester, CHARLES ARBOT, LORD (b. 1757, d. 1829), was educated at Westminster, and Christ Church, Oxford, and attained much practice at the bar. He entered Parliament in 1795, and strongly supported the Seditious Meetings Bill. In 1801 he was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland. In 1802 he became Speaker of the House of Commons, in which capacity he gave a casting vote against Lord Melville in 1805. He strongly opposed the Catholic Relief Bill, effected several important improvements in the mode of managing business in the House, resigned his seat in 1817, and was raised to the Peerage.

Colet, JOHN (b. 1466, d. 1519), Dean of St. Paul's, was the son of Sir Henry Colet, and was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. About 1493 he went to the Continent, and studied Greek in Italy and Paris, making the acquaintance of Erasmus and other scholars. Returning in 1497, he lectured at Oxford on Divinity and Greek. In 1506 he was made Prebendary and Dean of St. Paul's. Between 1508 and 1512 he founded and endowed St. Paul's School. Colet was one of the most effective of the teachers of the "New Learning" in England in the early part of the sixteenth century, and one of the most earnest of the knot of churchmen who aimed at the reformation and purification of the Church of England without actually separating from Rome.

F. Seebohm, The Oxford Reformers.

Coleman, EDWARD (d. 1678), was secretary to the Duchess of York. He was a Roman Catholic, a convert from Protestantism, and a busy intriguer, who corresponded secretly with the French court. He was one of the first accused by Titus Oates of complicity in the Popish Plot. His papers were seized, and he was arrested. In his possession were found letters addressed to Père La Chaise, Louis XIV.'s confessor, in which he asked for money to be employed in giving "the greatest blow to the Protestant religion it has received since its birth," together with other expressions of a similar character. These were considered to be conclusive proofs of his guilt. On his trial Oates and Bedloe bore witness against him, and he was executed.

Colepepper, JOHN, LORD (d. 1660), after having spent many years abroad in foreign service, returned to England, and was elected to the Long Parliament, where he distinguished himself by his vigorous opposition to monopolies. In 1642 the king made him Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he acquired great influence in the royal councils. On the outbreak of the Civil War he joined the king, was made Master of the Rolls in 1643, and a peer in 1644. He accompanied Prince Charles to Holland, where he remained till the Restoration, when he was reinstated as Master of the Rolls, but died very soon afterwards.

Clarendon, Hist. of the Rebellion.

College, STEPHEN (d. 1681), known as "the Protestant joiner," was a citizen of London, celebrated in Charles II.'s reign for his intemperate zeal against the Roman Catholics. In 1681 he was sent to Oxford by Shaftesbury to watch the proceedings of the court party during the session of Parliament. While at college there, he distinguished himself by inventing a "Protestant flail" for beating out the brains of Papists, and by writing coarse rhymes against the king. He was indicted in London on a charge of high treason, but the bill was thrown out by the grand jury. Subsequently he was tried in Oxford, found guilty of a conspiracy to seize the king, on the evidence of Dugdale and other informers, and executed.

Collier, JEREMY (b. 1650, d. 1726), was rector of Ampton, in Suffolk, and in 1685 was appointed lecturer at Gray's Inn. He was a zealous partisan of the Stuarts, and was committed to Newgate for writing against William III.; he was, however, released without trial. But having granted absolution to the prisoners executed for the Assassination Plot (q.v.), he was obliged to leave the country. Returning to London, he wrote several works. In 1698 he produced his Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, in which he attacked Dryden and other dramatists of the day. The book was widely read, and had considerable effect in bringing about the gradual reformation of the stage. Collier also produced, among other works, an Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, which involved him in a controversy with Burnet.

Collingwood, CUTHBERT, LORD (b. 1750, d. 1810), was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and was very early sent to sea. In 1774 he served under Admiral Graves in America, and led a party of seamen at Bunker Hill. In 1776 he proceeded to the West Indies, where his promotion was rapid, as he stepped into each place vacated by Nelson, and in 1780 he accompanied Nelson in the expedition against San Juan, where his strong constitution stood him in good stead among the pestilential marshes. During the three next years he did good service in the capture of French merchantmen, and on peace being concluded in 1783, rejoined Nelson in the West Indies. In 1786 he returned to England, but did not long remain idle: and on the 1st of June, 1793, he greatly distinguished himself, though his services were passed over by Lord Howe. In command of the Excellent, he was present at the battle of St. Vincent, and took more than his share of the hard fighting. After this he was employed in blockading the enemy's ports, but managed to obtain a short holiday in 1798. The next year he was made a rear-admiral, and was appointed to serve in the Channel fleet under Lord Bridport, by whom he was shortly afterwards despatched with reinforcements to Lord Keith in the Mediterranean. In May, 1802, he obtained a year's quiet enjoyment with his family, and was then sent off to join Admiral Cornwallis off Brest. In 1804 he was engaged in the blockade of Cadiz, until the union of the French and Spanish fleets compelled him to retire. But he soon resumed his position, and only left it to join Nelson's fleet in its pursuit of Villeneuve. In command of the Royal Sovereign he was second in command to Nelson at Trafalgar, and, leading one division of the fleet, was the first to engage the enemy. On Nelson's death the command devolved on Collingwood, who has now been acquitted of any blame for not having saved more of the enemy's ships after the battle. He was at once raised to the peerage with a life pension of £2,000 per annum. He continued actively employed in annoying the French coast, and guarding the relations of England with the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. So unremitting were his exertions, that they produced a disease which finally, on March 10, 1810, killed him almost at his post, and before he could reach England. He was of all the able captains of his day second only to Nelson, nor was he less beloved by his men for his gentle consideration and his daring courage.

Colonies, THE, may be said to date from the time of the enterprising navigators of Queen Elizabeth's reign—such as Gilbert and Raleigh (q.v.), by whom the infant colony of Virginia was first planted, in 1587—but it was not until the persecutions of James I. and Charles I. drove many Puritans to seek an asylum in New England that colonisation became at all general amongst Englishmen. Henceforward the colonies on the Atlantic seaboard of North America increased rapidly, absorbing the settlements of other nations, such as the Dutch on the Hudson, the Swedes on the Delaware, and, finally, the French on the Mississippi. [COLONIES, THE AMERICAN.] When these colonies seceded from England in 1783, a new area for colonisation in temperate climates had already been opened up by the discovery of Australia. [AUSTRALIA.] The town of Sydney was founded in 1787, and the progress of the various settlements of the Australasian group has been continuous since that time. Another group of colonies are those which have been acquired by conquest from other powers, chiefly France, Spain, and Holland. Of these the most important is Canada (q.v.), conquered in the Seven Years' War (1757—63), and the islands of the West Indies, many of which were acquired in the same war, and the Cape of Good Hope, taken in the war of the French Revolution (1793—1815). The term Colony is used somewhat loosely to include the various dependencies (whether true colonial settlements or not) administered by the department of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. They may be classed roughly as:—

(1) Agricultural colonies, where cultivation of the soil and sheep-farming is the chief source of wealth—such as the Australian colonies and those of British North America.

(2) Plantation colonies, "where the main object of those who go to them is to plant and rear certain vegetable productions which abound in hot climates only, and which are of great value in European markets"—such as Ceylon, the West Indian colonies, and Mauritius.

(3) Trading colonies—such as Singapore.

(4) Naval or military stations, such as Malta or Gibraltar, which are considered colonies.

The class of penal colonies which existed at an early period no longer remains.

Colonies may be subjected to a further division, according to the means by which they were acquired:—

(1) Colonies obtained by conquest or cession, legislation for which is absolutely vested in the crown, until a representative assembly has once been granted, in which case the crown cannot legislate further, though the colony is still subject to the Imperial Parliament. The law in conquered or ceded colonies remains as it was, unless altered by the sovereign in council.

(2) Settled colonies, acquired by occupation when uninhabited. Although such colonies become the property of the crown, the crown has no power of legislation by virtue of its prerogative, but can only act by orders in council. It must be remembered that a ceded colony is not bound by Acts of Parliament passed before its cession; nor is the colony bound by Acts made after its acquisition, unless the Act is intended to embrace all British colonies, or the colony is specially named.

British colonies are officially divided into three classes:—

(1) Crown colonies are ceded or conquered colonies, where the crown has the entire control of legislation and of the officials.

(2) Colonies with representative institutions, but without responsible government, where the crown retains only a veto on legislation.

(3) Colonies having both representative institutions and responsible government. Such institutions and government were introduced first into Canada in the year 1847, owing to Lord Durham's report. "In colonies with responsible government, the control of all public departments is practically placed in the hands of persons commanding the confidence of the legislature; and the ministers are responsible to the legislature, as in England. The Home Government has in such cases no control whatever over any official except the governor, though the crown retains a veto on legislation. By the adoption of the principle of responsible government," says Sir J. Erskine May, "a colonial constitution has become the very image and reflection of Parliamentary government in England. The governor—like the sovereign, whom he represents—holds himself aloof from and superior to parties, and governs through constitutional advisers who have acquired an ascendancy in the legislature." The English constitution, in fact, is generally the type of the colonial governments, which have a governor acting as viceroy of the crown, an Upper Chamber either appointed by the governor or elected by a limited suffrage, and a Lower Chamber, corresponding to the House of Commons, and like it retaining the exclusive privilege of originating money bills. The transactions of such colonies with the Home Government are chiefly confined to foreign and commercial affairs. The former are managed by the Colonial Office; while for the latter purpose the various colonies have commissioners in London called Crown Agents or Agents-General. The colonies administer justice by their own courts of law, but an appeal lies from all colonial supreme courts, except those of Canada, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Colonies, THE AFRICAN. [SOUTH AFRICA.]

Colonies, THE AMERICAN, were for the most part founded in the seventeenth century. The North American continent was first discovered in 1497 by John Cabot, to whom a patent was granted by King Henry VII.; but the first attempts at colonisation were made by the Spaniards in 1621 and onwards, on the coast of Florida, whither the French followed them in 1662. The French also soon after 1636 began to make settlements in the North, over Canada, Cape Breton, and Nova Scotia, then called Acadia. Nova Scotia was seized by England in the War of the Spanish Succession (1701—1713), and Canada in the Seven Years' War (1757—1763). [CANADA.] The first abortive attempt at English colonisation was made in 1578 by Frobisher; then followed two by Sir Humphrey Gilbert (1579 and 1583), and two by Sir Walter Raleigh, the first of which, in what is now North Carolina, was for a little while successful. At length, in 1607, the London Company despatched an expedition which effected the first permanent settlement of the English in North America on the banks of the James River in Virginia.

The thirteen American colonies which afterwards formed the United States of America are usually divided into three groups—those of Virginia, New York, and New England.

(1) The Virginia group. Virginia, a name given by Raleigh to one of his unsuccessful attempts at colonisation in honour of Queen Elizabeth, at first had a very struggling existence. It was kept alive chiefly by the exertions of a hardy adventurer, John Smith,* who explored the country, and made friends with the Indian chief Powhatan, the theme, with his daughter Pocahontas, of some romantic stories. Fresh immigrants soon began to strengthen the colony; it grew rich by the sale of tobacco, and in 1619, the Virginian House of Burgesses assembled for the first time. The next few years witnessed some dangerous struggles with the Indians, in which the colony suffered greatly until the submission of the savages in 1646, which was confirmed by a great treaty at Albany in 1684. In 1624 James I. dissolved the London Company, and Virginia became a crown colony; but soon afterwards the valuable monopoly of the import of tobacco to England was secured to Virginia and the Somers Islands by proclamation. Its position under the Commonwealth was one of practical independence. Fortune changed, however, with the Restoration, when Charles II. restricted the commerce of the colony by Navigation Acts, while the Assembly, which was extremely Royalist, persecuted Nonconformists and limited the suffrage. Finally the whole of Virginia was handed over for thirty-one years to Lord Colepepper and Lord Arlington. From these causes sprang a rebellion, known from its leader as "Bacon's Rebellion," in 1675, which was crushed two years later by Sir George Berkeley. Lord Colepepper was made governor for life, and the position of the colonists during the remainder of the Stuart period was disastrous. After the Revolution, however, Virginia recovered her prosperity, and the separate history of the colony consists chiefly in a series of disputes between the governors and the assemblies. Maryland, named after Queen Henrietta Maria, was originally part of Virginia, but was made into a separate colony by charter in 1632, when it became the property of a Catholic, Lord Baltimore, under a most liberal constitution, equality being conceded to all Christian creeds. Its condition was one of great prosperity until Clayborne, a man of republican sympathies, opposed the authority of Lord Baltimore, and threw the colony into confusion, which lasted for ten years until 1660. Under William and Mary, the colony passed into the hands of the crown, and Roman Catholicism became illegal; but in 1716 it was restored to the descendants of its founder, now become Protestants. The Carolinas were so called in the first instance by the French settlers in honour of Charles IX. of France, and North Carolina was the scene of most of Raleigh's attempts at colonisation, being then part of Virginia. The name was given to them afresh by Charles II., in whose reign it was granted by charter to proprietaries, and a constitution known as the "Grand Model," prepared for it by Locke and Shaftesbury. It was, however, found unworkable; the colonists took matters into their own hands, divided themselves into two governments, began to import negro slaves, and to treat the Indian tribes with great brutality. Finally, in 1729 the proprietors sold their rights to the crown. Georgia, originally part of Carolina, was founded by Colonel Oglethorpe, with some government assistance, as a refuge for insolvent debtors and persecuted Dissenters whom he rescued from English prisons. Its religious ideas were strongly influenced by the advent of some Moravian settlers, and by the visits of the two Wesleys and Whitfield. In 1739 Oglethorpe invaded the Spanish colony of Florida without success, and the counter attack also failed. Slavery was introduced into the colony about 1750, and two years later it was annexed to the crown.

(2) The New York group. Of these New York and New Jersey have a common history. They were in the first instance Dutch colonies. Delaware Bay was discovered by Henry Hudson in 1609, and a settlement made at Albany in 1615. Soon New Amsterdam, at first a trading station, became a permanent town, and the island of Manhattan was bought from the Indians. After a struggle for existence with the English colonies, with the Indians, who nearly destroyed them, and with the Swedes, whose settlement, "New Sweden," was annexed in 1655, the state and city of New Amsterdam became very prosperous. In 1664, however, the country was granted by Charles II. to James, Duke of York; it surrendered to Sir Robert Holmes without a struggle: New Amsterdam became New York, and the district between the Hudson and Delaware New Jersey. For a few years the Dutch recovered it again, but it was finally ceded to England in 1674. James II. united New York and New England under the governorship of Sir E. Andrews, but at the Revolution he was driven out, and the connection dissolved. The rights of the proprietors in New Jersey were bought by the Quakers in 1682, but surrendered to the crown in 1702. Pennsylvania, a district originally occupied by the settlement of New Sweden, was also purchased from Charles II. by William Penn in 1682, when its capital, Philadelphia, was founded, and a treaty concluded with the Indian tribes. Soon afterwards a boundary dispute arose with Maryland, which terminated in the cession, in 1701, to Penn of the tract on the south of the Delaware, which was known as the Delaware Territory, and which was attached to Pennsylvania, though with a separate legislature, till 1776, when Delaware declared itself an independent State. After the English Revolution Penn's proprietary rights were confiscated.

(3) The New England group. This was so named by John Smith, who made one of the two early and unsuccessful attempts to found a settlement there. In 1620, however, some Puritan Nonconformists, known as the "Pilgrim Fathers," sailed from England in the Mayflower, and, landing in Plymouth Bay, effected a permanent occupation. Their relations with the Indians were on the whole friendly, and fresh settlements were made, viz., New Hampshire (1622), Massachusetts in 1628, Rhode Island by Roger Williams (1631), and Connecticut colonised from Massachusetts from 1633 and onwards. This last settlement involved the New Englanders in two Indian wars, which resulted in the defeat of the Pequot and Narragansett tribes. The northern colonies were subjected by Charles I. to severe restrictions, but in 1643 formed themselves into a federation known as The United Colonies of New England, which proved the germ of the present United States. Massachusetts soon proved itself the most powerful of the four colonies, and in 1676 crushed the Indians in a great war called, after the chief of the Wampanoags, "King Philip's War." New England was severely oppressed after the Restoration by Andros and other governors; Massachusetts forfeited her charter in 1684, but with the Revolution better times came. In 1690 the Massachusetts government instigated a war for the conquest of Canada, which lasted with a long interval after the Peace of Utrecht (q.v.) down to the close of "King George's War," i.e., the War of the Austrian Succession. Such was the origin of the thirteen American colonies, of which it may be said that the southern, where slave-labour was universal with the exception of Georgia, were in the main aristocratic, and the northern sectarian and democratic. Their constitutions varied considerably, but as a rule they consisted of a house of assembly elected by the burgesses, or freemen, reinforced frequently by nominees of the proprietaries, a council nominated, as a rule, by the governor, but in Massachusetts by the freemen, and a governor appointed in crown colonies by the king and proprietors, in the others by the council.

Before the commencement of the Seven Years' War in Europe, a border warfare known as the "French and Indian War" broke out in America, during which occurred the occupation of the Ohio valley by the French, who built there Fort Duquesne, and the defeat of General Braddock and George Washington when they advanced against it, 1755. War was not formally declared until 1756, when the newly-built Fort William Henry was taken by the enemy. Towards the end of the war, however, fortune changed, and the great success of Wolfe in Canada was anticipated by the capture of Fort Duquesne (subsequently re-named Pittsburg) in 1758 by General Forbes supported by Washington. After the Peace of Paris (1763), the Virginians defeated the Ottawas and their allies in the last great war, waged by the colonists against the Indians.

It is impossible here to do more than just hint at the events which from that date tended to embitter the relations between the colonies and England. There were, in the first place, the Navigation Laws (1657—1660), by which the colonies were prohibited from procuring a large number of articles except from England and, after the Treaty of Utrecht, from Spain, and laid duties on the export of articles from colony to colony. These laws were largely evaded by smuggling, and in consequence Grenville in 1764 enforced them with great severity, and by a Revenue Act laid heavy duties on various imports, including wines. The Stamp Act (1765) followed, which imposed duties ranging from $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to £10 on printed publications, but it was received with such outcry and riots all over America, that it had to be repealed in the following year, while a Declaratory Act at the same time insisted on the dependence of the colonies on the king and Parliament of Great Britain. This conciliatory policy did not continue long. In the same year the New York Assembly was suspended for refusing to supply stores to the royal troops in obedience to the Quartering Act, and Charles Townshend's fatal Revenue Act, imposing import duties on paper, glass, tea, and other articles followed in the next year. War was from that moment inevitable; the Massachusetts Assembly was dissolved in 1768 for refusing to rescind a letter of protest, and there was a collision between the citizens of Boston and the British troops, known as the "Boston Massacre," in 1770. Lord North's Tea Act (1770), which removed the restrictions except that on tea, postponed the war for awhile, but the rejection of Dunning's petition for the removal of Hutchinson from the governorship of Massachusetts by the English government was followed, in consequence of the burning of the tea ships in Boston harbour, by the Boston Port Act, the spark which set the incendiary forces of a century ablaze. Columba, St. (b. 521, d. 597), was a native of Gartan, in Donegal; he was the son of Feidhlim and Ethne, both of Irish blood royal. Educated for the Church, he founded, in 545, the monastery of Derry, and subsequently established many churches in Ireland. The victory of the heathen king, Brude MacMaclen, over the Scots of Dalriada, in 560, led, three years later, to the mission of Columba, undertaken for the purpose of converting the Picts: though another account ascribes the departure of Columba from Ireland to his action in bringing about a battle between two Irish tribes. Columba landed in Iona 563, receiving the grant of the island from Conal, King of Dalriada, or, as some think, from Brude, the Pictish monarch; here he founded his church, which became for 150 years the national Church of Scotland. The Columban church, always intimately connected with the Church of Ireland, was in some points of doctrine and ceremonial opposed to that of Rome, to which it owed no allegiance. [CHURCH, THE CELTIC.] After two years spent in the establishment of his monastery, Columba, in 565, went on a mission of conversion to the court of Brude, King of the Picts, at Inverness; having won over the monarch to the new faith, he proceeded to establish monasteries throughout the Pictish territory. In 575 he caused Aidan, King of Dalriada, to assert his position as a king, independent of the Irish Dalriads; the remaining years of his life were chiefly spent in founding churches amongst the southern Picts. Shortly before his death, which took place in June, 597, he revisited Ireland. The clouds of tradition and romance in which the facts of his life are enshrouded render it somewhat difficult to estimate his true character; he is called by his biographer Adamnan a man of contrasts, "at once tender and irritable, rude and courteous, grateful and revengeful." The verdict of Mr. Skene may be quoted:—"He was evidently a man of great force of character and determined zeal in effecting his purpose, but he could not have been the object of such tender love and implicit devotion from all who came under the sphere of his influence if the softer and more amiable features pictured in the earlier descriptions of him had not predominated." In later years, part of his relics were removed to Kells, in Meath, and part by Kenneth MacAlpine to Dunkeld.

Columbia, BRITISH, was formerly part of the Hudson's Bay Territories. It rose into importance owing to the discovery of gold there (1858-1861) and the consequent influx of settlers. It was created a crown colony in 1858. In 1866 Vancouver's Island and Queen Charlotte's Islands were incorporated with it, and in 1871 the whole district became a province of the Dominion of Canada (q.v.). The government, which, like those of the other provinces of the Dominion, is subject to the central authority at Ottawa, consists of a lieutenant-governor and a legislative assembly of twenty-four members.

Combermere, STAPLETON COTTON, 1st Viscount (b. 1772, d. 1865), took part in the last Mysore War. He served with distinction through the Peninsular War, was commander of all the allied cavalry after 1810, and decided the fortune of the day at Salamanca by a grand cavalry charge. In 1814 he was for his services created Baron Combermere. In 1817 he was made Governor of Jamaica. In 1825 he was appointed commander-in-chief in India, and accomplished the reduction of Bhurtpore at the close of the Burmese War. He was created Viscount Combermere of Bhurtpore, Feb., 1827.

Commendams. On the vacancy of a benefice, it was sometimes customary to assign it to the care of a bishop, to be held in commendam until a proper person could be found on whom to bestow it. This system was employed for the purpose of evading the law against pluralities, and was frequently abused. In 1616 occurred the famous Case of Commendams, when an action was brought against Neile, Bishop of Lichfield, for holding a living, in commendam, to which it was alleged he had been illegally presented by the king, whose general prerogative of granting a commendam was disputed. The case is famous for the subserviency of the judges, who, having made some slight effort to resent the king's attempt to obtain a verdict favourable to himself, subsequently sued for pardon on their knees. Sir Edward Coke's opposition to James's unconstitutional act entailed his dismissal shortly afterwards.

Commendation. [FEUDALISM.]

Commerce. The history of English commerce is naturally divided into two parts—the progress of navigation and the routes taken by traders. But for the sake of convenience and brevity they must be taken together in the present article.

The chief objects of mediæval maritime enterprise were the fisheries and the trade with the East. The former were principally in the hands of the Dutch and English; the latter, as far as Europe was concerned, in those of the Venetians, Genoese, and Florentines. Fish was a far more important article of diet in the Middle Ages than it is now. It was prescribed during certain times of the year or week by religion, and it supplemented as well as varied the coarse salted food of our ancestors in winter. The principal ports engaged in this trade were Yarmouth and the neighbouring towns for herrings, and Scarborough for cod. There were also extensive salmon fisheries in the Thames, the Tweed, and the Severn, barrellled salmon being an important, though comparatively expensive, article of diet. In the early part of the fifteenth century, i.e., before 1436, Bristol mariners, by the use of the mariner's compass, reached Iceland by the Irish Channel and Atlantic, and successfully competed with their Scarborough rivals. Bristol gained considerable opulence by this trade, and during this century became the second city of the kingdom for opulence and numbers. The magnificent church of St. Mary Redcliff, near Bristol, was the gift of a rich Bristol merchant in this century.

The trade of England during this period was very considerable, and was doubtless much assisted by their possessions in France. The English claimed, by virtue of the situation of the port of Calais, to have the control of the narrow seas, and, as long as they held Normandy and Guienne, with the suzerainty over Brittany, could regulate traffic along the coast from Flanders to Bayonne. Hence the efforts which the Lancastrian kings made for the maintenance of Henry V.'s conquests had a commercial as well as a military purpose. The Emperor Sigismund told Henry V. that Dover and Calais were the keys of the Channel, and should be kept as the special strength of England. The trade with the Baltic and the coasts of Scandinavia and Denmark was in the hands of the Hanse towns, which were closely connected with London, where a powerful corporation called the Alderman and Merchants of the Steel-yard, had important privileges from the thirteenth century till towards the close of the sixteenth. When the English occupation of Normandy was gone, English commerce was seriously affected by the numerous corsairs which hid in the Breton ports, and, after the loss of Guienne, this part of France was similarly affected by the decline of trade with England, and vainly strove, by the revolt of 1453, to renew its old relations with the English crown and people. The commercial relations between England and Portugal were intimate. But after the war with France was practically over, and Louis XI. left no means untried to conciliate Edward IV., the coasting trade of England became again extensive and profitable, for we learn from a remarkable treatise of the time, that the English mercantile marine had nearly all the carrying trade of the coast, while that of France was unimportant. The writer, a Frenchman, therefore recommends a stringent navigation law.

In the fourteenth century the produce of the East was conveyed to Europe by three routes at least: two by land, a third mainly by sea. The two land routes started from Bagdad, one passing through Mesopotamia to Antioch, the other through the highlands of Armenia to Trebizond. The third was to Aden, up the Red Sea, then by a short land journey to the Nile, and down the Nile to Cairo and Alexandria. This road ultimately superseded the others. Central Asia, owing to the gradual advance of the Turks, and finally the conquest of Constantinople, and the fall of the Greek empire, became impassable for commerce, and the only road which remained open was through Egypt, where heavy tolls were exacted, though not so as to entirely spoil the trade. The goods brought from the East, chiefly spices, which were eagerly purchased by all who could afford them, were carried through Italy, across the Alps, and down the waterways of the Rhine, the Upper Danube, and their affluents, enriching the towns of Lower Germany and Flanders. It is possible that some Eastern produce still found its way into Europe by the Caspian, Astrachan, and Russia, and that the early opulence of Novgorod was due to this commerce.

Meanwhile, the avenues of trade with the East were being closed up, and the Western nations began to be alarmed at the risk of being excluded from the use of products which had become necessities to many. Maritime enterprise had been stimulated by the example of the Portuguese and their successful explorations of the African coast. Simultaneously, Vasco de Gama, under the patronage of the King of Portugal, and Columbus, under that of Ferdinand and Isabella, strove to find a waterway to the East, and so escape from the flow of barbarism which had nearly destroyed commerce. At the close of the fifteenth century, Vasco de Gama achieved the Cape passage; Columbus, the discovery of the New World. The Pope granted them, in an age when no one was prepared to dispute his authority in the matter, the dominion over their discoveries, and exclusive privileges of trading thither. The result in the New World was the Spanish conquest and the establishment of Spanish monopoly. In the East, factories were established, especially on the western side of Hindostan, which, after the union of the crowns of Spain and Portugal, became also part of the vast Spanish empire. These discoveries were made only just in time. In less than twenty years after the voyages of Columbus and De Gama, Selim I. conquered Egypt, annihilated what little trade was left by this route, and ruined the prosperity of the Italian and free German cities.

The sea route was for a long time costly and unprofitable. It was protected by a monopoly—due to the papal grants. It was in the hands of a small power, which, after a brief period of extraordinary activity, showed signs of early decay. From these discoveries the English were excluded, owing, amongst other causes, to the timid avarice of Henry VII., to the respect still entertained for the Pope's authority, and when that was discarded, to the fear of the Spanish power. Hence, in the middle of the sixteenth century an attempt was made to develop trade in another quarter. In the year 1553 Sir Hugh Willoughby attempted a North-East passage, with three ships. Two were driven into a desert harbour of Lapland, and the commanders and crews frozen to death. The third reaching Archangel, its commander had an interview with Ivan the Terrible, and obtained for his employers the charter of the Russian Company. The first map of Russia was published in 1560 by an agent of this company; but for a long time the operations of the company were trivial. Similar attempts were made to open up a trade with the Levant and Morocco. These were distinct advances, though as yet without decisive results. In the reign of Henry VIII.

—as we learn from one of his statutes, regulating the price of freights, and directing what should be the goods transported to various countries—it appears that Malaga was the furthest port to which at this time the English ship-master ventured. It is plain that England had fallen far behind other nations in the extent and activity of her mercantile marine.

The resuscitation of English enterprise was due to Frobisher, Davis, and Drake, especially the latter. In 1579 Elizabeth entered into an alliance, offensive and defensive, with Holland, and thus informally declared war against Spain. Two years before this, Drake had set out on his famous voyage. His distinct purpose was the plunder of Spanish commerce, and he probably started with the queen's concurrence, certainly with her connivance. In those days it was very difficult to prevent private warfare, especially when the object of such warfare was opulent, and possessed of lucrative privileges, held under what had now become a discredited authority, and was wholly unable to defend those privileges by a blockade or a police of the seas. The practical exclusion of all ships but those of one nation from these ancient and these new markets explain, though they may not justify, the buccaneering exploits of Drake and his followers. It was the only way of breaking in upon a monopoly intelligible to the wild spirit of the time, when England declared war against Spain and Spain had added the possessions of Portugal to her own. The commerce and factories of the East became lawful prize to the English and the Dutch. The latter were early successful, and established an Indian empire in the Archipelago. But the English built up their commerce with the East very slowly; and after many reverses, Elizabeth granted charters, towards the conclusion of her reign, to the Levant and East India Companies, and made considerable sacrifices of revenue in order to foster their early efforts.

When the rupture with Spain was imminent, England began to plant colonies in North America, Raleigh being the pioneer of those settlements. But they were practically private adventures. The settlers found neither fertile localities abounding in mineral wealth nor opulent kingdoms, the plunder of which would enrich monarchs as well as soldiers of fortune, such as were Mexico and Peru. The settlers in the English plantations had to contest their occupation with vigorous, poor, and resolute savages, who had probably dispossessed and annihilated a wealthier and more civilised race. The later settlers of New England planted themselves on sterile land, and in a climate of extremes. The struggle for existence, as we know, was severe, and a long time elapsed before these settlers could acquire a few comforts. They became, indeed, the nucleus of a vast empire, the opulence and resources of which already are beyond parallel, and will be beyond rivalry at no remote date. But for a long time they were weak and profitless to England.

After many disappointments, the East India Company began to prosper. During the reign of Charles II. its profits from trade were very large, and the fortunes of many a noble and wealthy family were founded on East India stock and the sales of its imports. Like every similar institution, in the extraordinary period of stock-exchange and stock-jobbing activity, which became a frenzy from the Revolution to the collapse of the South Sea Scheme, the East India Company had its rivals for privilege and monopoly. The Parliament had taken from the crown the right of giving patents for exclusive trade, and had assumed the power itself. The crown was not unwilling to transfer the odium of such grants from itself to the Parliament, especially as the companies were perfectly willing to assist the financial embarrassments of the government by loans on favourable terms, or even by the handsel of large sums down in return for concessions. Nor is there any doubt that much of the corruption of Parliament was due to votes bought by those who were eager to obtain the lucrative monopoly of a Parliamentary title. The habit of gambling in companies' shares was greatly furthered by the almost unlicensed practice of offering lotteries on every conceivable subject.

The theory of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was that the development of commerce was of supreme importance to the community, and that commerce was best secured by monopoly. But monopoly in the existing condition of commercial Europe was to be secured only by war—an improvement, indeed, on the old system of buccaneering, but for a long time accompanied by it. James was too timid to make war on any pretext. Charles could not rely on his subjects, even if he had possessed the means whereby to carry on a warlike policy. But Cromwell consulted the impulses of his age and race when he declared war against Spain. He demanded trade with the Spanish colonies, and religious freedom for English settlers in such colonies. His demands were refused, and he seized Jamaica (intending to seize Cuba), in the Antilles, and Dunkirk, on the Flemish coast. He intended to control the narrow seas, and to found an empire in the West. He defeated the Dutch, humbled them and broke their prestige, and designed to ruin their trade by his Navigation Act. But had Cromwell lived to the natural span of human life, instead of dying in his fifty-ninth year, he could assuredly have founded an English empire in the Gulf states, and have expelled the Spaniards, nearly two centuries before Canning's famous boast was uttered, that he had called the New World into being in order to redress the balance of the Old.

The commerce of England grew rapidly during the first half of the eighteenth century. Wild speculation was checked by the losses of the South Sea scheme, capital was accumulated, agriculture prospered, and the pacific policy of Walpole and Fleury aided progress. The Seven Years' War, avowedly carried on by England in order to secure commerce by conquest, had, and continues to have, lasting effects on mankind. It gave India and North America to the English race and to English civilisation. But it also brought with it the refutation of the old commercial doctrine that war makes trade and conquest secures trade. England sought to impose part of the charges of the war on the American colonies, and the War of Independence followed. The East India Company found that they could not live and pay dividends on trade, though they clung to their monopoly, and therefore they began to pay dividends out of the tribute of conquered races.

It was supposed that after the loss of the American colonies English commerce had sustained a fatal blow. The leading Americans of the Revolution thought so. The great majority of public men in England held the same opinion. But in a short time it was found that the United States were better customers than the Plantations were. The fact is, commerce, unless it be violently prevented from seeking its own career, has no preference beyond what is suggested by cheapness and convenience. Besides, the latter part of the eighteenth century was an age of practical invention. Watt made the steam-engine a power. The invention of Arkwright increased the handiness of man ten or twentyfold. There is a story that this man offered, if his patents were continued to him, to defray a moiety of the extraordinary charges of government in England. The story is perhaps an exaggeration, but it has a basis of truth. It implies that the consuming power of mankind was enormously increased by invention, and that this consumption was supplied by the machinery of trade and commerce; for it is manifest that Arkwright looked for his customers beyond the wants of his own countrymen. But even more important than invention was the great boon of commercial freedom granted in 1846. The advocates of Free Trade may regret that their views are not accepted by all civilised nations. But they know that the members of every community wish to sell, and, though the laws may limit their choice in buying, that they must buy in order to sell. The effects of that commercial freedom which we have adopted are that we always buy in the cheapest market, not only by choice, but perforce, as those who restrain themselves have to give more and take less, and that the mercantile marine of this country is of unexampled magnitude.

Commissaries. THE COURT OF, for Scotland, was an ecclesiastical court created in 1563, "to fill up the gap caused in the administration of civil justice" by the abolition of the Consistorial Court. It was a court for the settlement of divorce cases, sentences of excommunication, and other ecclesiastical matters.

Commissions are instruments issuing from the crown, and delegating authority to particular persons to perform certain acts. Thus, in military matters a commission is, properly speaking, the document issued to every military officer, and authorising him to perform duties on behalf of the state. Commissions of array were royal warrants authorising barons and others to raise men for the purpose of exercising and training them in war. [MILITARY SYSTEM.] Among the permanent bodies of commissioners, who perform regularly duties delegated by the crown, are the Commissioners in Lunacy, who are required to supervise the care of lunatics, and the Justices on the Commission of the Peace. [JUSTICES.] Royal Commissions are frequently issued to small bodies of persons—members of either House of Parliament, and others—empowering them to inquire into the operation of laws, into alleged grievances, or social, economic, or educational matters; generally with a view to future legislation. They are empowered to collect evidence, and to examine witnesses, though not on oath; and their proceedings are recorded and usually published in the form of a report.

Commissioners. ROYAL, are appointed by the crown, on the address of the Houses of Parliament, to the effect that the judge who has tried any election petition has reported the prevalence of corrupt practices. They inquire into the matter; and on their report the action of Parliament in the way of disfranchisement or prosecution is based. Royal Commissions were established in 1853.

Committee. [PARLIAMENT.]

Common Lands are unenclosed and uncultivated spaces, not held in individual ownership, where the neighbouring land-owners and tenants enjoy certain rights of pasturage, of turbary, or cutting turf for fuel, and sometimes of estovers, or the liberty of taking wood for the furniture or use of a house. These rights are, in all probability, of very ancient origin, and are probably a survival of the old Germanic system of common pasturage on the folkland, or public land. As, however, from the time of Alfred the folkland became, for the most part, royal demesne, and large estates were formed, the idea of individual ownership tended to supplant that of common ownership. This change was completed by the feudal lawyers, who held commons to be the wastes of manors, and minutely defined the rights of common pasturage. It was either appendant, as belonging to the occupiers of arable land, or appurtenant—i.e., founded on a special grant—or because of vicinage, or in gross. The common lands being regarded as the property of the lord of the manor, he claimed the right of enclosure. This was resisted by the freehold tenants, and the Statute of Merton (1235) allowed the owner to enclose or approve against common of pasture, but only provided that he could show that there was left common sufficient for such as were entitled thereto. When the customary right of copyholders became recognised—i.e., about the time of Henry IV.—they also claimed rights of pasturage, and resisted enclosures. The inhabitants of villages, however, had not this privilege, and as late as 1603 the claim of the people of Stixwold, in Lincolnshire, to exercise rights of pasturage in the waste of the manor was overthrown by the courts of law. Under the Tudors the practice of enclosures, together with the still more oppressive plan of converting arable land into pasture-land, became a crying evil. Bacon commented upon it in the History of Henry VII.; it was one of the causes of the formidable insurrection in the eastern counties in 1549; and Bishop Latimer, in his famous Sermon of the Plough, preached before the court of Edward VI., denounced the nobles as “enclosers, graziers, and rent-raisers.” One or two attempts were made to check these practices. Henry VIII. ordered the houses which had been pulled down to be rebuilt, and limited the number of sheep on each farm to 2,000; and the Protector Somerset appointed a Royal Commission “for the redress of enclosure.” Such efforts, however, were of no avail, and complaints were frequent throughout the reigns of Elizabeth and of the Stuarts.

Gradually the Statute of Merton came to be regarded as obsolete, and it was thought necessary to obtain the sanction of Parliament for enclosure. The first Local Enclosure Act was passed under Anne, and since then the permission of the legislature has generally been regarded as a necessary preliminary to enclosure. Between 1700 and 1845 some 4,000 of these Acts were passed, and 7,175,000 acres of land enclosed, whereby the class of small yeomen became almost extinct. The legislation on the subject, which was consolidated in 1801, provided that the consent of three-fourths of the freeholders and copyholders of the manor was necessary, that the common should be divided among them in proportion to their holdings, the lord being awarded one-sixteenth. He had also the power of vetoing enclosures. The General Enclosure Act of 1845 established a new principle, that of local inquiry through Enclosure Commissioners, so that the poor could make known their grievances, and also set apart certain portions of land for recreation and garden allotments. Passed, however, before the nation had adopted the doctrine of Free Trade, it tended to promote rather than check enclosure; the land set apart for recreation was miserably inadequate, and the great commons and forests were threatened everywhere. Accordingly a Society for the Protection of Rural Commons was formed by Mr. Fawcett, M.P., and one for the Preservation of Commons near London by Mr. G. Shaw Lefevre, M.P. The exertions of the former were successful in preventing the Parliamentary sanction of enclosures between 1869 and 1876, and the necessity of such a step was proved by the fact that the area of common land in England and Wales was not, as was imagined, 8,000,000 acres, but only 2,632,000. The question of urban commons was not decided until after a violent struggle in the law courts, owing to the fact that while the right of a village to its green was recognised by law, that of a town to its common was not. The crucial case was that of Epping Forest, over which the crown has several important forestal rights, which had, until about 1840, prevented enclosure. When the neighbouring landlords began to appropriate the land, an old man named Willingale resisted them on behalf of the villagers of Loughton, and his cause, taken up by the Corporation of London, resulted, in 1874, in a complete overthrow of the landlord's pretensions. Soon afterwards a Royal Commission decided that the enclosures were illegal, and that the forest should be restored to its original condition. In 1878, therefore, an Act was passed, directing that Epping Forest should be preserved for ever, open and unenclosed, for the benefit of the people of London. The Corporation of London were made its conservators—and subsequently of all common lands within twenty-five miles of London. Finally, the Commons Act of 1876 substituted regulation and improvement in place of the enclosure of common lands, and laid down the principle that no enclosure should be sanctioned by the commissioners without distinct evidence that it would be beneficial to the inhabitants generally. In Ireland and Scotland the question of common lands is not so important, owing to the fact that the comparative barrenness of the soil offers less temptation to enclosures. The first Whiteboy rising in Ireland, however, in 1692, was in great part due to this cause.

Common Law may be defined as that part of the law of the land which, before the Judicature Act of 1873, was administered by those courts which were called courts of common law, in distinction to the courts of equity. It was founded on the old popular law of the nation, and has grown by the process of legislation and by the assimilation in whole or in part of other systems; just in the same way as the judicial system of the royal courts introduced after the Conquest, became part of our common law. It consists of written laws or statutes, and of unwritten laws, or customs; though the term "common law" was generally used in a more restricted sense to describe the system of customary law grounded on the recorded decisions of successive judges, as opposed to the "written" or statute law. Such decisions of judges which are preserved in year-books, reports and digests of cases, as well as certain famous law books such as the Institutes of Sir E. Coke, are of high authority in our courts. The application and interpretation of the statute law is entrusted to the judges. By the way in which they carry out this work the law is modified. They are, however, not free to interpret statutes as they choose, but must observe certain rules in their dealings with them; as, for instance, that all Acts of Parliament, except in cases where the effects would be manifestly absurd or unjust, and so contrary to the clear intention of Parliament, are to be interpreted according to the plain meaning of the words. For judges are not set to speculate on, but to carry out, the intentions of Parliament. In order to ascertain the meaning of a statute, the preamble, though not in itself law, may be consulted as an authority. As regards the administration of statutes, it is to be observed that no statute is of retrospective force unless the same is expressly declared; that repealed statutes are not to be taken into account except as having had force before their repeal; that general terms used after particular cases apply only to cases which are strictly ejusdem generis; and that all penal statutes and such statutes as relate to taxation are to be construed strictly. The statute law begins with 9 Hen. III., the Great Charter. Customary law has the same force as statute law as to the assent of the people. For lex non scripta "consists of those rules and maxims concerning persons and property which have obtained by the tacit consent and usage of the inhabitants of the country." Customs are either general or particular. General customs bind all men equally who are under the same conditions, though they may not have been the subjects of enactment. For a general usage, if ascertained and established, becomes part of the common law and is recognised by the courts. Particular customs are exceptional in their application. For a custom to be good it must have arisen before legal memory, which has been fixed at the first year of Richard I. This doctrine has, however, been regulated by statute (2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 71, 1 and 2). A custom must, moreover, be continuous as regards right; it must be peaceably enjoyed; not unreasonable; it must be certain, or at least such as can be ascertained; and it must be consistent or compulsory in its application. A particular custom which is contrary to general rights must be construed strictly. The customary law is declared by the judges, and their decisions collectively exhibit the common law both as regards the application of statutes and the declaration of customs.

Common Order. THE BOOK OF, was the service book of the Scottish Reformers, and was compiled, 1567, by Knox from a manual issued by Calvin. It long continued to be used by the Presbyterians, both in Scotland and England.

Commons. THE HOUSE OF, is the Lower Chamber or representative branch of the English Parliament, appointed by popular election. The peculiar feature in the constitutional position of the Commons, when they secured their place as one of the estates of Parliament, is that they had little more than a formal share in legislation; in control of the administration, only the power of petition; and no share at all in the function of justice; while almost from the first they take the chief part in the grants of taxation. This theoretic position is traceable even at the present time, when the Commons alone settle taxation, whereas their share of legislative and administrative power won by the conversion of the petition into a "bill," is only concurrent with that of the House of Lords, and the Lords retain exclusively the powers of justice. These peculiarities are due to the historical conditions of the development of the House of Commons. Another peculiarity, which only these historical conditions can explain, is the meaning which came to be attached to the word "Commons," including freeholders and burgesses at once, and which thus differentiated essentially the English Parliamentary system, both in its construction and in the course it has run, from the representative systems of other countries. Lastly, the history of the third estate brings out the original character of the members of the House of Commons as being mere delegates, and the gradual replacement of this by the higher character of senators, so that each member is not the deputy of a locality but a representative of the whole.

munauts) is found in the thirteenth century often in the simple sense of the whole body of the nation. But under the influence of the French use of the word for an organised body such as the town corporations, it comes to be also used for smaller organised representative bodies, such as the county courts or the corporate body controlling the boroughs, or again, the body of tenants-in-chief. The barons at Oxford in 1258 speak of the twelve appointed per le commun, i.e., by the baronial tenants-in-chief, to consult pour le commun de la terre, i.e., for the whole nation. Indeed the whole constitutional struggle between classes in this century may be put in the formula of a struggle as to the practical interpretation of the word communitas. And for some time it seemed that the English Constitution would be cast in a mould like the French, constituted of clergy, chief tenants, boroughs; or at least that it would resemble that of Aragon (clergy, magnates, knights, towns); for each of these bodies had in England at one time an identity of its own. What, then, defeated this tendency? What common ground brought the burgesses and freeholders' class together in England alone of all countries? The answer is, the shire-moot, or county court. Here the two classes had been long used to meet and work together under royal orders, the communitas scire had contained not only freeholders from hundred and township, but also the representative burgesses from each borough, entrusting the duties laid on the shire to three or four of the more discreet knights; and after the dangerous precedent had been set aside of Simon de Montfort's dealing with the boroughs apart from their shires, from 1283 the writ for knights and burgesses alike was executed in the shire-moot. The shire had brought over the knights from the baronial body to the freeholders, and had now associated the knights with the burgesses. The only thing which threatened to keep them still separated in Parliament was the system of taxation, and when the old feudal taxation by aids, scutages, and carucages [AID] had yielded to the national taxation by subsidies and customs, it became natural for the knights and burgesses, as the representative and taxing body, to part off from the barons, and to sit together in one House of Commons, i.e., about the beginning of Edward III.'s reign.

The English Parliament, then, in the fourteenth century, consisted of two "estates," the clergy and the lords, and a third body, which had more the character of a representation of localities. It had seemed not impossible under Edward I. that two other estates might be added—the lawyers and the merchants. The former would have been fatal to the Commons' acquisition of administrative supervision; the latter, fatal to their monopoly of taxation, and so to their one weapon against the crown. However, not only was this not realised, but the actually existing estate of clergy entered on the suicidal policy of escaping their position between "the hammer and the anvil"—Pope and king—by taking up a position of jealous constitutional isolation, and persisted in dropping out of the Parliamentary system. The Commons were left alone, the sole body representative of the nation, and the sole body too which could be fairly deemed able to impose a national tax. For while the making of laws and the administering of supreme justice had been the business of the king and his great council, it had been always necessary to obtain the active concurrence of the shire-moot to raise a tax. Thus the terms in which the representatives are called to Edward I.'s Parliaments are merely "to hear;" under Edward II., "to hear and consent to," as against the Lords "to treat of" the matters. But the separation of the Houses increased the powers of the representative House, as did also the appeals to them made by the contending parties of the court and the opposition baronage in 1322, 1327, 1386, 1387, 1399. Also through the reign of Edward III. the Commons felt, as their song said, that they were the "shippe's mast, That with their chattel and their good, Maintained the war from first to last." And moreover, the knights of the shire were now taking up that attitude of bold, yet wary and unsleeping opposition which justifies Hallam in saying that they "bore the brunt of the battle for constitutional liberty." Thus it was almost wholly their energy which, in the battle over taxation, secured to Parliament in 1340 the sole right to direct taxation, and in 1362 to the increase of the customs; while, under Richard II., the indirect control by appropriation and audit, and the rule settled in 1401, that grants be made the last day of the session, permanently secured the principle that redress precedes supply, as the downfall of Richard II. decided against the claim of the crown to an ordaining power tantamount to the law-making power of Parliament. "The year 1341 distinctly marks the acquisition by the third estate of its full share of Parliamentary power, the Commons asserting, and the Lords allowing them, an equal share in the common demand of right and control" (Stubbs).

In legislation it had already in 1327 become the rule to say "at the petition of the Commons," instead of "by their assent." And this was made a reality, the real initiative was given to them, when in 1439 the petition was transformed into a "bill, containing in itself the form of an act," a usage which became regular under the Tudors. To the control of administration the Commons had made their first step by their great petition against grievances in 1309, and this attitude they maintained by indefatigable petitioning through the century, e.g., in 1376 especially; while their being called on to ratify the depositions of Edward II. and Richard II. strengthened their claim immensely, as did the period of regency after Edward III., and above all the fact that, up to 1437, the Lancastrian dynasty's Parliamentary title obliged the kings to subject their Council to instructions from Parliament, and to constitute it of such members as would be agreeable to the Commons. Even Edward IV. evaded rather than defied their interference. The Tudors had the confidence of their subjects, but they packed the House with creatures of the court, and by the introduction of more than eighty new boroughs; yet, in the last resort, even the Tudors knew how to yield when the temper of the House had been dangerously stirred by anxiety as to the succession, by an ecclesiastical measure for which they were not prepared, or by some great defect in the ordinary administration, such as the abuse of monopolies in Elizabeth's reign. In the seventeenth century a common spirit animated the whole House. It was far better attended, the grant of freedom of speech became more of a reality than the warning with which it was conjoined against abuse of the grant. The old weapon of impeachment, which had proved so formidable to unpopular royal ministers in 1377, and in 1386, and in 1449, had lain unused since then, but was brought forth once more against Mompesson and Bacon in 1621, and against the Earl of Middlesex in 1624, and, as used against Strafford in 1640, gave the death-blow to ministerial reliance on crown support. No part of the Commons' work is now more thoroughly carried out than this supervision of all public departments by the machinery of motions for a resolution, motions before supply, and questions to ministers. Similarly the House, by its representative character and its hold of the purse, has long had practically the final voice in deliberation on such matters as foreign policy, and the determination of war and peace. In the fourteenth century the Commons had mostly avoided direct interference in such questions, but the failure of the French wars had roused them to more straightforward interposition, and this jealousy was afterwards revived by distrust of the action of the court. In taxation the fourteenth century had seen the sole right to impose taxes won for Parliament by the Commons, the fifteenth sees the Commons secure the fruits of this victory solely for themselves, for in 1407 it was allowed that a tax could originate only with the Commons; the Lords and the clergy in Convocation have nothing to do but practically to follow with corresponding grants. This claim they did not relax under the Tudors, though it was evaded by benevolences, and it was this which brought them first into collision with the Stuart theory of prerogative, which took nowhere a more offensive form than in the ship-money and customs duties by which it aimed at superseding the representative control of taxation. The Petition of Right (1628) and the Bill of Rights (1689) embodied this as a cardinal principle of the constitution, and it was completed by the doctrine first heard in 1671 and 1680, and finally vindicated in 1861 by their resolute action in rejecting the Lords' amendments to the Bill for Repealing the Paper Duties, that no amendment can be made in a money bill of the Commons, nor can the Lords even indirectly impose any charge. And this the language of the Acts of Parliament and of the Queen's Speech formally recognises. It is this principle as much as the necessity to renew the Mutiny Act, that gives the Commons control over the numbers of the standing army. But with all their sole control, and the annual Appropriation Act, and Budget, and elaborate machinery for audit and for criticism of each item, it may be doubted whether the growth of public expenditure is not beyond the power of the House, as at present constituted, to restrain. The Grand Committees recently (1882) established may lead to some more feasible means towards this.

In the course of their long advance to supreme power in the state, the Commons have sometimes made errors; thus they were defeated in their attempts to tax the clergy (1449) and to claim a share of the Lords' judicial powers (1400, and Floyd's Case, 1621), and they have abandoned the practice of forcing bills through the Lords by tacking them to a money bill; but most of all have they misjudged their dignity in the interpretation they have sometimes given to Privilege of the House. As to the elections in the shires, Acts had been passed in 1406 and 1430 to check the interference respectively of the sheriff and of others than freeholders; but the cognisance of disputed elections lay with king and Council until the Commons took notice of such cases in 1553 and 1586, and in 1604 entered on an indecisive conflict with the Chancery, since which date, however, or indisputably since the Aylesbury Case (q.v.) in 1704, the House has been judge of its own elections, a function it deputed to a committee from 1790, and from 1868 more honourably delegated to the judges, with marked results on the purification of the public tone in relation to bribery, as can be seen in the stringent clauses of the Bill of 1883. [BUTREY.] As to privilege of members of the House of Commons from arrest, the first important case to be noticed is that when the Speaker, Thorpe, was imprisoned on an action of trespass brought by the Duke of York in 1453. But Henry VIII., in Ferrers' Case (1543) supported their claim, and James I. had to allow it in his first Parliament (Shirley's Case), and it has been allowed consistently ever since, with the exception that it has ceased to be extended to members' servants. The House has always exercised jurisdiction over its own members by committal or expulsion, though the former expires at a prorogation, and is so far inferior to the internal jurisdiction of the Lords. The important privilege of freedom of speech was not acquired till the Lancastrian reigns, and was little respected by the Tudor kings, but under the Stuarts the release of Sir John Eliot and others (1629), and the failure of the attempt upon the Five Members (1642), led to the recognition of the principle by the King's Bench and its final enunciation in the Bill of Rights (1689). It still was found necessary, after the undignified dispute with Stockdale (1837-40), to pass an Act protecting printers of Parliamentary papers from liability to actions for libel. On the other hand, in appealing to privilege to prevent the publication of debates, the Commons had put Wilkes into the position of a representative of a just and irresistible popular demand (1771) and they have more prudently given up this pretension, as well as the inconvenient custom of excluding strangers at a single member's request.

The constitution and structure of the House of Commons has also a history of its own. In 1295, 37 counties and 116 boroughs were represented; the Tudor period saw the addition of two English counties with two members, and 12 Welsh counties with one member each, and more than 80 boroughs. It was not until Charles II.'s reign that the Palatinate of Durham first sent members to the House of Commons. The number of boroughs increased up to 1832, and in the interval 45 members had been added for Scotland, 100 for Ireland, and five for the Universities. After many proposals for reform extending to the middle of the eighteenth century, the Reform Bills of 1832 and 1868 transferred members from many boroughs to the counties, and increased the representation of Scotland and Ireland; the total now being 658. [REFORM.] In 1430 the franchise was declared to belong only to 40s. freeholders; in 1707 a property qualification for members was required; but the former was enlarged by the Bill of 1832, the latter abolished in 1858. [FRANCHISE.] The original theory of the representative system under which a member was a delegate from a particular place had always tended to be tacitly dropped in favour of the wider senatorial theory that each member represents the whole Commons; and occasional endeavours in the fifteenth century to require from candidates residence as a qualification were fortunately never acted on. A greater necessity was to strengthen the independence of the House and make its representative character a reality by excluding lawyers (1372, 1404), maintainers (1350, &c.), and sheriffs (1372 and afterwards); but the "undertakers" of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and the placemen of the eighteenth century, were not satisfactorily excluded till the rule established in 1707 disqualifying pension holders, and even obliging members appointed to office to seek re-election.

But the essential defect in the Commons as a representative House up to 1832 lay elsewhere. The representative system which when first constituted in the thirteenth century was an honest reflex of the social state, failed to expand to meet the expansion of society; the villeins who were unfit for representation in 1296 had acquired practical independence before 1381; the boroughs which were worthy of representation at 1296 fell into decay as the centre of gravity of the population shifted from the south of England to the north. Thus the Commons of the sixteenth century had ceased to be a just representation of contemporary wealth and intelligence; yet reform was delayed till it was almost enforced by revolution, a pregnant lesson which statesmanship will do well to learn of history. Commonwealth, THE, a term formerly employed to signify the general weal, and the nation with its inhabitants, was specially adopted to designate the government which intervened between the death of Charles I. in Jan., 1649, and the establishment of Cromwell's Protectorate in Dec., 1653. After the forcible ejection of certain of its members by Colonel Pride, Dec. 6, 1648, the House of Commons consisted of eighty members. On Feb. 6, 1649, seven days after the execution of Charles, this mutilated House resolved that the House of Peers ought to be abolished, and on the next day adopted a similar resolution with regard to the office of a king. These resolutions were afterwards enfolded in Acts of Parliament, and a further Act passed enacting that the people of England and of all the dominions thereto belonging should be governed as a Commonwealth and free State (May 19, 1649); the executive was vested in a Council of State of forty-one members, re-elected by the Parliament yearly. With the exception of three or four members, this Council always consisted of members of Parliament. The average attendance of the House was about fifty, and as the most active members of the Council were also the most active members of Parliament, it was the Council which was mainly responsible for the policy of the government. There was no individual responsibility; all work being done by committees formed of members of the Council, and of the Parliament, and of both bodies united.

The Republic rested entirely for its maintenance on the army. Yet amongst the mass of officers and soldiers no desire was felt for the continued existence of the present Parliament. Before the execution of Charles a project drawn up by Ireton had been presented to Parliament, demanding its speedy dissolution, and proposing the election of triennial Parliaments, a reform of the electoral system, and a redistribution of seats. The Parliament was, however, unwilling to decree its own dissolution, and the dangers with which the new government was surrounded justified its refusal to take the question into consideration. It had to face the hostility of the Presbyterian section of the Puritan party, as well as of old Royalists and Irish Catholics. Both in Ireland and Scotland the Prince of Wales was proclaimed king of the three countries. Prince Rupert ruled the Channel at the head of some revolted ships. Foreign princes refused to recognise the Republic. Dangerous mutinies broke out amongst the Fifth-Monarchists and Levellers in the army. These, however, were quickly suppressed, by the energy and decision of Cromwell and Fairfax in dealing with the mutineers. An Act was passed to restrain the press (Sept. 20, 1649). An engagement to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth, as established without king or House of Lords, was required as a necessary preliminary to holding any office in Church or State (Oct. 12), and by a subsequent Act was rendered universal (Jan. 2, 1650). In Ireland Cromwell in nine months brought the greater part of the country again into subjection to England. The following year his great victories gained over the Scots at Dunbar (Sept. 3, 1650) and Worcester (Sept. 3, 1651) destroyed for the time all hope of a Presbyterian or Royalist reaction, and reduced Scotland to the condition of a subject province. A bill was introduced into Parliament for the union of the two countries. An Act was passed for the settlement of Ireland, which excepted from pardon all persons who had taken part in the massacre of 1643, and confiscated a large amount of land belonging to Irish Catholics (Aug. 12, 1652). A further bill was brought in for the planting of Protestant families on the land thus confiscated.

In March, 1649, the Council of State appointed Milton its secretary for foreign tongues. After the victory of Worcester, foreign princes, who before refused to recognise the Republic, sought its friendship. During the two years in which Cromwell was reducing Ireland and Scotland, the Republicans in London had raised a formidable navy—Prince Rupert, driven by Admiral Blake from the mouth of the Tagus when he sought refuge, saw his fleet dispersed and destroyed on the Mediterranean (1649). Commercial jealousy led to the passing of the Navigation Act (Oct. 9, 1651), intended to transfer the carrying trade of the Dutch to Englishmen, and in the ensuing summer to the opening of hostilities with the United Provinces. In an engagement off Dover the English under Blake were worsted by the Dutch under Van Tromp. In Feb., 1653, the hostile fleets again engaged off Portland Isle, when the Dutch were defeated and driven for refuge into the Texel.

After the restoration of internal peace the question of the dissolution of the Parliament again rose into prominence. Various Acts had been passed by which the House sought to express its regard for religion and morality, but the chief reform demanded remained unexecuted, nor did it seem probable that the government, as at present constituted, would ever have the energy requisite for the attainment of practical results in the directions required. The reform of the law, a definite settlement with regard to the Church and the appointment of ministers, the termination of the system of sequestering the estates of former delinquents, and of governing by means of committees, appeared no nearer attainment than at the time of the institution of the Republic. The impracticability of compromise between the so-called Republicans, Vane, Ludlow, and others, who sought to maintain the existing form of government, and those who were indifferent to the form the government should assume, so long as the predominance of the Puritan party was assured, led to the sudden and forcible ejection of the members from their seats by Cromwell (April 19, 1653).

From this time, Cromwell was practically at the head of the government, which was for the time carried on by a council of thirteen, including himself and eight other officers. In July, in answer to his summons, there met an assembly of 139 persons, known as the Little Parliament, or as Barebones' Parliament, from the name of one of its members, a leather-seller—Barbon, a London Baptist. It was representative of the reforming party, and was divided nearly equally between a more radical but small majority, and a large, less radical, minority. It passed Acts for the relief of debtors, for the registration of births, marriages, and deaths, and the institution of civil marriages. It also brought in bills affecting the Poor Laws and the administration of justice. It voted the abolition of the Court of Chancery. It further voted that the choice of ministers should be vested in their parishioners, and rejected by a majority of two the report of a committee in favour of the continuance of tithes. These votes on the Church question represented the triumphs of those who desired to effect the severance of Church and State. The minority, opposed to a voluntary system, took opportunity in the name of the Parliament of resigning their authority to Cromwell. The officers of the army determined to restore the executive into the hands of a single person, and, on Dec. 16, Cromwell was installed head of the government with the title of Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

Compounders, THE, were a section of the Jacobite party who wished for a restoration of the Stuarts, "but for a restoration accompanied by a general amnesty, and by guarantees for the security of the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of the realm." They obtained their name about 1692. The Compounders formed the main strength of the Jacobite party in England; but the more violent party or Non-Compounders were all-powerful at St. Germain's. Their leader at St. Germain's was the Earl of Middleton, who resigned in 1693. They were much offended by James's Declaration in 1692, and shortly afterwards recommended that James should resign in favour of his son, on his refusal to accept these conditions, part of which was the observance of the Test Oath. The remainder of their history is merged in that of the party. [JACOBITES.]

Comprehension Bill, THE (1689), was a scheme for the relief of Protestant Dissenters proposed by the Earl of Nottingham. A measure of similar tendency had been advocated on the occasion of the enactment of the Test Act, but had been allowed to drop. Another proposal of similar tendency, a bill to relieve Protestant Dissenters from the penalties of the 35th of Elizabeth, suffered a similar fate in 1680. Nottingham's Bill provided that all ministers of the Established Church, and members of both Universities, should be freed from the necessity of subscribing the Thirty-nine Articles, on signing a declaration that they approved, and would support, "the doctrine, worship, and government of the Church of England;" scrupled ceremonies, such as the wearing of a surplice, the sign of the cross in baptism, the admission of godfathers and godmothers to christening, and the reception of the Eucharist in a kneeling position, were left at discretion; a Presbyterian minister might acquire all the privileges of a clergyman of the Church of England on submitting to the imposition of the hands of a bishop. This bill was mutilated in the Upper House, and a petition substituted that the king would call the houses of Convocation "to be advised with in ecclesiastical matters." The Nonconformist clergy, themselves accustomed to independence, and disliking formal subscriptions of faith and compulsory uniformity, were not anxious for the passing of the measure; and so the scheme of comprehension was allowed to fall absolutely and finally to the ground."

Compton, HENRY (b. 1632, d. 1713), was a younger son of the Earl of Northampton. After studying at Oxford he entered the army, but soon after relinquished the military for the clerical profession. In 1669 he was made a canon of Christ Church; in 1674, Bishop of Oxford; and in 1675 was translated to London. He incurred the displeasure of James II. by disregarding the royal order prohibiting controversial sermons, and was suspended from his episcopal functions. He joined Danby and others in inviting William of Orange to England, and took a leading part in the Revolution. He assisted in the coronation of William and Mary, but, being disappointed in his hopes of obtaining the archbishopric of Canterbury, from that time took little further part in public affairs.

Compurgation was a mode of defence allowed by Anglo-Saxon law. When a man was accused of any crime, he might, if he chose, purge himself by the oaths of twelve men, if he could find that number to swear to his innocence. After the Conquest, compurgation gradually fell into disuse, though it was specially retained as an alternative to ordeal of battle in certain chartered towns. The compurgators were not a jury, but a body of sworn witnesses to character. Compurgation was a custom common to all, or nearly all, the Teutonic tribes, and the number of compurgators required in early times varied according to the heinousness of the offence, the rank of the accused and the accuser, and in some cases reached one hundred; in England it was usually twelve.

Comyn, JOHN, LORD OF BADENOCH, married Marjory, daughter of Alan of Galloway. He was a man of vast wealth and influence, and, on the competition for the Scotch throne in 1291, put in a claim as a descendant of Donald Bane. He had been named a regent of the Maid of Norway, and, in 1289, was one of the Scotch commissioners sent to Salisbury to confer about the marriage of the young queen to Prince Edward of England.

Comyn, JOHN, called "the Red" (d. 1306), was the son of John Comyn, of Badenoch, and Marjory, sister of John Baliol. In 1298, after the battle of Falkirk (q.v.), he was chosen one of the three guardians of Scotland, and in 1302 defeated the English troops at Roslin, while in the following year he made an unsuccessful attempt to relieve Stirling. In Feb., 1304, he laid down his arms and submitted to Edward I., whom he is said to have counselled to put Bruce to death. Bruce met Comyn in the convent of the Minorites, at Dumfries, charged him with his treachery, and stabbed him, Feb. 10, 1306. Bruce and Comyn were at this time the two rival claimants for Scotland—Comyn as the grandson of Devoiguilla, having the same claim which John Balliol had successfully established in 1292.

Conadh Cerr (d. 629) was the son of Eocha, who resigned the kingdom of Dalriada in his favour, 627. In this year Conadh fought at the battle of Ardcorran in Ireland on the side of the Irish Dalriads; and two years later was defeated at another battle in Ireland, fighting against the Cruithne and his own father, who was now apparently king of the Galloway Picts.

Confirmatio Cartarum (1297) was the name given to an important document in which Edward I., under pressure from the barons and clergy, confirmed and extended the constitutional rights established in the two preceding reigns. It was obvious that the Great Charter, in the mutilated condition in which it had been left in 1226, was not sufficient guarantee against arbitrary taxation on the part of the king. The barons accordingly drew up a series of new articles to be added to the Great Charter, and these the king was obliged to concede. The articles were seven in number:—(1) The Charters are confirmed, and are to be kept in every point without breach. (2) Any judgment given henceforth contrary to the points of the Charters aforesaid by the justices, or by any other royal ministers, to be undone, and holden for nought. (3) Copies of the Charters are to be sent to the cathedral churches of the realm, and read twice a year to the people. (4) The bishops are to excommunicate all who break the Charters. (5) The exactions by which the people have in former times been aggrieved not to be a precedent for the future. (6) For no business henceforth will the crown take such manner of aids, tasks, or prizes but by the common assent of the realm, and for the common profit thereof, saving the ancient aids and prizes due and accustomed. (7) Forasmuch as the commonalty of the realm have been sore grieved with the maltote of wools, we, at their requests, have clearly released it, and have granted for us and our heirs that we will not take such thing nor any other without their common assent and good-will, saving to us and to our heirs the custom of wools, skins, and leather granted before by the commonalty aforesaid. The confirmation of the Charters may be held to complete the work begun at Runnymede. "It established," says Bishop Stubbs, "the principle that for all taxation, direct and indirect, the consent of the nation must be asked, and made it clear that all transgressions of that principle, whether within the letter of the law or beyond it, were evasions of the spirit of the constitution."

Stubbs, Const. Hist.; Select Charters, 487, seq.

Congé d'Elire—"leave to elect"—is a Norman-French phrase, signifying the sovereign's permission for the dean and chapter of a vacant see to proceed to the election of a bishop. In pre-Norman times, the bishops were, as a rule, appointed by the king in the witenagemot, though there occasionally occur instances of an election more or less free—as in the case of Helmstan, Bishop of Winchester (839). After the Norman Conquest, the election became by degrees canonical, though even then the election was held in the king's chapel, and so much under his influence as to be little more than nominally free; and the dispute about investiture between Henry I. and Anselm ended in a compromise, by which the sovereign was to confer the temporal power, and the election was to be made by the chapters. In 1164 a clause in the Constitutions of Clarendon mentions the custom that elections to bishoprics should be "by the chief clergy of the Church, assembled in the king's chapel, with the assent of the king;" whilst, in 1214, John, by a special charter, made a grant to the chapters of free canonical election, reserving, however, to the king the right of licence and approval. This charter was confirmed by Magna Charta, and again in 1361 by Edward III.; and in spite of various attempts at interference on the part of the Pope, the crown as a rule managed to secure the appointment of its nominees. In 1534, an Act of Henry VIII. provided that with the congé d'élire the king was also to send the name of the person he wished to be elected; and that if the election is delayed beyond twenty days after the issuing of the royal licence, or if any other than the royal nominee was chosen, the dean and chapter were to incur the penalties of Præmunire (q.v.). It was also provided that after a delay of twelve days on the part of the chapter the king might fill up the vacant see by letters patent. This is still the method of appointing to bishoprics in England. In Ireland, before the Irish Church Act of 1869, the nominations were made by letters patent. [BISHOP.]

Congleton, HENRY BROOKS PARNELL, LORD (b. 1776, d. 1842), was the second son of the Right Hon. Sir John Parnell, Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland. His elder brother being born a cripple without the use of speech, the estates were settled upon Henry by a special Act of Parliament, 1789.

He entered Parliament in 1802 as member for Portarlington. He devoted himself, especially during his Parliamentary career, to the questions of the Corn Law Reform and Catholic Relief, and soon became prominent as a champion in the Opposition. He also published several pamphlets of some weight on these questions. He was chairman of the Finance Committee in the session of 1828. His motion, in 1830, with regard to the Civil List, on which the ministry was outvoted, produced the downfall of the Wellington administration. He afterwards sat for Queen's County for twenty-seven years, and subsequently represented Dundee. He was created a peer August 11, 1841. He died by his own hand, May, 1842.

Coningsby, THOMAS, EARL (d. 1729), was member for Leominster during the reign of William III. He was "a busy and unscrupulous Whig." He accompanied the king to Ireland in the capacity of Paymaster-General. On the departure of William to England he was created one of the Lords Justices. Together with his colleagues, he was guilty of hanging a man named Gafney, who turned informer in a murder case. He superintended and signed the Treaty of Limerick. During the next six months, by his unprincipled rapacity, and by the favour he showed to Roman Catholics, he succeeded in alienating all classes, and was recalled. In 1701 we find him voting for the Resumption Bill, although he had received considerable grants of Irish land. "He was," says Macaulay, "an unprincipled man: he was insatiable of riches; and he was in a position in which riches were easily to be obtained by an unprincipled man." After the death of Queen Anne, Coningsby was created a peer of Great Britain.

Connaught. The ancient kingdom of Connaught, originally called Olnegmacht, comprised, roughly speaking, the present counties of Galway, Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, Leitrim, and Cavan, afterwards added to Ulster. According to tradition, when the Scots established themselves in Ireland, their great chief, Tuathal (d. circa 160 A.D.), reigned over Munster, Leinster, and Olnegmacht, and in the great division of the country between his grandson Con, or Cond, "of the hundred battles," and the rival king, Mug of Munster (whence came the terms Leith-Cuinnon, "Con's half," for north Ireland, and Leith-Mogha, "Mug's half," for south Ireland), the district now known as County Clare, which had originally belonged to Olnegmacht, was transferred to Munster. About this time the name of the kingdom was changed from Olnegmacht to Connaught. In the reign of King Laeghairé, Connaught was converted to Christianity by St. Patrick (about 433). In the time of the so-called Irish Pentarchy, Connaught was a fairly com-pet kingdom, owing allegiance to the Ard-Riagh, or chief monarch of Ireland, usually chosen from the kings of Meath. Its power was at its height in 561, when Fergus defeated the Ard-Riagh Diarmid at the battle of Sligo; but soon afterwards the kingdom split up into principalities, and continued through the Danish invasion, in which the nobles unpatriotically sided with the invader, though they afterwards changed sides and aided Brian Boru in winning the great battle of Clontarf (1014). Soon after this, the great sept of the O'Connors of Roscommon became prominent in Connaught, and began to wage civil war with the O'Neils of Ulster and the O'Briens of Munster. Turlogh O'Brien drove the reigning O'Connor from his kingdom in 1079, but Turlogh O'Connor overran the whole of Munster in 1118, and followed this up by taking Dublin. His son, Roderic O'Connor, claimed the title of Ard-Riagh of Ireland, and was crowned with great pomp in Dublin in 1166. Soon afterwards he drove Dermot Macmurrough, King of Leinster, from his kingdom, whereupon the latter sought help from Henry II. of England, and the English invasion followed. Roderic, a man of indolent disposition, made little attempt at resistance, but did homage to Henry in 1175, when the sovereignty of Ireland was reserved to him with the exception of Dublin, Meath, Leinster, Waterford, and Dungarvan. His son, Cathal, pursued the same policy on John's visit to Ireland in 1210. Henry III., however, by a great breach of good faith, granted the country, in 1225, to Richard de Burgh, and after a terrible struggle he succeeded in holding his own against the O'Connors, who were, as usual, split up into several factions; and the sept was almost annihilated in the reign of Edward II., when Felim O'Connor joined Edward Bruce, and was defeated by his kinsman Rory, supported by the Burghs and Berminghams at Athenry (1316). About the middle of the century the Burghs of Connaught, the younger branch, threw off their allegiance to the English crown, and Connaught was divided between their leaders, while they changed their name at the same time to that of Burke. The race rapidly degenerated; they adopted Irish manners and intermarried freely with the O'Connors, in spite of the Statute of Kilkenny (1367). The power of the latter revived, so that by the commencement of the reign of Henry VIII. they still claimed to be kings, and had extended their dominions to within twenty miles of Dublin. Their strength was, however, checked in the reign of Edward VI. by Sir Edward Bellingham, who built a castle at Athlone to curb Connaught. In the reign of Elizabeth the Burkes suffered a sterner punishment; they had remained quiet during the Ulster and Munster insurrections, but at last, in 1576, when the hated Sir Nicholas Malby was appointed

President of Connaught, they arose in rebellion. The whole of the country was in return laid waste by fire and sword, and the unfortunate race nearly exterminated in that and the following years. In 1560 Connaught ceased to be a kingdom, and was divided into counties by Act of Parliament. Clare, or Thomond, originally part of Connaught, was soon afterwards added to it again, but after a little while again became part of Munster. [BURKE; O'CONNOR.] In the reign of Charles I. an Inquiry into Titles in Connaught was made at the instance of Wentworth, afterwards Lord Strafford, when Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. The idea was first mooted in 1634, but was laid aside in order to conciliate the Irish Parliament. As soon, however, as they had voted the necessary supplies, Charles broke his promise of making sixty years' possession a bar to the claims of the crown, and, in 1635, issued a commission to inquire into defective titles in Connaught, wishing to dispossess the landlords and colonise the country on the plan which James I. had pursued in Ulster. After the juries had been warned what the consequences of contumacy would be, the commission went to work, and soon declared that the lands of the Burkes about Athlone—in fact, nearly three-fourths of the province—belonged to the crown. For this the foreman of the jury, Sir Lucas Dillon, was permitted to retain some of his own lands. In most cases the landlords had no title-deeds to show, and those who had were forced to pay large fines for their confirmation. In Galway alone the jury refused to find for the king; they were fined £4,000 each and imprisoned, when the sheriff, on whom a penalty of £1,000 was imposed, died. The Transplantation to Connaught was effected during the Protectorate. Cromwell determined, in 1653, to confine the Irish nation to the desolated province of Connaught, and declared that they must transplant themselves thither within seven months on the penalty of death. There they were to be enclosed by a cordon of soldiers, to whom a strip of land, a mile wide, running round the coast and the Shannon, was assigned. The population was now reduced by war and banishment to about 850,000, and for them 800,000 acres was set apart. By a summary process the estates of the Catholic gentry were confiscated, according to their degree of complicity in the Irish rebellion and their resistance to the Protectorate, in various proportions, from one to two-thirds, which were handed over to adventurers and Parliamentary soldiers, while they were forced to accept an equivalent across the Shannon. After the appointed time had passed, an Irish gentleman was hanged for refusing to transplant, and many hundreds, with their families, were sent as slaves to Barbadoes. Many others were removed bodily, with what they could save of their possessions, to Connaught. The utmost severity was used in the process, noble ladies, for instance, being compelled to go on foot, and all being reduced to the greatest misery. Some of the sons of the banished owners wandered about their old estates, living by outlawry and the hospitality of their fathers' tenants. A sum of £20 was laid on the heads of these "Tories," in 1657, and their extermination decreed, together with that of two other "beasts," the wolf and the priest. After the Restoration an attempt was made (1661) to soften these conditions, the result of which was that it was declared that all Catholics who were innocent of rebellion should be restored to their estates. Those, however, who had accepted lands in Connaught were forced to abide by their bargains, and of those who returned from exile but few obtained any redress.

Conservative. [TORY.]

Conservators of the Peace. These predecessors of our modern justices of the peace were persons entrusted with the duty of maintaining order and police in their counties. Dr. Stubbs traces their origin to an edict of Hubert Walter in 1195. According to this proclamation an oath against harbouring or aiding thieves and robbers was to be taken by every one above fifteen years of age. This usage dates from Anglo-Saxon times; but its execution was now assigned to special knights appointed for the purpose. In 1230 and 1252 two or three knights are appointed in each shire for the conservation of the peace, and in 1253 we find the sheriffs summoning four men, and the reeve from each township, and twelve burghers from each borough, to execute the same functions; and in the fifth year of Edward I. an officer bearing the title of "Custos Pacis," or guardian of the peace, is elected in the county courts. Conservators of the same kind were appointed to carry out the provisions of the Statute of Winchester, which deals so largely with questions of local police. Dr. Stubbs considers that these offices were originally filled by the crown, but when vacant, by election of the shire-moot. In the first year of Edward III. "good men" were appointed to guard the peace in each county, but apparently were not elected like Edward I.'s "Custodes Pacis." In the eighteenth year of Edward III. these Conservators of the Peace were commissioned to hear and determine felonies, and sixteen years later received authority to do so regularly, and they became regular officials of the crown, from whom they henceforth derive all their authority.

Consistory Courts. [ECCLESIASTICAL JURISDICTION.]

Consols is the usual abbreviation for the government stock, properly entitled Three per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities. It originated in the year 1761, when an Act was passed consolidating several separate stocks bearing interest at 3 per cent. In 1787 the public debt was further consolidated by the union of the Aggregate, General, and South Sea Funds. By the Act 56 Geo. III., c. 98 (1816), it was united with the Irish Government Fund. [NATIONAL DEBT.]

Constable (derived from the Latin comes stabuli, count of the stable) was originally an office in the Byzantine court, the name appearing in the West about 580 A.D. In England it is used in several different senses. (1) It appears to have been first attached after the Conquest to the keepers of the royal castles, e.g., the Constable of the Tower, of Baynard's Castle, of Chester Castle, &c., who rapidly acquired hereditary privileges, and exercised under weak kings usurped jurisdictions in common pleas, together with oppressive powers of imprisonment, which were not finally abolished until 1403.

(2) The Lord High Constable appears about the time of Stephen as one of the domestic dignitaries of the court. The office existed indeed under the Norman kings, but was comparatively unimportant, and the first High Constable who is at all prominent in history is Miles of Hereford, one of the chief supporters of the Empress Matilda. The High Constable may be considered to have succeeded to the duties of the officer who, before the Conquest, was known as the Staller; he was quartermaster-general of the court and army. From the Dialogus de Scaccario we learn that he was also, in the time of Henry II., one of the officers of the Exchequer, where he helped the Treasurer to check the accounts of the king's household servants. As was the case with the other great offices of the royal household, the Lord High Constable had, before the end of the reign of Henry II., become an hereditary dignity, and went, together with the tenure of certain manors in Gloucestershire, and the castle of Caldecot in Monmouthshire, into the family of Bohun, through Humphrey de Bohun, who married the daughter and heiress of Miles of Hereford, and on the extinction of that line in 1372 it was held by Thomas of Woodstock (d. 1397), who married the heiress of the seventh Earl of Hereford. With the accession of the house of Lancaster (1399), the office ceased to be hereditary. The Earl of Northumberland was made Constable by Henry IV. in 1399, but the office was taken from him in 1403 and given to the Duke of Bedford. Subsequently the Duke of Somerset was made Constable in 1450, but there seem to have been considerable gaps between many of the appointments. The Lord High Constable, together with the Marshal, had by the time of Edward I. acquired great powers in the management of the army; he superintended the mustering, billeting, and formation of troops, took care that those who owed service by their tenure sent the proper amount of men, and during the campaign held court for the trial of military offences. In 1296, Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, together with Bigod the Marshal, refused to take charge of an army destined for Guienne, availing themselves of the legal quibble that they were only bound to serve the king in person, and they gained their point. From this date also the judicial functions of the Lord High Constable became important; besides administering martial law, he was, with the Marshal, whose functions are by no means distinct, the presiding officer of the Court of Chivalry (q.v.), and, as such, decided questions of honour and heraldry. These powers became considerably enlarged, and tended to encroach on the jurisdiction of the courts of common law, and were strictly limited in 1389. Edward IV., however, revised and increased the illegal powers for the purpose of punishing the Lancastrians. The Lord High Constable was empowered to take cognisance of all cases of high treason, "to hear, examine, and conclude them, even summarily and plainly, without noise or show of judgment, on simple inspection of fact." Richard III. bestowed the office on Henry Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, partly, perhaps, with the idea of making it hereditary again, for Buckingham was a descendant of the Bohuns. The honour was conferred on his son Edward by Henry VII. Henry VIII., however, in 1514, finding that the fees of the office were exceedingly burdensome to the crown, discharged Buckingham from his office. Since Buckingham's discharge the Lord High Constable has only been appointed for special occasions, such as the king's coronation, and, in one single instance (in 1631), for trial by combat. The Duke of Wellington officiated as Lord High Constable at the last three coronations.

(3) The Constables of the Hundred, or High Constables, were officers who, under the Angevin kings, performed in a subordinate capacity some of the duties which before the Conquest were entrusted to the head man, or reeve of the hundred. In a writ of Henry III. (1252), it is provided that "one or two chief constables should be constituted in every hundred, at whose mandate all those of his hundred sworn to arms should assemble," and by the Statute of Winchester (1286) it was ordered that in every hundred or franchise there should be chosen two or more constables to make the view of armour. They were elected by the court leet, and sworn in by the lord or his steward. In the reign of Elizabeth we find that they had the power of holding petty sessions for the hiring of servants. In 1844 it was provided that in default of appointments in the court leet, high constables might be chosen by justices at their special sessions. After the establishment and regulation of the county constabulary (between the years 1839 and 1859), high constables having become practically useless, the justices of each county were directed to consider and determine whether it was necessary to continue the office in each hundred. [HUNDRED.]

(4) The Petty Constable, or Constable of the Vill, may, on the analogy of the constable of the hundred, be considered as the degenerate descendant of the tithing man. He also was elected in the court leet until the reign of Charles II., when, in virtue of a statute passed in 1673, the duty of nominating and swearing-in constables was by degrees transferred to justices of the peace. In the reign of George II. it was provided (in 1751) that no constable could be sued without making the justice who signed the warrant a joint defendant. In 1842 it was declared that, with the exception of certain privileged classes, every able-bodied man between the ages of twenty-five and fifty-five who contributed to the poor rates, or held a tenement of the annual value of £4, was liable to serve as constable. The election of the constabulary of boroughs under the Municipal Corporations Act was placed in the hands of a watch committee in 1832, and the duties of special constables, who might be sworn in to keep the peace on emergencies, were regulated by legislation in 1827 and 1832.

(5) The Lord High Constable of Scotland can be traced back to the time of David I. In Scotland, the duties of the High Constable consisted in commanding the army while in the field, in the absence of the king, and, in conjunction with the Marshal, judging all transgressions committed within a certain distance of the king's palace, known as the chalmers of peace. In 1321, when Sir Gilbert Hay was made Earl of Errol, the office was made hereditary in his family. It was expressly reserved by the treaty of Union, and by Act of Parliament in 1747. It is now, however, purely honorary.

Constance, fourth daughter of William the Conqueror, married Alan, brother of the Duke of Brittany, to whom her father gave the earldom of Richmond. In 1090 she died, it is said poisoned by some of her husband's vassals, who found her harsh and oppressive.

Constance of Brittany (d. 1201) was the daughter and heiress of Conan, Duke of Brittany. She was married to Geoffrey, son of Henry II., by whom she had two children, Arthur and Eleanor. After Geoffrey's death, in 1186, she obtained the guardianship of her son and the government of the duchy, but was soon afterwards compelled to marry Ranulf, Earl of Chester, who made himself so hated in Brittany that on Henry II.'s death, in 1189, he was driven out, and Constance restored to power. In 1196 she was seized by a body of troops under her husband, and imprisoned for eighteen months; her conduct during this period in asserting the rights of the Bretons was most adverse to the interests of her son, in addition to which, she had quarrelled with her powerful mother-in-law, Eleanor, as well as with her husband, from whom she obtained a divorce in 1198. She now married Guy, brother of the Viscount of Thouars, by whom she had three daughters, from the eldest of whom, Alix, sprang the Dukes of Brittany who played such an important part in the French wars of Edward III.'s reign.

Constance of Castile (d. 1392) was the eldest daughter of Pedro the Cruel, and became the second wife of John of Gaunt, who inherited, through her, claims to the crown of Castile.

Constantine (d. 820), son of Fergus, expelled Conall, King of the Picts, and obtained the Pictish throne (789), having in all probability authority over Dalriada also. In 796 some monks from Lindisfarne visited his court, and for them he founded the church of Dunkeld. He was succeeded by his brother Angus. The reign of Constantine is chiefly memorable as marking the date of the first historical attacks of the Norsemen on the British shores. It was in 793 that they harried the holy island of Lindisfarne, and a few years later seized upon the western islands, and slaughtered the monks of Iona. By these pirates, who henceforward for several centuries continued their ravages, nearly all communications between Ireland and Scotland were in time broken off.

Constantine (d. 877), son of Kenneth, succeeded his uncle Donald as King of the Picts, 863. His reign is chiefly remarkable for a series of conflicts with the Northmen, under Olaf the White, the son of Norsten the Red. This chieftain is said to have conquered Caithness and Sunderland. When the Norwegians drove the Danes out of Ireland, the latter invaded Scotland, and defeated the Scotch king at Dollar and Inverdore, at which last battle Constantine was killed.

Constantine (d. 952), son of Aedh, reigned over the kingdom of Alban, 900—943. He was a man of vigour and an experienced warrior. In 904 he cut to pieces in Strathern an invading body of Danes, under Ivan. Soon afterwards he united the Pictish and Scottish Churches at an ecclesiastical council held at Scone. In 908 he procured the election of his brother Donald to the throne of Strathclyde, and in 918 joined the Northumbrians against the Norsemen, whose advance was checked by the allied armies at the battle of Corbridge-on-Tyne. Under the year 924 the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle tells us that amongst other nations the Scots chose Edward the Elder for father and lord. But these peaceful relations cannot have lasted very long, for in 934 we find Edward's successor, Athelstan, invading Scotland, and penetrating as far as Dunottar, and ravaging the coasts of Caithness with his fleet. Constantine, in retaliation, joined with the Norsemen and the Britons of Strathclyde in an attempt to wrest Northumbria from the English king, but the united forces were defeated at Brunanburh (q.v.), 937. In 943 Constantine resigned his crown, and became abbot of the monastery of St. Andrews, where he died, 952, having, however, emerged for a short time, in 949, to do battle with King Edred.

Constantinus Chlorus, Emperor of Rome (292—306), ruled over the provinces of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, and seems to have spent most of his time in the latter country. The story of his having married a British princess named Helena rests on no good authority. He defeated Allectus, and reunited Britain to the Empire. He died at York in the year 306.

Constitutions, COLONIAL. [AUSTRALIA; CANADA; COLONIES.]

Constitution, THE IRISH, OF 1782. In 1779 the Irish Volunteers, whom the carelessness of the government and the undefended state of Ireland had allowed to become formidable, had succeeded in frightening the government into repealing the trade restrictions. The movement was continued, and, under the direction of Grattan, aimed at legislative independence. In 1781 Lord Carlisle, the new viceroy, was instructed to resist all efforts at legislative independence, but nevertheless, bills for the repeal of Poynings' Act (q.v.) and of the Mutiny Act were given notice of. The repeal of the first, placing the Irish Parliament more or less in the position of the English Parliament, could not be resisted, and was carried in Dec., 1781. The repeal of the Mutiny Bill, however, was not carried, though moved by Grattan. When Parliament again met, in Feb., 1782, the Volunteers assumed a very threatening attitude, and the patriot party, backed by the resolutions of Dungannon, and aroused by the mention of Ireland in some unimportant Acts passed in England, proceeded, through Grattan, on Feb. 22, 1782, to move a sort of declaration of independence, but they were beaten by 137 to 68. But, though the resolutions were lost, the principle on which they were based had been admitted by every one. The Parliament was now adjourned, and when it met again, in March, the North ministry was overthrown, and the Whigs were in office. On April 17th Grattan was content to move an amendment in the address demanding complete independence, and the House then adjourned to wait for an answer from England. On May 17th resolutions were passed in the English Parliament conceding the repeal of Poynings' Act, and of the statute 6 George I. and a biennial Mutiny Bill. On May 27th the Irish Parliament received the news, and immediately voted £100,000 and 20,000 men for the war. Flood indeed attempted to declaim against England's concessions as insufficient, but failed, and the House resolved "that the right of legislation of the Irish Parliament in all cases, internal and external, had been already asserted by Ireland, and fully admitted by England." The constitution of 1782 was thus conceded; though hailed with enthusiasm at the time, it made corruption on a large scale necessary, and convinced thinking men of the necessity of the Union as achieved in 1800.

Consuls are persons empowered to take charge of the trading and commercial interests of British subjects in foreign towns. They were introduced in the sixteenth century, but it was not till the end of the seventeenth that it became customary to appoint them regularly. Their duties are to give advice and assistance to English traders; to settle their disputes where possible; to guard the legal rights of British subjects under foreign jurisdiction; and to report on the trade of the country in which they are resident. By the Consular Marriage Act (12 and 13 Vict., c. 68), consuls are empowered to celebrate marriages between British subjects resident in their district. They can take evidence on oath as to crimes committed on British ships, and are empowered to send home the offenders for trial; and they are also to exercise a general superintendence over British shipping, so as to see that the Merchant Shipping and other Acts are not violated. In some cases British consuls are also diplomatic agents or chargés d'affaires, empowered to communicate with the Foreign Offices of the states in which they are stationed, and in this case they are called Consuls-General. In Turkey and the Levant the consuls-general exercise the powers conceded under the capitulations between England and the Porte, and are supreme judges of the consular courts. British consuls are allowed to trade in some towns, while at other stations this privilege is refused.

Conventicle Act, THE (1664), enacted that any one over sixteen years of age present at an unlawful assembly or conventicle was to incur fine or imprisonment. A conventicle was defined as an assembly of more than five persons, besides the members of a family, met together for holding worship not according to the Church of England. In 1670 the Act was amended, and the penalties greatly lessened, but a severe fine imposed on any one who lent his house for such meetings. The Conventicle Act was repealed by the Toleration Act of 1689.

Convention, THE (1688—9), is the name given to the Parliament which met after the abdication of James II. to settle the succession. It met on Jan. 22nd. It first placed the administration and the disposal of the revenue in the hands of William of Orange. The Commons declared the throne vacant, and voted that it was inconsistent with the safety of the kingdom that it should be governed by a Popish king. The Lords, after much discussion, negatived the resolution that the throne was vacant, Danby's party asserting that the crown had devolved on Mary. Disputes thereupon broke out between the two Houses. After a conference, the Lords yielded, and a resolution was passed that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared King and Queen of England. Soon afterwards William and Mary arrived in England, and the crown was tendered to them, and accepted (Feb. 13). As soon as the new ministry was established, the question was broached whether the Convention should be turned into a Parliament. A bill declaring the Convention a Parliament passed the Lords, and after a sharp debate was accepted by the Commons. It contained a clause requiring members of both Houses to take the oaths to the new king and queen. "Such," says Hallam, "was the termination of that contest which the house of Stuart had maintained against the liberties, and of late against the religion, of England; or rather, of that far more ancient controversy between the crown and the people which had never been wholly at rest since the reign of John." Convention Bill, THE, passed by the Irish Parliament in 1793, declared the assemblage of persons calling themselves representatives of the nation, under any pretence whatsoever, illegal. Fitzgibbon carried it, in spite of the violent opposition of Grattan and the Duke of Leinster.

Convention of Estates, THE (1689), was the name given to the Scottish Parliament which assembled on March 14, 1689, after the Revolution. On the 4th of April the Estates passed a resolution declaring that King James VII., "being a professed Papist, did assume the regal power and acted as king without taking the oath required by law, and hath by the advice of evil and wicked councillors invaded the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, and altered it from a legal limited monarchy to an arbitrary despotic power, and hath exercised the same to the subversion of the Protestant religion, and the violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government, whereby he hath forfeited all right to the crown, and the throne is become vacant." On the 11th of April the Estates adopted the Claim of Right which declared the fundamental liberties of the kingdom of Scotland, and stated that no Papist could be King of Scotland, and that the Scottish Church was Presbyterian, and finally declaring that William and Mary were King and Queen of Scotland. Two days later (April 13) a number of resolutions, called the Articles of Grievances, were voted. These set forth a number of acts done under the authority of bad laws which the Estates desired to have repealed. The Convention exercised the executive authority in Scotland till the crown had been duly offered to and accepted by William III., when it became a Parliament.

Convention Parliament, THE (1660), is the name given to the assembly which established the Restoration of Charles II. It assembled April 26, 1660, on the dissolution of the "Rump." It immediately accepted the Declaration of Breda (q.v.), and issued an address inviting Charles to accept the crown. On the return of Charles, the discussions of the Convention turned chiefly upon the questions of the amnesty, the settlement of the claims of property which had changed hands, the settlement of the Church, and the royal revenue. In regard to the first, the amnesty was voted for all but the judges of Charles I. In regard to the second, an Act of Indemnity and Oblivion was brought in to prevent holders of land sequestered during the interregnum regaining possession of their property. The old feudal claims of the crown for fines upon alienation, reliefs, wardships, &c., were abolished, and the crown revenue was fixed at £1,200,000 a year, raised partly from the excise, and partly from tunnage and poundage now granted to the king for life. After much discussion, the settlement of the Church was left open when the Parliament was dissolved on December 29th, 1660.

Convocation is the name given to the general assembly of the clergy of the kingdom. The organisation of the Church gave its councils great importance in early times, and under the Norman kings this conciliar activity was still further developed. The Church had its synods of the nation, the province, and the diocese; they were attended by prelates, chapters, archdeacons, and the parochial clergy. In general history, these synods became important as clerical taxation was introduced. As this became customary, diocesan representatives were sent to the provincial Convocations for the purpose of giving their assent to taxation. The first definite instance of representation in Convocation is found under Archbishop Stephen Langton, in 1225. In 1283 a rule was laid down that each bishop should summon to Convocation two proctors of the clergy of his diocese and one proctor from each cathedral or collegiate church, who were to have full power of consenting to such measures as the community of the clergy think fit. This was the constitution of the Convocation of the province of Canterbury. That of the province of York, dating from 1279, contained two proctors from each archdeaconry. Besides these elected members were bishops, abbots, priors, deans, and archdeacons, as ex-officio members.

The jealousy between the two archbishops, and the difficulty in reconciling their claims, led, in the twelfth century, to quarrels. National Church councils became almost impossible, and ecclesiastical questions were discussed separately by the two Convocations. Such matters as concerned ordinary discipline were decided for themselves. On other matters they presented petitions to the king, which were called gravamina.

When Edward I., in 1295, organised more completely the parliamentary representation of the several estates, he wished also to incorporate the clergy with the parliamentary system. For this purpose he summoned to Parliament, by separate writs addressed to each bishop, the proctors of the chapters and the parochial clergy, together with bishops, deans, and archdeacons personally. Thus the Convocations were summoned as spiritual councils of the archbishops, and the proctors were further summoned to Parliament by the clause of the king's writ to the bishops, known, from its first word, as the "præmunientes" clause. In this way the two Convocations were to be worked into the parliamentary system, while retaining their position as spiritual councils besides.

The clergy, however, showed great reluctance to enter into this arrangement. Probably they thought that they were sufficiently represented by the lords spiritual, and did not wish to be drawn into parliamentary disputes, in which their own privileges might suffer. The crown in vain addressed letters to the archbishops, urging them to compel the attendance of the clerical estate. After 1340 the crown acquiesced in the rule that clerical taxes should be granted in Convocation, and in the fifteenth century the attendance in Parliament of clerical proctors died away. The duty of voting taxes led to the summons of Convocation at the same time as Parliament, but this was from motives of convenience, and did not affect the independence of Convocation.

In the weakness of the clergy before the royal power, Convocation was used by Henry VIII. to bring about the separation of the English Church from the Church of Rome. The clergy were informed that they had incurred the penalties of the Act of Præmunire by recognising Wolsey's legatine authority, which had been recognised by the king himself. Iniquitous as was this penalty, the clergy were helpless against the king, and Convocation, in 1530, assented to a large subsidy to appease the royal wrath. In the bill which granted it, the royal supremacy was admitted, with the proviso "as far as Christ's law allows." The Act of Submission, 1533, practically abolished the legislative powers of Convocation. It established that Convocation "is, always has been, and ought to be, summoned by royal writ;" there was to be thenceforth no legislation without the king's licence, and a revision of the existing canon law was committed to a mixed commission of clergy and laity.

Henceforth, during the sixteenth century, the Convocation of the province of Canterbury was recognised as expressing the opinions of the clergy, and worked with Parliament in framing the formularies and laws of the Church. The Prayer-book and the Articles received the sanction of Convocation before being submitted to Parliament. In 1604 Convocation drew up a new body of Canons, which were sanctioned by the king, but were not ratified by Parliament. These Canons remain as the basis of ecclesiastical law for the clergy, but are not legally binding on clergy or laymen except where they incorporate previous laws.

After the Restoration Convocation was summoned, in 1661, to revise the Prayer-book and re-model the Canons. In this matter it did little; but this assembly is remarkable as being the last Convocation which granted a clerical subsidy. During the Commonwealth the clergy had been taxed with the laity, and there seems to have been a general agreement that this method was more convenient. Accordingly, this clerical privilege was abolished by a private compact between Lord Chancellor Clarendon and Archbishop Sheldon. The important constitutional change was made without any parliamentary authority (1662). Convocation thenceforth ceased to grant taxes and to have any political importance. The clergy, being merged in the estate of the Commons, became electors for members of the Lower House.

In 1689 William III. was desirous of extending the limits of the Church, and of introducing alterations which would allay the scruples of Dissenters. A commission was appointed to draw up a scheme which was to be submitted to Convocation. Convocation sat in two Houses: the bishops in the Upper House, the other officials and proctors in the Lower. The struggle of parties took place over the election of a prolocutor, or president, of the Lower House, and those opposed to any change were in a considerable majority. After this the Lower House showed such decided difference of opinion from the Upper that nothing could be done, and Convocation was soon prorogued. It was not summoned again for ten years (1700), when the differences between the Upper and Lower House were still more openly shown. Finally, the Lower House refused to submit to the archbishop's prorogation, and adjourned by its own authority. The next Convocation, in 1702, resumed the question of the archbishop's right of prorogation, and the conflict between the two Houses continued. At length, in 1717, the writings of Hoadley, Bishop of Bangor, excited great wrath amongst the clergy, and gave rise to what is known as the "Bangorian controversy." As it was clear that the Lower House of Convocation would censure Hoadley, who was a favourite with the government, Convocation was prorogued by royal writ, and was not again summoned for business till 1861. It is true that it met formally till 1741, when the Lower House agreed to admit the president's right of prorogation, but it refused to receive a communication from the Upper House. Being judged incorrigible, it was not again called together, till its revival in 1861, owing to the increased interest in ecclesiastical affairs.

The Convocations of the two provinces now meet with the sessions of Parliament. They are summoned by a writ from the crown to the archbishops. In the Convocation of Canterbury the Upper House consists of twenty-three members, the Lower House of one hundred and fifty-four. The Convocation of York contains nine members in the Upper House, and sixty-nine in the Lower.

Conway, HENRY SEYMOUR, MARSHAL (b. 1720, d. 1795), was the second son of the first Lord Conway. He entered the army at the age of twenty, and distinguished himself at Fontenoy and Culloden. In 1741 he was returned to Parliament for Higham Ferrers. In 1757 he was appointed second in command of the Rochefort expedition, under Sir John Mordaunt. In 1761 he commanded the British troops in Germany, in the absence of the Marquis of Granby. At the end of George II.'s reign, Conway had been appointed Groom of the Bedchamber, and he was continued in that office by the new king, until his independent conduct and his opposition to the ministry on the question of general warrants, cost him alike this post and all his military commands. On Rockingham's accession to power, Conway was appointed joint Secretary of State with the Duke of Grafton, and leader in the House of Commons; and, unfortunately for himself, was persuaded by "his evil genius," Horace Walpole, to hold his ground, until he could no longer retreat with credit in 1768. During the later years of that period, the policy of the cabinet towards the American colonies had been directly opposed to Conway's views. On the king's demand for Wilkes's exclusion from Parliament, he "confessed that he had not the courage to face the consequences of a step which would make every second Englishman a rebel at heart, and convert London into a hostile capital." He accordingly resigned the seals, but acted as an unpaid member of the cabinet until the return of Lord Chatham and the resignation of Lord Camden, when he refused any longer "to provide respectability for the whole administration." When the Marquis of Granby was dismissed from the command of the army, his place was offered to Conway, and declined. In 1772 he was appointed Governor of Jersey. Ten years later he became Commander-in-chief of all the Forces. In the same year he brought forward a motion, praying that his Majesty would terminate the war with the Colonists. This was lost by only one vote; and when he brought forward the same motion a few months later, he carried it against Lord North by a majority of nineteen. In the following year he retired into private life. Conway was a brave soldier, and a man of unsullied integrity. Of his character as a statesman Lord Stanhope says:—"Brave though he was in the field, spirited and ready though he was in debate, he ever seemed in counsel irresolute and wavering; so eager to please all parties that he could satisfy none, and quickly swayed to and fro by any whisperer or go-between who called himself his friend."

Conyers, SIR JOHN. [ROBIN OF REDESDALE.]

Cook, CAPTAIN JAMES (b. 1728, d. 1779), the famous navigator, first gained notoriety in Canada, where he did good service at the siege of Quebec, 1759, and subsequently surveyed the coast of Newfoundland. In 1768, being sent to the Pacific for the purpose of observing the transit of Venus, he discovered New Zealand and New South Wales (April, 1770); and four years later made a second voyage of discovery, in which he again visited New Zealand. His conduct to the natives at first was such as to excite their hatred, but in his subsequent voyages he invariably followed a conciliatory policy. On Cook's third voyage, undertaken with the view of discovering a north-west passage to India, he visited the Sandwich Islands, and pushed his explorations to the western coast of America. He was murdered as he was returning from this voyage by the natives of Owhyhee, in the Sandwich Islands. Captain Cook's ability as a surveyor and explorer is the more noteworthy from the fact that he began life as a common sailor, and was entirely without education.

Cooke, SIR ANTHONY (b. 1504, d. 1576), a man of great learning, was selected as preceptor to Edward VI. when Prince of Wales. In 1553 he was committed on suspicion of being concerned in the plot to put Lady Jane Grey on the throne.

Coomassie, the capital of King Coffee Calcalli, King of Ashantee, was entered by the British troops, under Sir Garnet Wolseley, Feb. 5, 1874, in the course of the war with that chief. [ASHANTER WAR.]

Co-operation. The aim of co-operation may be said to be to enable workers to work "not in the interest of, nor in order to enrich, one individual, or a few, but in the interest of the general body of those who are concerned, both as workers and as consumers of the ordinary necessities of life" (Acland and Jones). The societies that have as yet been formed with this view are of three kinds. (1) The Distributive Societies, or Retail Stores. Of these there were, in 1884, about 1,200 in Great Britain, with 640,000 members, and £6,000,000 share capital. They sell goods for ready money only, and at the ordinary market prices. The profits at the end of every quarter are divided amongst the members according to the amount of their purchases. (2) The Wholesale Societies—one in England (founded in 1864), and one in Scotland (founded in 1868). They supply the retail stores with goods; in 1884 their combined sales amounted to six millions sterling. Their managing committees are elected by the stores. (3) About twenty-two Manufacturing or Productive Societies, and five Federal Corn Mills. The corn mills do a business of about £1,300,000 a year, and the other productive societies a business of about £220,000 a year. These societies, with some exceptions, are combined in a Co-operative Union, founded in 1869. It is the object of this Union to abolish false dealing in any shape or form, and "to conciliate the conflicting interests of the capitalist, the worker, and the purchaser." The Union holds an Annual National Congress, at which matters that concern co-operation are discussed—such as the best method of voting in societies, the check system, education, store management, surplus capital, co-operative journalism, &c.

"Co-operation," it has been said, "considers profit to belong to the public, and not to any one section of it, whether they are employed in selling goods over the counter, keeping the accounts, buying the goods, or making them." The co-operative movement is thus an effort on the part of labour to emancipate itself from the bondage of capital. This effort is seen assuming organic shape in the early part of the century, when several co-operative stores were started in England and Scotland. These, however, on a close inspection, can in no way be distinguished from Joint Stock Companies, for the profits were divided according to the capital invested. Of such societies there were by 1830 upwards of 200 in existence, besides co-operative mills. In 1844 the Rochdale Pioneers introduced its distinctive feature into the co-operative movement, and divided profits on the amount of purchases. The example set by this society, together with the beneficial legislation—such as the Repeal of the Corn Laws, the Public Libraries Act, and the abolition of the Newspaper Duty—of the next dozen years, gave a new impetus to co-operation, and by 1862 we find 450 societies in existence, with a membership of 90,000, a capital of £450,000, annual sales, £2,350,000, and profits £166,000. Two years afterwards (1864), the Co-operative Wholesale Society had sprung into existence, and became the mainstay of the whole system. In 1869 the National Co-operative Congresses began. It was at the first of these congresses that the Co-operative Union was formed, and its aim of reconciling the interests of the capitalist, the workers, and the purchaser, "through an equitable division among them of the fund, commonly known as profit, was soon after formulated." The Supply Associations in London, such as the "Civil Service" and "Army and Navy," have attained great importance. These associations cannot be regarded as co-operative at all. The destination of the profits that accrue to them is the same as in a private firm, and goes to capital, whereas the essential feature of co-operation is in diverting the profits to labour.

Coorg. A province of India on the Malabar coast, between Mysore and the sea, comprising an area of about 1,600 square miles, no portion of which is less than 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. At the close of the eighteenth century the Rajah of Coorg was practically an independent prince. He had been imprisoned by Tippoo on the annexation of his country, but had contrived to escape, and to wage a successful guerilla warfare in the hills of his own country, till he drove out the troops of his enemy. During this warfare many of his exploits, which are related at length by Colonel Wilks, exhibit not only great gallantry, but also good faith and chivalrous generosity to an extraordinary degree. The assistance which he rendered to Lord Cornwallis in the second Mysore War procured the recognition of the freedom of his country at the Peace of Seringapatam. He died in 1809, and was succeeded by his brother, who bequeathed the crown to his son, in 1820. This prince ruled so badly, and with such ferocity and cruelty, while exhibiting such hostility to the English, that when, in 1832, his sister and her husband fled for their lives, and revealed his barbarities to the British Resident at Mysore, the latter, after in vain remonstrating with the Rajah, proclaimed him a public enemy. In 1834, after a gallant resistance, Coorg was subdued and annexed to the Madras presidency. Twenty years later it was discovered that Coorg was eminently suited for the cultivation of coffee, and it is now one of the most prosperous of the Indian provinces.

Coote, Sir Eyre (b. 1726, d. 1783), first saw service against the Jacobite insurgents in 1745. On the breaking out of the Seven Years' War, the hostilities were renewed in the Carnatic, which had died out after the recall of Dupleix. General Count Lally was sent to India with a powerful fleet and army. At first he was successful: captured Fort St. David, besieged Madras, and re-took Arcot in 1758. The arrival of Admiral Pocock and the English fleet prevented an assault on Madras, and the next year Colonel Coote took the command. He re-captured Wandewash, and compelled Lally to fight a battle in the neighbourhood of the town, in which the latter was completely routed. Coote, in 1760, gradually deprived Lally of all his conquests, and finally blockaded and captured Pondicherry, which was razed to the ground. In 1769 he was made commander-in-chief of the Company's army, and the following year returned to England. The disasters of the English in 1780, during Warren Hastings' Mahratta War, rendered it necessary to send out General (now Sir) Eyre Coote, to take the command in Bengal. The news of Hyder Ali's invasion of the Carnatic induced Hastings to send Coote to Madras. In January, 1781, he began his advance. Hyder had captured Arcot, and was besieging five other forts. Coote pushed on to Cuddalore and Porto Novo. Hyder resolved to risk an engagement, and took up a strong position, which he began to fortify. A long and arduous engagement ensued near Porto Novo (July 1, 1781), which lasted six hours, and at the end the British were completely victorious, with the loss of only 300 men, while Hyder, who had lost 10,000 men, was compelled to raise the siege of Trichinopoly. Seven weeks later Hyder was again completely routed at Polliore, Aug. 27, 1781. Another victory on Sept. 27, allowed Coote to retire unmolested into winter quarters. In 1782 the arrival of the French fleet under Suffrein brought Hyder again into the field, and Coote in vain endeavoured to bring on a general action. The French were victorious everywhere, and Hyder ravaged the Carnatic to the very gates of Madras. In October Sir Eyre Coote's shattered constitution obliged him to return to Bengal, and surrender his command to General Stuart. In 1783, April 26, two days after his return to Madras, once more to undertake the conduct of the Mysore War, the veteran died.

Copenhagen, THE BATTLE OF (2nd April, 1801), resulted in the breaking up of the Northern coalition against England, which had been one of Napoleon's most cherished schemes. After safely passing Cronenberg Castle, Nelson persuaded Parker to commence the attack without delay. Two days were spent by Nelson in sounding the King's Channel, which lies between Copenhagen and a large shoal, and is only three-quarters of a mile broad. Along the land side of this channel the Danes had ranged nineteen ships and floating batteries. Everything being in readiness, Nelson made the signal for action early in the morning of the 2nd. The pilots entirely lost their presence of mind, and the Agamemnon, the second ship, went aground, as did the Bellona and the Russell. Nelson, in the Elephant, came next, and profiting by their example, took a new course, and so guided the rest of the fleet. The action began at ten o'clock. Riou, with the frigates, at once attacked the Crown Batteries, and maintained the unequal contest for three hours, until he was killed. The battle raged for three hours without any apparent advantage being gained, and Sir Hyde Parker made the signal for recall. Nelson, affecting not to see it, continued the action, and about two o'clock the greater part of the Danish fire ceased. It was impossible, however, to take possession of the ships that struck, because they were protected by the batteries on shore. Nelson, wishing to save further bloodshed, sent ashore a flag of truce, saying that he must be allowed to take possession of the prizes, if only for the sake of the wounded men on board of them; and during the next day, Good Friday, the work still went on. The following days were spent by Nelson in maturing the negotiations, and on the 9th he succeeded in concluding an armistice for fourteen weeks, his object being to gain time to attack the Russians. The opportune death of the Czar Paul rendered any active hostility with that country unnecessary, and the armistice resulted in a treaty between England and the Northern powers.

Copenhagen, BOMBARDMENT OF (Sept. 2, 1807). The English ministry had learnt in the summer of 1807 of the existence of certain secret articles in the Treaty of Tilsit between the Czar and the Emperor Napoleon, by which the Danes and the other Baltic powers were to be induced or compelled to lend their fleet to the French for service against England. The danger appeared so imminent that the ministry determined to seize the Danish fleet, though England and Denmark were nominally at peace. Accordingly, in July, 1807, twenty-seven ships of the line, with 20,000 men on board, under the command of Lord Cathcart and Admiral Gambier, sailed for the Baltic, passed the Sound, and anchored off the island of Zealand. The English commanders demanded that the Danish fleet should be given up to them to be held as a deposit till the end of the war. This the Danes refused. On the 16th of August the British troops disembarked and invested the town, and under the command of Sir Arthur Wellesley fought a sharp engagement with the Danish militia at Kioje, whom they completely defeated. On Sept. 2nd the bombardment began, and was continued for three days, till eighteen hundred houses were destroyed, and the city was on fire in several places. On the 5th the Danes surrendered, and agreed to give up their fleet, which, accordingly, to the number of eighteen ships of the line, besides smaller vessels, was conveyed to England. The triumph, great as it was, was received with doubtful feelings in England, as the imminence of the danger to England was hardly understood, and the affair looked like an arbitrary and dangerous violation of the rights of neutrals. After an animated debate in Parliament both Houses supported the ministers by a majority of more than two to one.

Copenhagen Fields, Meeting in (April 21, 1834). On the conviction of the Dorsetshire labourers for administering illegal oaths, the whole body of labour unionists summoned a meeting in Copenhagen Fields on the 21st April, with the object of overawing the ministry. A plan was also formed for the violent seizure of Lord Melbourne, the Prime Minister, and for other illegal acts. Due warning being, however, given to the government, preparations were made. Melbourne did not meet the deputation of the union; troops were held in readiness, the public offices defended with artillery, and 5,000 householders sworn in as special constables. Melbourne's under-secretary received the deputation, and informed them that it was illegal for a petition to be presented by 60,000 men. The crowd, seeing the preparations made to receive them, withdrew quietly, and no disturbance followed.

Copyhold is a species of tenure which had its origin in villenage. In the latter half of the twelfth century, when the degradation of the agricultural class seems to have been completed, and former distinctions were merged into a uniform condition of villenage, they who held land by villein tenure, whether they were villeins or freemen, had no means of asserting their rights to the land as against the lord. They held part of the demesnes of a manor for the lord's advantage, and at his will. They had no rights in the court of the manor, and no remedy by assize, for these institutions were concerned solely with freeholders. In effect, however, the uncertainty of their tenure was remedied in Bracton's time by covenants with the lord, and his will was restrained by custom. Attending the court baron to make surrender, or crave admission, or pay their dues, tenants in villenage had their transactions entered in the rolls of the court, which became the evidence of their title, and of the custom of the manor. The court, while engaged in business of this kind, became separate from its original character, and as a new court, was called the customary court, to distinguish it from the court baron, of which the freeholders were the suitors. A copy from the rolls of this court constituted the title of the tenant in villenage, who was hence called a copyholder. In the reign of Edward IV. the judges allowed the copyholder to maintain an action for trespass against his lord when wrongfully disturbed. From this time "copyholders stand on sure ground." This kind of tenure still exists. In it the freehold remains in the lord, and the tenant holds by copy of the court roll, at the will of the lord, according to the custom of the manor. Copyhold land must therefore always be part of a manor. It may be assumed that no land can have been brought for the first time under this tenure since 18 Edward I. Though the copyholder is independent of the will of the lord, yet the freehold being in the lord subjects the former to some disadvantages. For the lord has a right to the minerals beneath and the timber upon the soil, though he cannot, unless the custom of the manor allow, come on the land to exercise these rights without the copyholder's leave. There are species of tenure, such as customary freeholds, which resemble copyhold. All questions as to the freehold in any such tenures should be decided by ascertaining "whether the well-known rights of freeholders, such as to cut timber and dig mines, are vested in the lord or in the tenant." It is in the power of copyholders freely to alienate their lands. In the process of alienation the old character of the tenure becomes apparent, for it is effected by first of all surrendering the property to the lord, or, instead of him, to his steward, and is completed by the admission of the new tenant. An estate in copyhold may be in fee simple, tail, or for life. An estate in fee in copyhold is subject to the incidents of fealty, suit, escheat, in many cases to rent, and more rarely to relief. Other incidents may pertain to it, according to the custom of the manor. Copyholds could formerly be enfranchised or converted into freeholds by agreement. Now, by the Copyhold Acts (15 and 16 Vict., c. 51, s. 7, and 21 and 22 Vict., c. 94, s. 21), the tenant or the lord, by making application to the Copyhold Commissioners, can secure a compulsory enfranchisement of copyhold upon equitable terms. The origin of copyhold is an exceedingly obscure subject, and many conflicting theories upon it have been broached. The view here taken is that of many modern historians. Copyright Acts. The first of these was 8 Anne, c. 19, which gave an author the copyright of his works for fourteen years, with extension if the author or his representative was living for a further term of fourteen years. By the decision of the House of Lords in 1774 (in case of Donaldson v. Beckett), this statute was held to have done away with any commonlaw right which the author might have in his work beyond the prescribed term of years. By the Act 54 Geo. III., c. 146, the author was granted copyright for the term of twenty-eight years, and for the residue of his life should he live beyond that period. By the Act of 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 45), the copyright of a book endures for the life of the author, and for seven years afterwards. If this term expires within forty-two years of the first publication, the copyright of the author or his assignees is to be extended to that term of years. Copies of all books are to be deposited in the library of the British Museum, and, if required, in the Bodleian Library, in the libraries of Cambridge University, Trinity College, Dublin, and of the Faculty of Advocates, Edinburgh. Dramatic, artistic, and musical copyright has been protected by 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 16, 8 Geo. II., c. 13, 38 Geo. III., c. 71, and 5 and 6 Vict., c. 45.

Corbeuil, WILLIAM OF, Archbishop of Canterbury (1123–1136), was a canon regular, and Prior of St. Osyth's, in Essex. On the death of Archbishop Ralph, a contest arose between the regulars and seculars about the appointment of his successor, which was settled by a compromise: William, who belonged, strictly speaking, to neither of these parties, being elected. The quarrel between the sees of Canterbury and York continued, and to establish his supremacy, William got himself appointed Papal legate, this being the first instance of an Archbishop of Canterbury holding this office. He was zealous in enforcing the celibacy of the clergy, and after Henry's death supported the claims of Stephen to the throne. All his contemporaries paint him in dark colours. The author of the Gesta Stephani describes him as "a man of smooth face and strictly religious manners, but much more ready to amass money than to spend it." "Of his merits," says Henry of Huntingdon, "nothing can be said, for he had none."

Cork was built in the sixth century, and was in ancient times the principality of the McCarthys. In 1172 it received a garrison from Henry II., who also in 1185, granted a charter to the town. In 1492, the citizens were conspicuous as supporters of Perkin Warbeck (q.v.). Later it was taken by Cromwell (1649), and Marlborough (1690). At the beginning of this century (1810), one of the Queen's Colleges was established in the city.

Cork, RICHARD BOYLE, 1ST EARL OF (b. 1666, d. 1645), the son of a Herefordshire gentleman, went to Dublin about 1588, and acquired large landed properties in Ireland. Having gained the favour of Queen Elizabeth, he was specially recommended to the notice of Sir George Carew, Lord-President of Munster, and was much employed by him. In 1612 he was made a Privy Councillor of Ireland; in 1616 raised to the peerage as Lord Boyle; and in 1620 made Earl of Cork. In 1629 he was made one of the Lords-Justices, and two years later Lord Treasurer of Ireland, in which position he quarrelled violently with Strafford. At the beginning of the Rebellion he raised a large body of horse for the royal service.

Cornavii, or CORNURII, THE, were an ancient British tribe, inhabiting the modern counties of Warwick, Worcester, Stafford, Salop, and Chester. They are reckoned by Mr. Rhys to have been of the Brythonic, and not of the Goidelic, stock. [CELTS.]

Cornbury, EDWARD, VISCOUNT (afterwards Earl of Clarendon), was the son of Henry, Lord Clarendon, brother of the Earl of Rochester. On the landing of the Prince of Orange, he led three regiments from Salisbury over to William's side; but, finding he could not completely accomplish this act of treachery, stole to the prince's quarters with a few followers. His signature, together with that of several other leading men, was appended to a forged association in favour of James by William Young, the Jacobite informer, but nothing could be proved against him (1692). He was subsequently Governor of New York for six years, a post in which he displayed great incapacity. He is said upon one occasion to have dressed as a woman in order to represent the queen.

Cornelis, THE CAPTURE OF (Aug., 1811), was effected during the war of the French Revolution. Cornelis, in Java, was an entrenched camp between two rivers, one of which was not fordable, and the other was defended by extremely formidable redoubts and batteries. It was resolved to carry it by a coup de main, and Colonel Gillespie was selected for that purpose. On Aug. 26, his column reached the redoubt at dawn, and, feeling that delay would be dangerous, he did not wait for his rear division, but attacked at once, and carried the redoubt with the bayonet. Seizing the bridge, he attacked and captured a second redoubt, and with his full force vigorously assaulted the enemy's reserve, which was posted with powerful artillery in front of the barracks and lesser fort. They broke and fled, and the place fell into the hands of the English.

Corn Laws is the name generally given to the various Acts of Parliament regulating the exportation and importation of grain, and especially wheat. They have been passed with two objects, which have prevailed to a different extent at different times: to secure a plentiful supply of cheap corn at home, and to keep up the price of corn produced in England. There have also been laws to regulate the traffic in corn by the corn dealers, and to prevent the practices called engrossing, forestalling, and regrating; and occasionally, as in the reign of Henry VI., exportation of corn has been absolutely prohibited. Importation was practically free till the reign of Queen Elizabeth, but very little corn was imported. An entirely new system was adopted on the accession of William III. In the supposed interests of agriculture and of the landowners, the exportation of corn was not only permitted, but encouraged by bounties. This legislation did not have the effect which was expected, and the price of corn continued to be very low. When, after the Peace of Paris, in 1763, the commerce and manufactures of the kingdom largely increased, and when the increase was coincident with a growth of population, the export of corn diminished, and the restrictions on imports were felt as a hardship. This led to Burke's Act of 1773, by which foreign wheat was allowed to be imported at a nominal duty of 6d. whenever the home price was at or above 48s. a quarter, and the bounty and the exportation were together to cease when the price was at or above 44s. Corn might be imported, at any price, duty free, in order to be again exported. This Act led to a large importation of corn, which did no injury to the agricultural interests, but only served to maintain the increasing manufacturing population. At this time, also, large quantities of waste land were taken into cultivation, without any fall of agricultural prices. In 1791, under the pressure of the landed interest, the law of 1773 was repealed, and there was substituted for it an arrangement by which a limit of 54s. for importation, at 6d. a quarter, was substituted for 46s.; between 54s. and 50s. there was a middle duty of 2s. 6d. a quarter, and below 50s. a prohibitive duty. The bounty was continued as before, and exportation without bounty was allowed to 46s. In 1804 a new law, passed at the bidding of the farmers, imposed a prohibitory duty on all wheat imported, when the price was 63s., a middle duty of 2s. 6d. between 63s. and 66s., and a nominal duty of 6d. above 66s. In 1815 the limit of the price for importation was fixed at 60s. It was hoped that this regulation would maintain the price of wheat at about the same standard; but still greater fluctuations followed. The effect of this legislation was to raise the price of corn very largely, and to force a wide extent of land into arable cultivation which was not suited for it. Another Act was passed in 1822, intended to lessen the disastrous effects of the Act of 1815; but it never came into operation. The attempt to regulate the price of corn by Act of Parliament was so disastrous that the Council was authorised to issue orders to suspend the operation of the Acts, and to permit the importation of foreign corn under circumstances of necessity. This fact, with others, gradually convinced agriculturists that the Corn Laws were based on a mistaken principle; and in 1827 Canning carried resolutions in the House of Commons pointing to a more liberal policy. A bill, founded on these resolutions, passed the Lower House; but, owing to the change of ministry and the opposition of the Duke of Wellington, the bill was given up. Mr. Charles Grant, in 1828, carried resolutions similar to those of Mr. Canning, and they eventually became law. The grievance of the Corn Laws was always found to vary with the prosperity of the seasons, and the bad seasons which followed each other from 1837 to 1842 gave rise to the agitation by which the Corn Laws were abolished altogether. In 1842 a measure was introduced by Sir Robert Peel which still maintained the vicious principle of a sliding-scale of duties, although the scale was less onerous than those which preceded it. This did not diminish the agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws, and the argument of the repealers was strengthened by the fact that the alteration of the tariff in 1842, which allowed the importation of live cattle and fresh provisions, did not affect the price of these articles to the disastrous extent which had been anticipated by the agriculturists. In 1843 the principle of the Corn Laws was virtually abandoned, by allowing corn to be imported from Canada at a very small duty. It was now possible to import corn from America through Canada, and therefore there seemed to be no reason why direct importation from America should not be allowed. In his budget of 1845, Sir R. Peel abolished the duties on 430 articles out of 813 then taxed. This was a virtual abandonment of the principle of protection. In the same year the harvest was very bad, and the potato crop in Ireland failed entirely. It was then impossible to avoid the temporary suspension of the Corn Laws, and it was a question whether it was not better to abolish them altogether. The country was deluged with the free trade tracts of the Anti-Corn-Law League. Sir R. Peel was convinced that protection was no longer tenable; but his cabinet would not follow him. Lord Stanley resigned, and the ministry broke up. Lord J. Russell was unable to form a cabinet, and Sir R. Peel was induced to take office again. It was known that he would meet Parliament in 1846 pledged to support the cause of free trade. The agitation for the repeal of the Corn Laws had begun in Manchester towards the end of 1836. In a season of financial pressure, it appeared to some of the most influential manufacturers of that thriving town that the only remedy for the evil lay in free trade, and that by artificially keeping up the price of corn the manufacturing interests of the country were sacrificed to the supposed benefit of the agricultural interests. The year afterwards the Anti-Corn-Law League was formed. Among its most prominent members from the first were Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, who in a great measure sacrificed their worldly prosperity to the work of converting their countrymen to their principles. Large sums of money were collected for the purposes of the League. A Free Trade Hall was built in Manchester. In 1843 the Lords acknowledged that the League was a great fact, and compared it to the wooden horse by which the Greeks were secretly brought within the walls of Troy. At the end of 1845 it was stronger than ever in men, money, and enthusiasm. When Parliament assembled in 1846, the Queen's Speech and the Address in reply to it gave indication of the coming change. Sir R. Peel rose immediately afterwards, and avowed honestly the alteration in his opinion. He said that he had observed during the last three years (1) that wages do not vary with the price of food, and that with high prices you do not necessarily have high wages; (2) that employment, high wages, and abundance contribute directly to the diminution of crime; (3) that by the gradual removal of protection, industry had been promoted and morality improved. Mr. Disraeli took the opportunity of violently assailing the minister for his change of opinion. In February, Sir R. Peel announced a fixed duty on corn for three years, and after that its entire abolition. The free traders attempted to get rid of this delay; but they were beaten by a large majority, and the bill passed. There was a fear lest it might be rejected in the House of Lords, but the Duke of Wellington secured its passing in that assembly. The free trade in corn which followed the repeal of the Corn Laws has been so complete a success, and has become so indispensable to the country in the growth of population, that there can be little chance of their revival.

Cornwallis, CHARLES, 1ST MARQUIS (b. 1738, d. 1805), entered the army at an early age, and served under the Marquis of Granby in 1761. He entered Parliament for Eye, and was appointed Governor of the Tower in 1770. He served in the American War of Independence, and won much distinction at the battle of Brandywine, and the siege of Charleston. He was appointed to the command of the British forces in South Carolina, and in 1780 won the victory of Camden over Gates, the following year defeating Greene at Guildford. In 1782, blockaded at Yorktown by the American army and the French fleet, he was forced to surrender. A violent controversy took place on his return, between Cornwallis and Sir Henry Clinton, as to the party deserving of blame for the disaster. In 1786 he went to India as Governor-General, and Commander-in-chief of the Bengal army. His administration lasted from 1786 to 1793, and is remarkable for the Mysore War; the arrangements with Oude, Arcot, and the Nizam; the negotiations with Scindiah and the Mahrattas; the Permanent Settlement; and a series of important judicial and revenue reforms. In 1790 Tippoo's attack on Travancore caused Lord Cornwallis to conclude the Triple Alliance with the Mahrattas and the Nizam, and the campaign began on the Malabar and Coromandel coasts. In 1791 Lord Cornwallis determined to take the command himself, and marched straight to Bangalore, which he captured March 21. Tippoo had hastened back to defend his capital. The Nizam's force and the Mahrattas were wasting their time in sieges in the north. On May 13, 1791, was fought the battle of Arikera, in which Tippoo was beaten. In March, 1792, the Treaty of Seringapatam was signed, ending the war, and leaving Tippoo with reduced territory and prestige. As an administrator, Lord Cornwallis devoted himself to the correction of abuses. He increased the salaries of the public servants in order to give them the possibility of acquiring a competence by economy, and made war on all frauds and speculation. On his return to England he was employed in 1794 as a diplomatist in Flanders, and carried on fruitless negotiations with the emperor at Brussels. In 1795 he was appointed Master-General of the Ordnance. In 1798 he was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland during the violence of the Irish rebellion. In 1801 he returned to England, and was selected as the British plenipotentiary to negotiate the Peace of Amiens. On July 30, 1805, he arrived in India as Governor-General, pledged to reverse the policy of Lord Wellesley. His avowed policy was to end the war; to break up the system of subsidiary alliances; and to bribe the minor princes of Hindostan to give up their alliance with us by resigning to them jaghires out of the lands south and west of Delhi. In spite of the remonstrances of Lord Lake he proceeded up the Ganges with the intention of carrying this plan out, but his health failed rapidly. He resigned the government to the senior member of the council, Sir George Barlow, and died at Ghazepore, Oct. 5, 1805.

Coromandel Coast. The popular name applied to the east coast of the Deccan. It is supposed to be a corruption of Cholamandalay, in the region of the ancient Chola dynasty. The Coromandel coast extends from Cape Calimere to the mouth of the Kistnah, and is within the territory of the Madras presidency.

Coronation. This rite is of great antiquity. In England it seems to have been in general use, even before the union of the several kingdoms; and a coronation service of uncertain date, but as old at least as the eighth century, is still extant. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle represents Offa's son, Egfrith, as having been "hallowed to king" in 785. In the same authority we find distinct records of the consecration of Edgar, Ethelred II., Edward the Confessor, and Harold II., to the kingly office with the same rite. And the two essential parts of the ceremony, the placing of the crown on the king's head, and the anointing, had then been fully established; but to neither had any exceptional sacredness been yet assigned; at most they were but symbols of the divine approval of the choice the people had made. The ritual used at Ethelred II.'s coronation has survived, and contains both these and the form of oath taken by the king. By this he promised three things—to hold God's Church and the realm in peace, to forbid rapine and injustice, and to judge justly and mercifully. The place varied; though generally Kingston-on-Thames, in Edgar's case it was Bath, and in Edward's Winchester. Since the coronation of Harold, however, it has been the abbey church at Westminster.

With differences of detail the ceremonial has not materially changed since the Conquest. The form of asking the clergy and people present for their voices, lasted till Henry VIII.'s time; but is now a mere presentation of the sovereign to the spectators. The chief variations have been in the oath. Till 1308

this pledged three things only—peace and reverence to God and Holy Church, justice to the people, and the removal of bad and upholding of good laws. But at Edward II.'s coronation it became more comprehensive and precise, and took the form of question and answer. Besides the three things above mentioned, the king promised to keep and defend "the laws and righteous customs which the community of the realm should have chosen." For centuries no vital alteration was made in the body of the oath, though liberties were taken in Tudor and Stuart days with its wording.

The existing form was settled at the Revolution of 1688. By it the sovereign undertakes (1) to govern "according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on," (2) to cause "justice in mercy to be executed," and (3) to maintain "the Protestant reformed religion established by law." It follows the declaration against transubstantiation deemed necessary to prove that the sovereign is not a Roman Catholic.

This ceremony has long lost its importance. Once it marked the beginning of the new reign. It afterwards came to be regarded as giving the king a sacred character, making him the Lord's anointed, against whose authority it was an impiety to raise one's hand. But it is now a mere pageant.

Coroner, an official first appointed by Richard I. in 1194, had originally very considerable powers. He was elected by the shire, and was to keep the pleas of the crown in the place of the sheriff. By 3 Ed. I., c. 10, the coroner is required to be of the status of a knight, and to hold inquests in cases of sudden death, and by 14 Ed. III., c. 8, he is required to hold land in fee. By the 28 Ed. III., c. 6, their election was to be made by the freeholders assembled in the county court, in the same manner as that of the sheriffs. The power of the coroner to hear cases of felony was abolished by Magna Charta, § 17, and the functions of holding inquests in cases of violent or sudden death expressly confirmed by the statute 4 Ed. I., c. 2, called, De Officio Coronatoris. Gradually the coroner lost all his other duties except that of taking inquisitions of death. The position and election of coroners have been regulated by several statutes in recent times. By the Municipal Reform Act of 1835, coroners were appointed to boroughs as well as counties.

Corporation Act. THE (1661), was passed by the first Parliament of Charles II., with the intention of destroying the power of the Dissenters in the towns. By this statute it was enacted that all officers of corporations should take the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England, within twelve months of their election to office; and on their election should take the oaths of supremacy, allegiance, and non-resistance, and abjure the Solemn League and Covenant. The Corporation Act was repealed in 1828, though long before that date it had become a dead letter.

Corporations, or bodies corporate, formed for the continual maintenance and enjoyment of certain privileges, or the holding of certain property in perpetuity, are of two kinds:—(a) Corporations sole, which consist of one person, such as the king or a bishop, who in the eye of the law never die; and (b) Corporations aggregate, which consist of a number of persons so bound together as to be by law considered as one individual, and which by the constant introduction of fresh members have a continuous existence. Both sole and aggregate corporations are divided into ecclesiastical and lay. The former division comprised such corporations as a bishop, or the chaplain of a cathedral, and the latter being again sub-divided into (a) civil corporations, such as the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham; the municipal corporations, and private corporations of the nature of joint-stock companies; and (b) eleemosynary corporations, which are charged with the duty of administering the bounty of the founder, as in the case of the various colleges at the universities, and the hospitals. [MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.]

Corriehe, THE BATTLE OF (1662), was fought near Aberdeen between the forces of Mary Queen of Scots, led by Murray, and some Highlanders, headed by the rebellious Earl of Huntly. Huntly was killed, and his son, Sir John Gordon, captured and executed.

Corshed was a species of ordeal in which the accused had to swallow a large piece of bread or cheese. If this were performed freely and without hurt, the accused was pronounced innocent; but if it stuck in his throat, guilty. With the introduction of Christianity, the host was used for this purpose. [ORDEAL.]

Corunna, THE BATTLE OF (Jan. 16, 1809), between the English and French, was fought during the Peninsular War at the close of Sir John Moore's retreat from Madrid, pursued by Soult. After a march in which the severity of the elements and neglect of discipline were more disastrous to the troops than the pursuit of the French, Moore, on Jan. 11, took up a position round the town of Corunna, and, having occupied the road to Santiago de Compostella with his best troops, awaited the arrival of the English transports from Vigo. On the 14th the ships anchored in the bay, and before daybreak on the 16th the cavalry (the ground being impracticable for cavalry operations), the sick and wounded, and all but nine pieces of artillery, had been embarked. Soult had 20,000 infantry and cavalry, and a strong force of artillery, while Moore had only 14,500 infantry. The battle was begun with a fierce attack by the French on the village of Elvina, which they carried, only, however, to be in turn driven out by General Baird's division. While the battle was still doubtful, Moore ordered up the reserve, under General Paget, to oppose a flank movement directed against the English right. This was most successfully effected; and almost simultaneously the whole of the British line began to gain ground, until at nightfall they had everywhere driven the French from their positions. During the following night a retreat was effected to the shore, and the embarkation of the troops was carried out with but little loss. In the battle the English were said to have lost 800 men, including their brave general, Sir John Moore; the French, between 3,000 and 4,000.

Napier, Peninsular War.

Coshery was an ancient Irish custom, by which the chief had the right of using the houses and taking the provisions of his tenantry for himself and following at his own discretion. The Norman barons, not unnaturally, adopted so advantageous a custom. After the final confiscation of Irish land by Cromwell, the descendants of the ancient chiefs long led a precarious existence by such means, and numerous statutes failed to put a stop to it.

Cottenham, CHARLES CHRISTOPHER PEPPYS, 1ST EARL OF (b. 1781, d. 1851), the second son of Sir William Pepys, was called to the bar 1804. He was appointed solicitor-general to Queen Adelaide in 1830, and solicitor-general to the king in 1834. In 1831 he was returned to Parliament for Higham Ferrers. In 1834 he became Master of the Rolls, and in 1835 one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal, the Whigs not being prepared with a Chancellor in whom they could confide. In 1836 he became Lord Chancellor, and continued in this office till 1841. In 1846, on the return of the Whigs to power, Lord Cottenham again became Chancellor; but his health was bad, and in 1850 he received an earldom, and the Great Seal was put in commission.

Cotter, JAMES (b. 1690, d. 1719), the son of Sir James Cotter, a distinguished supporter of James II., was, in spite of the Irish Court of Chancery, brought up as a Catholic in England. In 1713 he headed an attack on the Protestant voters in Dublin. He was the idol of the Irish Jacobites; and his execution for rape in 1719 brought about a savage persecution of the Quakers, who had been instrumental in securing his punishment.

Cottingham, FRANCIS, LORD (b. 1576, d. 1653), of a Somersetshire family, was for many years one of the English diplomatic agents at Madrid. He accompanied Prince Charles to Spain, took part in negotiating the marriage treaty, and lost the favour of his patron, Buckingham, by supporting it. In 1628 he was created a baronet and privy councillor. In the following year he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, and sent as ambassador to Spain, and concluded a treaty which developed (Jan. 2, 1631) into an agreement for the partition of Holland. On his return he was raised to the peerage, and became, in 1635, Master of the Court of Wards. Clarendon describes him as Laud's chief opponent in the Council. To avoid impeachment by the Long Parliament for his share in the fiscal oppressions of the previous ten years, he resigned both his offices. During the Civil War he sided with the king, and, in consequence, took refuge in France. In 1652 he was appointed, together with Clarendon, ambassador to Madrid, and died, in 1653, at Valladolid. During his first stay in Spain he turned Roman Catholic, reverted to Protestantism on his return to England, and became a Catholic again in 1652. Clarendon praises his self-control and power of dissimulation. Mr. Gardiner calls him, "a man of the world without enthusiasm."

Cotton, BARTHOLOMEW DE, was a monk of Norwich, who wrote a Chronicle of England from the arrival of the Saxons to the year 1298, about which time he died. The latter portion of this history is of great value, as the writer was contemporary with the events which he records. This Chronicle, edited by Mr. Luard, has been published in the Rolls Series.

Cotton, SIR JOHN HINDE, was one of the small band of Jacobite politicians who formed part of the Opposition to Sir Robert Walpole's ministry in the reign of George II. In 1740, when the Jacobites were concocting one of their usual plots, we find him described as "doubtful of others, but answering clearly for himself;" and he arranged to remain in London as the channel of communication with James's friends. In 1742, after the fall of Walpole, his appointment to the Admiralty Board was pressed by the Duke of Argyle, but the king absolutely refused to raise him to that office. In 1744, however, in spite of the reluctance of George, he was taken into the administration. In 1745, the French minister, Cardinal Tencin, a friend of the Stuarts, demanded that as a pledge of his sincerity he should resign office, but this he declined to do. He was, however, soon afterwards dismissed, and continued to lead a small body of Jacobites in the Lower House.

Cotton, SIR ROBERT (b. 1570, d. 1631), was a distinguished antiquary and collector of manuscripts. He assisted Camden (q.v.) in his labours on the Britannia. On the accession of James I. he was knighted, and frequently consulted by the Privy Council on constitutional points. He was one of those who suggested to James I. the idea of creating baronets, and was himself raised to this rank in 1611. Sir Robert wrote numerous antiquarian tracts and pamphlets. But his chief title to remembrance is due to the magnificent manuscript library he collected, which passed to his heir intact, and was acquired by the nation in 1706. After being partly destroyed by fire in 1731, it was placed in the British Museum in 1757.

Cotton, SIR WILLOUGHBY, was commander-in-chief in Jamaica during the slave rebellion of 1831—32. The insurrection was crushed owing to his promptness of action, whilst his leniency to the offenders was in marked contrast to the unwarrantable cruelty with which the negroes were usually treated. His clemency drew upon him the hatred of the planters.

Cotton Famine, THE, 1862. The outbreak of the American Civil War, which was followed by a total blockade of the Confederate coast, was productive of very disastrous results in England. The cotton supply, on the manufacture of which the greater part of the Lancashire operatives depended for a livelihood, failed, and in consequence the Lancashire mill-owners began to work short time, and finally to close the mills entirely. A certain amount of work was kept up and many large fortunes were made by running the blockade of the Confederate ports and bringing out cotton; but the general result was that two millions of people were to a great extent reduced to destitution. The Cotton District Relief Fund was started in July, 1862, and nearly two millions were subscribed within a twelvemonth. By the Relief Act passed in Aug., 1862, loans were granted to the guardians of the poor for the purpose of instituting relief works. The famine came to an end in the summer of 1865.

Councils, CIVIL.

(1) THE NATIONAL COUNCIL. (a) In Anglo-Saxon Times. The Witenagemot. The more primitive German tribes had no kings, and the supreme authority resided either in temporary magistrates or the national council of all freemen that met periodically to discuss all matters of great importance. When monarchy became universal, this council became the adviser and controller of the king. In the Campus Martius, or Madius of the Frank monarchy, we see its continued survival until it gradually disappeared through feudal influence. In England its history was different. In the original kingdoms of the migration, a democratic assembly of the freemen, such as still exists in the forest cantons of Switzerland (see Freeman, Eng. Const., chap. i.), certainly existed. But when the "heptarchic" states were consolidated to form larger kingdoms, no consolidation of the popular assembly followed. The "greater council" of Tacitus, the Campus Martius of the Franks, was only continued in the Shiremot, the highest folk-moot of the English previous to the establishment of a representative House of Commons. But the idea of a national assembly lived on in the gathering of magnates, which was consolidated in proportion as the kingdom was consolidated. Similarly with Wessex, and when the West Saxon monarchs became kings of all the English, they gathered together the wise men of all the land into their Great Council or Witenagemot. [For the details of the constitution, power, origin, and activity of the Witenagemot, the reader is referred to the article under that head.] It is enough to observe here that it was composed of the chief ecclesiastical and temporal magnates of the kingdom, that the functions of the Witan were almost co-ordinate with those of the king, and supreme on the vacancy of the throne by death. They were the Parliament, Senate, Privy Council, Supreme Court of Justice, Civil Service, and Cabinet in one. Their powers were legislative, judicial, deliberative, taxative, and executive. Though in practice a council of officials, it remained in idea the council of the nation, virtually represented by their natural leaders. But of direct popular representation there is no trace.

(b) In Norman Times. The Great Council. The accession of William I. produced no sudden revolution in the constitution of the national council. The Great Council of the Norman reigns was in most respects a continuation of the Witenagemot. But feudal influence, the analogy of the council of Normandy, and the changed condition of the country, soon produced a gradual feudalisation of the whole institution—which, although not completed before the reign of Henry II., gradually more and more obscured the old official character of the assemblage. Yet the national idea lived on. The convocation in 1086 and 1116 of Great Councils of all the landowners, of whomsoever they held land, is a striking instance of this. The gradual change of theory was obscured by the fact that the members of the assembly were the same as before the Conquest, though bishop and earl sat now as holders of great fiefs immediately under the crown just as much as in their official capacity of magnates. But the practical change was greater than the theoretical. Nominally possessed of all the prerogatives of the Wise Men before the Conquest, their power became very formal in the presence of such monarchs as William and his sons, to whose practical despotism revolt in arms rather than opposition in council was the appropriate check. Moreover the increasing sanctity which environed the monarch deprived the national council of the last vestiges of that unique position which made the earlier Anglo-Saxon monarchs little more in theory than chairmen of a Board.

(c) In Angevin Times. The Feudal Council of Henry II. Under Henry II. the change in the theory of the constitution of the national council became complete. The accepted usage of his reign was to summon the whole body of the tenants in chief to the council. But the ordinary form of the council was, doubtless, much the same as in the earlier period. Except on special occasions none but the magnates, the bishops, earls, and royal officers, the "greater barons," were likely to attend. We learn from Magna Charta that the "greater barons" alone received special summonses addressed to them individually on each occasion that the council met. A general writ addressed to the sheriff of each county summoned the "lesser barons" to these assemblies, and their attendance was generally nominal. The Angevin council thus became a regularly organised feudal assembly. But the powers of the Great Council could not but have been unfavourably influenced by the change. In becoming feudal it ceased to be national. Even the small place left by the administrative system of Henry II. for external checks could not be satisfactorily filled up by a body out of relation with a people who rather reposed confidence in the crown, and which was representative mainly of the crushed baronial party which Henry had subdued. Still, its formal consent was invariably given to Henry's great legislative and executive measures. We even hear of resistance to the royal will, of which in Anglo-Saxon times there is no record. But the most prejudicial influence on the immediate future of the council was the development of new and more efficient consultative bodies out of the administrative system which centred round the Curia Regis (q.v.). Thus under Henry II., the national council tended to become baronial merely, and was superseded in many of its functions by a royal council.

Yet the absence of a more adequate representation of the nation lent a good deal of national character even to this feudal council. Such an assembly gave us Magna Charta, and so well did the baronage fulfil their new part of national representation that throughout Henry III.'s reign an opposition at once popular and baronial found in it its appropriate mouthpiece. But the gradual growth of a directly representative Parliament brought the old council into comparative disuse. Edward I.'s completion of the parliamentary system at once annihilated the political importance of feudalism and of the feudal Great Council. Superseded as a national assembly by Parliament, and as a consultative and executive body by the royal council, the Great Council remained as a survival throughout the Middle Ages. Often it was hardly to be distinguished from a Parliament, as for example, the council which sanctioned so many of Edward I.'s laws. Often it was no more than an "afforded" assembly of the "Concilium ordinarium," strengthened for important business by the addition of spiritual and temporal magnates, and other "wise men," selected at discretion. Such an assembly was not uncommon in the fourteenth and early part of the fifteenth centuries (e.g., in 1379), and Richard II.'s evil councillors were accused of inducing the king to summon councils composed of certain lords without the assent or presence of the "Lords of the Great Council." But these assemblies may largely be regarded as attempts to bridge over the distinction between the Royal Council and the Council of the nation, and give to the former body that prestige which historical continuity and full baronial support could in a large measure afford. No such assembly was convoked in Tudor times, and Charles I.'s summons of a Great Council at York in 1640 was the last instance of its being called together.

(2) THE ROYAL COUNCIL. Besides the Great Council, or the Common Council of the nation, there must have existed, as soon as organised government began, a smaller council of the royal ministers and confidants, by whose advice and co-operation the government was carried on. The small numbers generally attending the Witenagemot before the Conquest, and the lack of definite centralised authority, make this assembly very hard to discern in Anglo-Saxon times: but with the reigns of the sons of William I., the Curia Regis (q.v.) comes into importance; and from this general court there gradually developed by a process of differentiation not only the courts of judicature, but also the organised Royal Council of the Middle Ages. The exact relation of the Curia Regis to the national great council is not clear, but it is improbable that they were entirely separate organisations. Thus in a sense the Royal Council was a specialised form of the Great Council.

The active despotism of the Norman and Angevin kings, while reducing the national council to a form, greatly stimulated the growth of the Royal Council: for when the king had so much on his hands he must have the help of clerks and ministers, who always tended to become his advisers. The existence of such a Royal Council is dimly foreshadowed by the act of Henry II. in 1178, when that monarch reserved the decision of knotty judicial or financial cases to a small circle of "sapientes," or councillors. But under Henry II. we have the merest reference to its action—none to its constitution or powers. The personal retinue of Richard II., the foreign councillors of John, may well have been organised in a similar body; but it is not until the minority of Henry III. that the real history of the Royal Council begins. The Regent, the legate, the great officers of state constituted that "supremum concilium," traces of whose activity are to be discerned in every department of government. In this body the hated foreign courtiers exercised their influence. Against it the Great Council of the realm fought with increasing success. Thrice oaths were imposed on this Council and baronial nominees added to it; but it continued to maintain its existence through the crisis, and after acting as a practical Council of Regency during Edward I.'s absence in Palestine, received from that king definition and organisation.

The special characteristic of the Royal Council was its permanence. It was always sitting, always occupied in the continuous business of the court. Its usual name was the "Concilium perpetuum," or "Concilium ordinarium," in opposition to the "Concilium commune," or "Concilium magnum" of the nation, already discussed. Besides its constant sessions for executive business, it held terminal sittings to help the king in receiving petitions and hearing suits. Its functions were so wide as to be practically incapable of definition. Nothing was too great, nothing was too small to escape its interference. It advised the king, executed his resolutions, shared in his judicial and appellate powers. The ordinary members of the Council were—the chief ministers, the judges, some of the bishops and barons, and a few other royal confidants summoned by royal writ, and bound by a solemn oath of office.

The power of the Royal Council was always growing; but it acquired a special prominence during the weak reign of Richard II.; and it is from the history of the fifteenth century that we can first get a really clear and definite idea of the functions of a body whose whole previous history it is impossible to trace but obscurely. Under Richard II. and the Lancastrians the Royal Council, the engine and mouthpiece of the prerogative, gradually begins to subvert constitutional ends. The strong and organised parties of the time are represented upon it. Parliament asserts control over it, and the recognition by the Lancastrian monarchs of the right of Parliament to nominate its members is a remarkable anticipation of the cabinet government of modern times. In 1406 Parliament protest their great regard for the "Lords of the continuous Council," in language almost anticipating a vote of confidence in a modern ministry. In turns caressed by king and Parliament, the "Privy Council," as it now began to be called—though it is possible that the Privy Council was in its origin an inner and secret committee of the ordinary Council—acquired more and more authority. Under Henry VI. it became a virtual Council of Regency, and its members practically held the royal authority in commission. This enhanced their authority, but broke their connection with Parliament. After 1437 the king resumed absolute power of nomination. Efforts to remedy this state of things led to no result: and under Edward IV. and the Tudors, it assumed the character of an "irresponsible committee of government," the agent of the prerogative, and the representative of the royal pleasure. It sent forth outshoots, such as its judicial committee, the Star Chamber; and many of the anomalous councils that in the sixteenth century withdrew half England from the cognisance of the common law were in close relation to it. The temporising policy of a Henry VIII. and an Elizabeth, which allowed some divergence of opinion amongst its supporters, kept up at least the semblance of government by discussion. Its elaborate organisation into committees under Edward VI. illustrates the width of its ramifications.

The Privy Council having attained the height of its power, it will be convenient to summarise its functions. The great variety and extent of its activity has already been noticed. Its claim in 1427 "to have the execution of all the powers of the crown during the king's minority needs only," says Dr. Stubbs, "to be slightly altered to make it applicable to their perpetual functions." The only limit to their usurpations was the common law; and this, while but partly confining their judicial activity, left the whole field of general politics open to their aggressions. They had a very large share in all executive business. Their power of passing ordinances (q.v.) gave them a practical share in legislation; and the confidence, indifference or impotence of Parliament allowed them taxative functions of the greatest importance. They lent money to the king on their own security, or used their influence over rich lords or merchants to negotiate loans. Sometimes they got direct authority from Parliament to levy taxes, sometimes, especially during the sixteenth century, they did so of their own authority. Wherever no positive law checked them they pushed their way. Even in judicial matters, despite the common law and the jurisdiction of the Chancery, they were still, as in 1178, the advisers of the crown on knotty points, and the arbiters of private disputes.

Rigorous under the Tudors, the powers of the Council became oppressive under the Stuarts; but besides the ever-increasing parliamentary check, the tendency of the Council to become unwieldy, by the inclusion of a very large number of nobles and officials, led to a habit of transacting great secrets of state in an unauthorised and informal cabal, or group of "cabin counsellors;" a system which was complained of early in the seventeenth century, and accepted unwillingly towards its end. The Cabal of 1667, though in profession a committee of the Privy Council for foreign affairs, was practically an anticipation of the modern Cabinet. Sir William Temple's plan of reform in 1679 proved abortive, and the definite recognition of Cabinet [CABINET] government by William III., made the Privy Council again a constitutional check, that conservatives desired to maintain in power as a safeguard against the new-fangled and illegal ministerial assembly. The Act of Settlement of 1701 contains several clauses which tried to effect the restoration of the Privy Council to its old constitutional position under the Plantagenets and Tudors; but they had little result. The Council remained as it does to this day a body of great dignity and importance, into which all statesmen of position were formally admitted, and whose members were distinguished by the appellation of Right Honourable. But the nature of its composition, and its unwieldy dimensions, prevented its being generally summoned as a whole for the transaction of general business. Councils in the presence of Royalty are still constantly held, but they consist of a very few councillors, and transact formal business. The Privy Council Office exercises the functions of a department of the executive. The President and Vice-President of the Council are important ministers. Recent legislation has given special powers to these officers or the Judicial Committee of the Council. New business, such as the ever-increasing state regulation of education, is put into its hands, and the Vice-President is practically Education Minister. But as a whole and as a deliberative assembly, the Privy Council is practically obsolete.

(3) LOCAL COUNCILS. Besides the above, councils were appointed at various times in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries to govern parts of the kingdom remote from the centre of authority, or imperfectly united to it. They were modelled generally on the Privy Council, both in constitution and functions, and often exercised a jurisdiction of certain oppressiveness and doubtful legality. Such were the Council of Wales and the Marches, established by Edward IV. in 1478, at Ludlow, to govern the southern and border districts of Wales, which until then had uncontrolled enjoyment of Palatine privileges. This court, though losing its chief reason for existence when Henry VIII. incorporated Wales with England, and, limited in its jurisdiction in 1640, was not abolished until the 5th of William and Mary. Similar was the Council of the North, established at York after the revolt of 1569, famous through Strafford's tenure of the presidency, and abolished with similar councils in the first session of the Long Parliament. The Council of Calais was of older foundation, and continued until the loss of that town under Queen Mary. The Stannaries Court, which extended its special function of governing the estate of the Duchy of Cornwall, and superintending the mines there, to general business, and had become one of the most oppressive engines of prerogative, was at the same time deprived of its capacity for aggression. The Council of the Palatinates of Chester, Lancashire, &c., were mere continuations of the old feudal courts of these franchises, continued after their incorporation with the crown, and administered with such regard for the prerogative, that, like the other courts mentioned, they attracted the notice of the Long Parliament.

The whole subject of councils is one of exceptional difficulty and obscurity. The chief authorities include, Stubbs, Const. Hist.; Guizot, Englische Verfassungsgeschichte und Verwaltungsgeschichte; Palgrave, Essay on the King's Council; Dicey, Essay on the Prerogative Council; Nicholas, Proceedings of the Privy Council; and for the local councils, the various county histories, &c.

[T. F. T.]

Council of State was the name given to the assembly elscoted on Feb. 14, 1649, immediately after Charles I.'s execution. It received a combination of military, diplomatic, police, and judicial powers that in the aggregate gave it a greater control over the State and a wider exercise of executive power than the kings had ever had. Appointed by the "Rump," and representing their views, the Council of State was dissolved by Cromwell immediately after his coup d'état against the Parliament. Their successful conduct of the Dutch War attests the vigour of their government. A new Council of State was established in 1659, as the successor to the temporary "Committee of Safety" in the exercise of the executive power; but on the second expulsion of the Rump by Lambert it gave way to the more famous "Committee of Safety," which acted as the mouthpiece of the army. The army scheme for the permanent government included a Council of State that never sat. Revived again when Monk restored the Rump, it naturally found no place when the Restoration brought back the old Constitution.

Councils, ECCLESIASTICAL, are of the following kinds:—

(1) GENERAL, or ECUMENICAL COUNCILS,—i.e., assemblies of the Catholic Church from every nation. To these, bishops from Britain were sent from the time of the Council of Arles in the fourth century to the Councils of Constance and Basel in the fifteenth. Their decrees were accepted in England as a part of the law of the Church, though in later times, as the case of the Council of Basel shows, hardly without some ratification from the royal authority. The greatest interest was at various times shown by the English

Church in these councils, and their acts often profoundly affected the course of English history. But their influence is too indirect to necessitate any detailed treatment of it in a work on English history.

(2) NATIONAL COUNCILS. Of the details of the history of the pre-English British Church we know little; but when Archbishop Theodore completed the systematic organisation of the English Church that the failure of Augustine's mission necessitated, one of his chief cares was to arrange for the assembling every August of a council of the whole Church over which he was metropolitan. The councils of Hertford and Hatfield, in which most of his reforms were arranged, were themselves precedents for the future action of the Church. These councils can only by anticipation be called national, for as yet the English nation was not in existence, but they exerted a most beneficial influence on the development of national unity by habituating subjects of hostile but neighbouring states to meet under the peace of the Church to discuss amicably matters of common interest. Their common place of meeting was some border town such as Clovesho, an unknown spot near London, where Mercia, Wessex, Kent, and Essex met together at a point. They were constituted mostly of bishops, though abbots often, and diocesan clergy once, figure among the members; and, as the line between Church and State was as yet but slackly drawn, kings, ealdormen, and other temporal magnates frequently attended them. But the assertion of the independence of the archbishopric of York by Archbishop Egberht, created a jealousy between that see and Canterbury that made these national councils, which had never met with the regularity prescribed by Theodore, very few in number. They practically ceased with the decline of all conciliar activity in the tenth century; and though revived after the Conquest, when a papal legate could summon a national council with an authority which neither archbishop could gainsay, the vindication of the archiepiscopal powers of the see of York by Thurstan revived the old jealousy that made the union of both provinces in a common assembly ridiculous or abortive. The legate councils of Otto in 1237, and Ottobon in 1268, are the chief later exceptions to this rule.

(3) PROVINCIAL COUNCILS.—The rarity and practical cessation of national councils left room for the full development of the synods of the two provinces of Canterbury and York; even if the comparative unimportance of the northern province did not often invest the councils of the southern with a practically national character. The thirteenth century saw the completion of the systematic representation of the provincial synods, to which the name Convocation (q.v.) became gradually applied. They play an important part in both the ecclesiastical and civil history of England.

(4) DIOCESAN COUNCILS, which were exhaustive assemblies of the clergy of the individual sees, were occasionally summoned, and even—

(5) ARCHIDIACONAL COUNCILS are occasionally heard of. But these later varieties were of inferior importance, and never originated business of any weight.

Counties, THE ENGLISH. The word county is due to the Norman invaders' identification of the old English "shire" with their own "comitatus," the district of a count. But the shire had had a very different history from the Frankish comitatus. In the first place, the forty counties of England differ considerably in their origins. The southern counties are, no doubt, much the older, and are still identical with the original shires of Wessex. Wiltshire may, for instance, be imagined to have originated with some few hundred Saxon families who towards the end of the fifth century drove back the Britons from this district, attained to an independent individuality as the "folk" of the Wilsætas, and soon coalesced with neighbouring "folks" in Dorset, Hampshire, Berkshire, &c., to form the "shares" or divisions of the kingdom of the West Saxons. It is possible that these shires had often such a twofold unity, as was long traceable in the two divisions of Kent, or the two "folks" of the East Angles. At any rate, the West-Saxon shire is characterised by a primitive independence, having its own "folk-moot," its independent king or semi-royal ruler, the ealdorman and its chief town, whose name is cognate to the shire name (Wil-sætas, Wilton). This had been the history also of Sussex, Surrey, Essex, Middlesex, and even Jutish Kent, when these, with others, were amalgamated into the kingdom of Wessex. But the Midland shires, on the contrary, are obviously artificial areas, and do not correspond to the original "folks" of the Mercians, South Angles, Mid-Angles, &c. They were probably marked out when re-conquered from the Danes by Alfred and his successors in the tenth century: a town was taken as a centre, and a line, as it were, drawn round it. Such was the formation of Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, Northamptonshire. (But sometimes these older divisions are preserved in the bishoprics; the diocese of Worcester, for example, corresponded to the old kingdom of the Hwiccas, and was far more extensive than the modern Worcestershire; so with the ancient kingdoms of Essex, East and West Kent, and Sussex.) The shire system then, which was indigenous to Wessex, spread thence later on. Thus, again, in the north only Yorkshire and Durham appear as shires in Domesday Book; Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland were not formed into shires till the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I. But the origin of one shire, Rutland, still remains "an unsolved problem in the heart of our history" (Freeman). Furthermore, not till long after the Norman Conquest was it certain that there would not be other shires formed, for the district of Richmond was often called a shire, as also were Hallamshire and Northamshire, &c. The number of shires which sent representatives to Parliament was during the Middle Ages thirty-seven; for Cheshire and Durham were not incorporated till 1535 and 1673 respectively, and Monmouth added to the English shires also in 1535. The boundaries of shires—as, for example, in Essex and Norfolk—are usually the natural lines of rivers and hills; and in many cases would be explained if we could only trace the ancient forests and marshes, as on the western border of Notts; in other cases again—as in the sinuous northern boundary of Wilts, which seems to cross and recross the Thames with a sort of methodical irregularity—there must have been accidents of local formation, tribal relations, or personal circumstances, which we can hardly now hope to trace. The anomalous fragments belonging to one shire, but outlying in another, had often a great historical interest; such as the hundred of West Meon, in Sussex, but belonging to Hants, a striking survival from the settlement of Jutish Meonwaras soon absorbed by the West Saxons of Hants. These have in many cases been consolidated and rectified. When we come to compare the social characteristics of the several counties, we find that in wealth and population the southern and eastern part of England preponderated during the Anglo-Saxon times, as in political superiority. With the rise of the woollen manufacture after the thirteenth century, the balance of population spread towards the eastern counties, and along the banks of Thames and Severn. At last, the application of steam-power to manufacture opened out the coal and iron fields of the north and west, and reversed the long predominance of the plains over the hill districts. As to the relative prevalence of feudal sentiments, it is to be noticed that the home counties after the Norman Conquest continued to be divided among smaller land-lords than the great lordships of the midlands and the north; it is therefore the barons of the north and centre who are conspicuous in the series of revolts under the Norman kings, in the struggles of Henry II.'s and Henry III.'s reigns, in Magna Charta, and in the opposition led by the house of Lancaster against the Plantagenets; and during the Wars of the Roses one striking element is the array of the trading and popular forces against the feudal, the array (that is) of Kent, London, the eastern and "home counties," against the less advanced northern and western border lands. The same division is to be found during the next century in comparing the Protestant risings (such as Wyatt's) with the reactionary Pilgrimage of Grace supported by the gentry of Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, and the north. To take another instance: the Socmen, whom Domesday shows so numerous in the eastern counties, and whose presence points to the revived spirit of freedom that the Danes brought in, bequeathed their bold traditions to the revolted peasantry of 1381, and to the Puritan yeomen of the Eastern Association two centuries later. But this tenacious individuality of the shire comes out in still minuter distinctions. Kent, Cheshire, Durham, in particular, had each its own legal customs or social traditions; each, in fact, its own inner history. Charles II. in his flight was once detected by his horse's shoes having been made in four different counties. It is only the developed means of communication of our own day, and the operation of broad economic laws, that have begun to obliterate such distinctiveness. [For authorities, see COUNTY COURT.]

[A. L. S.]

Counties, THE IRISH. The history of the shiring of Ireland is involved in more obscurity than the history of the shiring of England, though not for the same reason in the two cases. In England the division into counties was the result of a slow process of growth, the history of which is hidden in the remote past. We can trace only some of its stages. But the shiring of Ireland was purely the result of the English conquest. The persons who undertook it were strangers, were aliens in the country, ignorant of its language and most of its local traditions. The Irish shires are therefore distinct, formal, and legal divisions, not local and popular ones. This being the case, it might have been supposed that it would have been an easy matter to trace the stages by which these divisions came into existence. And perhaps this would not have been difficult if there had remained to us more of the State papers relating to Irish affairs. But it is well known that an immense number were destroyed during the different periods of Irish rebellion. Especially was this the case with the papers which relate to the early period of Anglo-Norman rule. There were in reality two conquests of Ireland, one in the reign of Henry II. and his immediate successors, another in that of Henry VIII. and his successors. For during a long intermediate period (almost from the death of Henry III.) the country lapsed into an independence almost as complete as if it had never known English rule. Now, though we cannot distinctly trace all the steps of the shiring of Ireland, we must unquestionably refer it to these two periods of English supremacy, and what was not done during the first we may feel sure was not accomplished in the interval between it and the second. Up to the end of the reign of Henry III. English law was administered regularly to the English subjects throughout the greater part of Ireland. Justices in eyre travelled for gaol delivery in the same way that they did in England. The country, therefore, must have been divided into districts, which in every way corresponded to the English shires. Of course this division of Ireland was a gradual process, beginning with the districts first conquered, and gradually extending. Nor, so far as concerns the present county divisions, does the process seem to have extended beyond Leinster and Munster. The other two provinces were treated as each one county. Thus very early we read of sheriffs of some of the counties of the Pale—a sheriff of Dublin, for example, is mentioned in a document of the year 1201, or not more than thirty years after the first landing of the Earl of Pembroke. This, however, does not prove the existence of the division now known as the county of Dublin, for the city of Dublin was constituted a county before the county was formed. But it proves the existence of so much of county government in this year, as is implied by the existence of a sheriff. As a matter of fact, the "county of Dublin"—evidently here distinct from the city—is mentioned only six years after, in 1207. The county of Kildare is first mentioned in 1249; Wexford (Wesford) in 1251; Kilkenny in 1252, but more clearly in 1279; of Louth (also called Uriel), the sheriff is spoken of in 1290; but it is not distinctly called a county before the year 1301. Wicklow, though it is nowhere called a county in the early documents, cannot have been behind the other places of the Pale. Meath is the only exception to the general rule of a very early shiring of the counties round Dublin. It seems only to have been settled during the thirteenth century, and it is generally referred to in the papers of that age as De Lacy's country. In 1297 we read of the lands held in Meath, "without the boundary of any county," which implies that at this date only a part of it had been shired. Three counties of Leinster, by their English names, imply a late formation—Longford, King's County, and Queen's County. The last two did, of course, receive their names in the reign of Mary and Philip, as the names of their capitals—Philipstown and Maryborough sufficiently indicate. But before this time they were known as Offaly (also called "O'Connor's country") and Leix ("O'Moore's country"), and there is no evidence that their boundaries were in any way changed with their names. Longford seems to have been a later division, as we might expect from the smallness of its size. We find incidental mention of it in a document of the year 1207; but there is no evidence to show that the county came into existence before the sixteenth century. Munster was divided into counties almost as early as was Leinster, for all its counties except one are distinctly mentioned as such in documents of the thirteenth century, viz., Cork first called a county in 1207,* Limerick in 1245, Waterford in 1251, Tipperary in 1275, and Derry in 1281. Of Clare we do not happen to have any early record; but we need not suppose that it was much behind the others. It is the one county of Munster which has an English-derived name, as it was called after the De Clares, Earls of Gloucester, &c., who settled in the country, and was for a long time known as "De Clare's country." After the return of Ireland to practical independence, and the relapse of the Northern families to the condition of native chieftains, the country may be said to have been practically unshired over its greatest part. Gaol deliveries were restricted to the four counties constituting what was now known as the Pale, viz., Dublin, Kildare, Louth, and Meath. It seems that at the beginning of the reign of Henry VIII. there were only parts of five counties which remained faithful to the English crown—Uriel (Louth), half of Dublin, half of Meath, half of Kildare, and half of Wexford. Of course the counties which had been already constituted continued to bear their old names, but the jurisdiction which made them really shires had ceased. In the document from which these particulars have been taken, Ulster (Wolster) and Connaught are called counties. It is, however, the case that as early as 1260 we hear of the county of Down, and in 1283 of the sheriff of Antrim, and in 1290 of the sheriff of Roscommon. In 1296 Sligo is known in the State papers of Elizabeth as "O'Connor Sligo's country." This is in 1565. Five years later we find an Order in Council concerning the shiring of Ireland, but no details are given as to what new counties were constituted. The completion of the work did not take place till 1607, after the famous rebellion and flight of Tyrone and Tyrconnel, which led to the Plantation of Ulster. In a State paper of this year, we find a proposal, which was shortly carried into effect, for dividing the whole of Ulster into shires. In this paper there are three old counties mentioned—Louth, Down, and Antrim—and it is proposed to create six new, viz., Armagh, Tyrone, Coleraine (Londonderry), Monaghan, Fermanagh, and Donegal. The addition of London to the older name of Derry is the most evident remaining trace of the Plantation of Ulster, recalling as it does the settlement of that part by a colony from London. That settlement was begun in the year 1607. In the list of James I.'s Parliament of 1611 the names of the counties of Ireland stand almost as at present, save that Carlow is still called by its earlier name of Cathelagh, and that Cavan is absent from the number.

Documents relating to Ireland from 1187—1800. Calendar, in four vols.; State Papers, 1509—1613. Gibson, Hist. of Cork; Hibernian Gazetteer; Topographica Hibernica. There are numerous county histories for Ireland, but little information is to be got from them upon the present subject. [C. F. K.]

Counties Palatine. [PALATINE.]

Counties, THE SCOTTISH. The history of the erection of the counties of Scotland as they now exist is involved in much obscurity. The boundaries in some cases were not definitively fixed till the beginning of the present century. It was part of the anglicising policy of the sons of Malcolm and Margaret to divide their kingdom into sheriffdoms, after the English model; therefore, in Scotland, the sheriff was not the Gerefa of the already existing shire, but an officer appointed by the crown, for whom a district had to be appropriated. The boundaries of these districts were for long vague and undetermined. They must be divided into two distinct classes—those of the Highlands and those of the Lowlands.

(1) Lowland Counties. At the time when sheriffs were introduced, Scotland south of the Firths consisted of three distinct provinces—Lothian, Galloway, and Strathclyde. Lothian formed part of the English kingdom of Northumbria, and was held in fief by the Scottish kings. It is represented by the counties of Berwick, Roxburgh, Peebles, and the Lothians—i.e., Edinburgh, Haddington, and Linlithgow. Each of these counties takes its name from the chief town within its bounds. From incidental mention in charters and other documents, we gather that each of them had a sheriff in the time of David I. or his successors, but there is no certain evidence of their first institution. The extent of these counties would seem to have been determined by existing local divisions. Thus Peebles is known as Tweeddale before its erection into a county. Ettrick Forest becomes Selkirk, and Teviotdale and Liddesdale form Roxburgh.

Strathclyde has been divided into the present counties of Ayr, Lanark, Renfrew, and Dumbarton. Ayr was formed of the districts of Kyle, Cunningham, and Carrick, which was separated from Galloway by William the Lion. The first sheriff of Ayr was appointed in 1221, but the three districts were ruled severally by bailies, who in many points acted as sheriffs. Lanark, which was made a sheriffdom in the time of David I., was divided into two parts, the over ward and the nether ward of Clydesdale; Lanark being the seat of justice of the one, and Rutherglen of the other. Renfrew was erected by Robert III. into a barony, with rights of regality, for his son James. It first appears as an independent sheriffdom in 1414. Dumbarton, formerly the Lennox, or Vale of Leven, first appears as a sheriffdom in the reign of William the Lion.

* According to the Hibernian Gazetteer it was shired in 1510. It was again shired in the reign of James I. (Gibson, Hist. of Cork).

Galloway was divided into the sheriffdoms of Dumfries and Wigton. The sheriffdom of Dumfries nominally included the districts of Nithsdale and Annandale, and that half of Galloway which forms the modern county of Kirkcudbright. A sheriff is mentioned in the time of William the Lion, and it is distinctly recognised as a shire at the time of the death of Alexander III. But as Annandale on the one hand, and Kirkcudbright on the other, were both stewardries, the jurisdiction of the sheriff must have been virtually limited to Nithsdale. Wigton, the remaining part of Galloway, was certainly a sheriffdom by the end of the thirteenth century, but powers of regality were joined to the earldom by David II. In every county there were regalities and baronial jurisdictions, and hereditary constables of royal fortresses, and bailiffs of the lands belonging to religious houses, whose powers clashed with those of the sheriff. The office almost invariably became hereditary in the family of the most powerful man of the district, and tended more to swell his consequence than to maintain law and order, till the Act of 1747 abolished hereditary jurisdictions.

(2) Highland Counties. In the Celtic kingdom north of the Firths, where the clan system prevailed, the country was divided into vaguely defined districts, whose several Mormaors or earls, while professing a nominal allegiance to the King of Scots, each claimed to represent the royal authority within his own territory. The introduction of sheriffs was therefore very gradual, and was not completed till the sixteenth century. In many cases the powers of the sheriff were conferred upon the local chief, who had thus the right of "pit and gallows," or power of life and death, within his own territory. These powers were only done away with by the abolition of hereditary jurisdictions in 1747. The boundaries of the Highland shires were not definitely fixed till the beginning of the present century. Previously, their limits were marked more by custom and tradition than by law, and Arrowsmith's map, published in 1805, is the first in which the counties are defined accurately.

Counties. THE WELSH, are mainly administrative divisions of the Mercian rather than the West Saxon type. They are consequently of late origin, and in most cases receive their name from the shire town. In a country so well subdivided off by natural boundaries as Wales, their limits have, however, in certain cases, coincided so far with these, that they represent real dialectic and physical distinctions. Moreover, some counties correspond, if roughly, with ancient tribal or local divisions, and still more to the ancient ecclesiastical divisions of the land. But despite these exceptions, the Welsh shires are in the main artificial "departments" rather than natural "provinces;" they are "shires" rather than "gauen."

The Welsh counties fall into three classes according to the period of their creation—viz., (1) ancient palatine counties, (2) the counties formed by Edward I., (3) the counties formed by Henry VIII., who also finally fixed the limits of the other two classes.

(1) Ancient Palatine Counties—i.e., Pembroke and Glamorganshire. These represent the two greatest "Marches" which the conquering activity of the Norman barons of the twelfth century established all over Western and Southern Wales. In the west, the districts thus conquered were largely included in the indefinite limits of the English border counties, Cheshire, Shropshire, and Herefordshire, whose earls under William I. acquired regalian privileges. Up to the thirteenth century, and even the sixteenth, large districts now in "Wales" were included locally within these counties, although their inclusion was but nominal, so long as the lesser lords retained palatine powers, even after the crown had annexed the earldoms themselves. Another class of lordships marchers were never included within these counties, but although independent, were not of sufficient importance to be regarded as equivalent to counties. The lordships of Denbigh, the "honour" of Montgomery, the lordships of Brecon and Gower, were among others of this description. But Morganwg, the conquest of Fitz-Hamon, and the inheritance of Robert of Gloucester, and the great house of Clare, though never formally constituted an earldom or county palatine, was so virtually. Its lords were always earls, either of Gloucester or, as later, of Pembroke. They had fullest regalian rights and privileges, as much as the Palatine Lords of Cheshire and Durham had, and they were the greatest family of the realm. So early as 1146 we read of the "comitatus" (shire-moot) of Cardiff, and in 1148 Earl William speaks of his "vice comes" (sheriff). Pembroke was more definitely created an earldom in 1138, and became organised on the model of an English county. The boundaries of both were narrower than those of the modern shires; Gower, for example, was a separate lordship, although much of Gwent was within the lordship of Morganwg. Similarly Dewisland and Kemes were outside the Pembroke Palatinate. The modern boundaries were assigned by Henry VIII. adding to the old nuclei the adjoining marcherships.

(2) Edward I.'s Counties—viz., Anglesey, Caernarvonshire, Merionethshire, Cardiganshire, Caermarthenshire. After the conquest of Llewelyn, Edward I. divided the district which acknowledged his sway, and to which the title of the "Principality" is rightly confined, into districts called shires, but which rather bear to the regular shire the relation of a United States Territory to a State, than fully represent the self-governing district forming an integral factor of the body politic of England. In the districts more immediately subject to Llewelyn, the shires of Anglesey, Caernarvon, and Merioneth were erected. They so far regarded old lines that they consisted of an aggregation of cantreds and commots. A sheriff in each shire, with coroners and bailiffs in each commot, were appointed. A county court was to be held once a month, and the sheriff's tourn twice a year, at which all the inhabitants were to be present. Sheriffs, &c., were also appointed for more southern regions, where the power of the Welsh princes at least nominally extended, one to hold his court at Cardigan and Lampeter, another at Caermarthen, though the powers of the marchers must have limited the area of their jurisdiction to narrower bounds than modern Cardiganshire and Caermarthenshire. A sixth new county was formed in Flint, which consisted of the western and more exposed portion of the Chester Palatinate, but which remained in a sort of half dependence on Cheshire. The rest of Wales remained in the hands of the marchers.

(3) Henry VIII's Counties—viz., Denbighshire, Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire, Breconshire, and Monmouthshire. Henry VIII.'s incorporation of Wales with England involved the division of the whole country into shire-ground. Hence, by the 27 Hen. VIII., the local self-government, of which the shire was still the base, was introduced into the whole land. The lordships marchers lost their palatine rights, and were either (e.g., Gower, as above) incorporated into existing counties, or aggregated into new ones. Besides the new shires of Western Wales, the boundaries of Cheshire, and still more of Shropshire and Herefordshire, were readjusted; and the old Welsh counties of Edward I., and the still older palatinates, were assimilated to English shires; and the power of returning to Parliament one member for each county, and one for the amalgamated boroughs (except in mountainous Merioneth) was conferred. Monmouthshire had two members given it, and was treated as a part of England, so far as the words England and Wales had now an antagonistic meaning. Its enclosure under Charles II. in an English circuit completed its severance from Wales.

The chief Statutes creating Welsh counties are 12 Ed. I., Statutum Wallie or the Statute of Rhuddlan, and 27 Hen. VIII., c. 24, 26. See also 26 Hen. VIII., c. 4, and 27 Hen. VIII., c. 5, 7, 24, 26. A summary will be found in Reeve's History of English Law, ii. 93—99, and iv. 195—208. For Pembrokeshire and Glamorganshire the Description of Pembrokeshire written in 1603 (MS. Harl., No. 6250), c. 24, fol. 240, sq., is valuable. For the Marches, see Pennant's Tour in Wales, Appendix ii. For Glamorganshire, Mr. Clark's papers on The Land of Morgannwg, in the Archæological Journal, are useful. The Welsh county histories are not, as a rule, good. Jones's Breconshire is perhaps the best.

County Court. The "county court," or "shire-moot," was for five or six centuries the most vital of our national institutions. As its being often held in the open air perhaps indicates, it was anciently a "folk-moot," that is, included all landowners in the shire; and in the submission of laws to the shire-moot for formal acceptance, a piece of ceremonial which is only recently obsolete, we may discern the ancient independence of the several "folks." While in this aspect the shire-moot has the ealdorman and bishop at its head, "to declare the law, secular and spiritual," its newer aspect of dependence on a central power is embodied in the shire-reeve, who convokes it, and connects it with the king. This gradually tends to supplant the ealdorman and bishop in it, and after the Norman Conquest it passes wholly into his hands. Its business was to hear appeals from the hundred courts, to execute the instructions of royal writs, and to attest wills and transfers of lands. Meantime, however, a tendency to what may be called delegation, which had already affected the hundred and township courts, had now also much modified the old assembly. And thus in historic times an ordinary shire-moot is not the full folk-moot, but contains also the reeve and four "best-men" from each township, and perhaps the twelve thegns from each hundred or borough; and it appears that this quasi-representative court is called monthly, instead of twice a year, like the old folk-moot. It is possible this more frequent summoning was due to Rufus's minister, Flambard, who "drove all the moots;" and Henry I. in his charter promised to amend it. At the same time, the older and fuller form of the court was still called twice a year, chiefly for the purposes of the crown, such as taking the oath of the peace, and meeting the justices itinerant. Indeed, the shire-moot after the Conquest gained in connection with the central power what it lost in independent action. Thus, its civil justice—by the use of writs calling up cases, and by the attraction of the Common Pleas Court—was drifting up to Westminster; its criminal pleas belonged to the king, and were executed by his itinerant justices. But both for presentment of criminals and for decision of civil cases (at least, as to land) the crown always used "recognitors," that is, called in the shire to co-operate; and its co-operation was demanded in other ways, as for view of armour and election of coroners, for the negotiation, assessment, and collection of carucage, for exacting oaths of allegiance, and above all, after 1254, for the election of knights and burgesses to Parliament. At this fuller shire-moot the attendance of all, from archbishops to villeins, was required. The barons in vain begged for exemption; in 1258, at Oxford, among the other grievances set forth, the barons complained that the attendance required of them was increasing; till, by the Statute of Merton, they won their point—that their attendance might be by attorney; while the Statute of Marlborough, 1267, exempted all above the degree of knights, unless specially summoned. Already individual exemptions had been so largely granted that by 1258 there was a scarcity of knights for the “inquists” of the court; and in 1293 a qualification of 40s. freehold was required for service as a juror. So that on all sides the old folk-moot had been attacked, and by the thirteenth century was attenuated to an occasional formality; but not before it had given birth to the fruitful idea of local representation, according to which a small body of knights could act for the whole shire, and stand between the crown and the county in the business of government. Thus, in 1194 four knights act for the whole shire to elect the grand jury of each hundred; under Henry III. four knights of each shire come to Westminster to discuss the interpretation of articles in Magna Charta; and, chief of all, knights (two, three, or four in number) from time to time assess, or assess and collect, the carucages. As soon as these knights cease to be nominated by the crown or sheriff—and the precedent for their election by the whole county court is finally given in 1254—the stages are complete by which the shire-moots could be dispensed with, and yet transmit all their authority to a Parliament. As “Parliament is the concentration of the shire-moots,” it follows that in creating a Parliament, in making the election to be by all the freeholders, not merely the chief tenants, and, above all, in closely uniting the burgesses with the knights, the shire has done its work. The rapid growth of the justices of the peace stripped it of the rest of its functions, except that of electing and instructing the representatives sent to Parliament, perhaps after discussion of the grounds of its summons as stated in the king’s writ, and (till 1334) that of assessing and collecting from the townships the tax granted in Parliament. It was particularly during the Tudor period that this non-elective body of landowners completed the process by which they had stripped the old shire-court of its powers—judicial, police, military, and fiscal. The statutes of the early fifteenth century, which attempted to further regulate the relation between Parliament and the shires in the interests of the gentry, were aimed to check the misdoing of the sheriffs (1406), and to insure the election of knights or squires and the exclusion of maintainers; and in 1430 it was declared that the right of voting belonged only to freeholders of 40s.

and upwards. Thus it had now come about that the villeins, who had once, as the free ceorls, made up the folk-moot itself, and embodied in their decisions of “folk-right” the principle that the judges were no other than the suitors; the villeins, who even in their later period of subjection to the lord had still represented their township before the royal justices, were now, at the very epoch when they had attained to a political consciousness and practical emancipation, irrevocably excluded from a share in the political life of their shire—an exclusion still the lot of their descendant, the agricultural labourer. One side of the old principle of local government—viz., co-operation with the crown by unpaid local work—is still preserved; but the other side of it has long been lost to view—viz., the principle that this work is shared by all the full freemen of the shire; and now the quarter and petty sessions, aided by a few permanent officials, and relieved by the central power’s larger assumption to itself of local duties (as in the regulation of prisons), have supplanted the freeholders’ county court, as this supplanted the shire-moot of representatives from the townships, and this in its turn the primitive folk-moot. The county court for general purposes now only exists for the election of coroners, and (in theory) for the proclamation of outlawry and publication of Acts of Parliament. But the shire retains its own officers, lord-lieutenant and sheriffs, justices, coroners, and chief constable; through the justices it manages its own police, highroads, and bridges, and imposes rates. And a tendency now appears to be growing up which—by the establishment of more representative county boards, and by the extension of the county franchise—will no doubt go further than can yet be fully realised to revive the long-dormant activity of the shire and its local life. The county courts, under paid judges, set up in 1846 for better despatch of the lesser judicial business, vary in number according to the needs of each county. Their institution has been a great success, and they have been justly described as a national boon. But in size and functions they are more like hundred courts revived and centralised; and from the historical point of view their name of county court is a misnomer.

Courtenay, EDWARD. [DEVON.]

Courtenay, WILLIAM (b. circa 1327, d. 1396), Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of Hugh Courtenay, Earl of Devon. After holding many valuable preferments he became Bishop of London in 1376. He strongly opposed

John of Gaunt, and Wiclif, and it was before Courtenay that the latter was tried in 1376. In 1381 he was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury, and Chancellor, but the latter office he held only for a few months. He again attacked Wiclif, obtained a condemnation of his views by Convocation, and obliged the University of Oxford to withdraw their support from him. Courtenay, though opposing Wiclif's views, was strongly anti-Papal, and readily assented to the passing of the Statute of Præmunire. He also resisted the attempt of Parliament to tax the clergy without their consent, and the king was compelled to allow the money to be voted by Convocation. The election of Courtenay marks an epoch in the history of the Church; he was the first of the aristocratic primates, and after his time the see of Canterbury and many other bishoprics were conferred upon members of noble houses, instead of being given as a reward to ministers or judges, or as a recognition of learning to some great scholar.

Coutances, WALTER DE, was one of Henry II.'s ministers, and became successively Bishop of Lincoln and Archbishop of Rouen. He accompanied Richard I. on his crusade, and in 1191 was sent to England by the king, for the purpose of replacing Longchamp. The archbishop held the justiciarship from 1191 to 1194, and was active in raising the king's ransom. In 1196, however, he quarrelled with Richard, and the king refusing to give way, he laid Normandy under an interdict, until a compromise was effected. He supported the claims of John, and died during that king's reign.

Covenant, THE. It was the old Scottish custom for those who were united in any great cause to bind themselves together by a bond to stand by one another to the death in its support. Such a bond was the Covenant which plays so large a part in the history of the Reformation in Scotland. It was originally a private bond, by which the barons who upheld the first preachers of reform bound themselves together for mutual support and the destruction of Popery in 1557. In 1581, when there was a general dread of the revival of Popery, a similar bond, entering more into detail concerning the superstitions and religious errors that were to be combated, was drawn up by the Protestant ministers. The king, James I., was the first to sign it, and his example was followed by the courtiers and then by the people. This is generally known as the First Covenant. In 1638, when

Charles I. tried to force the English liturgy on the Church of Scotland, the popular indignation found a vent in a revival of this covenant, with a clause added to it directed against the bishops. The enthusiasm about it was universal. It was signed through the length and breadth of the land, by high and low alike, and from this time the "Covenant" became the watch-word and war-cry of the Presbyterian party. In 1643, when the English Parliament sought Scotch aid, the Scotch demanded that the mutual engagements of the two nations should be confirmed by a pact to which both nations should be sworn. Accordingly the Solemn League and Covenant was drawn up by Henderson, amended by Vane, adopted by the Westminster Assembly (q.v.), passed by the Parliament, and ordered to be subscribed and sworn to by the nation. But the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, in 1643, though they approved the Covenant, disappointed the Scots, who hoped to see it imposed on the whole English nation. When Charles II., on the invitation of the Estates, came to Scotland to claim the kingdom in 1650, he was compelled to sign the Covenant before he was allowed to land, and the signature was repeated at his coronation. Notwithstanding this, after the Restoration, by the king's order, the Covenant was burned by the common hangman in London, and an Act abjuring and condemning it as an unlawful oath was passed by the Privy Council of Scotland in 1662. The extreme Presbyterian party were greatly disappointed that the Act of 1690, approving the Confession, did not enjoin the renewing of the Covenant. The Covenant was not merely a declaration of belief, but a solemn engagement binding its adherents to force their belief upon others.

The name of Covenanters was first taken by the popular party after the renewal of the Covenant in 1638, and borne by them throughout the Civil War. But it is more generally associated with the insurgents of the reign of Charles II. who took arms in defence of the Presbyterian form of church government. As the Covenant had by that time been denounced as a seditious oath, those who persisted in maintaining it were naturally looked upon as rebels against the government. They were, however, treated with unwarrantable severity. When, in 1662, the Act was passed for the re-establishment of episcopacy, the Presbyterian ministers who refused to acknowledge the bishops were ejected from their parishes. Round these "ejected ministers," as they were called, the Covenanters rallied, and gathered in crowds on the hillsides or any lonely place, to attend their ministrations. These meetings, called "conventicles," were denounced as seditious, and to frequent them or to hold any "intercommuning" with any persons who frequented them, was forbidden on pain of death. These severe measures provoked the Covenanters to take up arms in defence of their religious opinions, and led to a rebellion so widespread, that it almost amounted to a civil war. The first serious action between the king's troops and the Covenanters was in the hill-country on the borders of the counties of Ayr and Lanark. Here, at Drumclog, a farm near Loudon Hill, a party of armed Covenanters who were gathered at a conventicle were attacked by a body of dragoons under John Graham, of Claverhouse, and gained a victory over their assailants (1679). After this success, the numbers of the insurgents increased so rapidly that the government became alarmed, and an army, 15,000 strong, was sent against them under the command of the Duke of Monmouth. He defeated them on the banks of the Clyde, at Bothwell Bridge, where 1,200 were made prisoners, June 22, 1679. In consequence of a treasonable protest called the Sanguhar Declaration, put forth by the Covenanters, all persons who wished to free themselves of suspicion of complicity with them were required to take what was called the Abjuration Oath; and the soldiers who were sent to scour the country in search of rebels, were empowered to kill any one who refused to take the oath. The sufferings of the Covenanters were extreme. Numbers of them were put to death with great cruelty, but suffering only strengthened their fanatic spirit, and it was not until after the accession of William, when the "outed ministers" were restored to their pulpits, and adherence to the Covenant ceased to be a crime, that the Covenanters abandoned their attitude of defiance. But some extreme Covenanters refused to acknowledge a king whose acceptance of episcopacy in England was, they thought, treason against the divine right of presbyters. They formed the earliest dissenting Presbyterian sects in Scotland. [CAMERONIANS.]

Coventry seems to have owed its importance to the magnificent Benedictine abbey founded by Leofric and his wife, Godiva, in 1044. The town became a prosperous trading centre. According to Leland, its walls were built in the reign of Edward II. In 1451 it was created a separate county. The beautiful abbey church was almost destroyed by Henry VIII.; but several fine specimens of mediæval ecclesiastical architecture remain. The "Laymen's Parliament of Henry IV." met at Coventry in 1404. In the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries Coventry was an important centre of the cloth and woollen trade. Its citizens were strongly Parliamentary in the Great Rebellion; and to punish them their walls were levelled after the Restoration. The town has returned two members to Parliament since the reign of Edward I.

Coventry, WALTER OF, was a writer of whom little is known. He probably wrote between the year 1293 and the end of Edward I.'s reign, and may have been a monk, probably of some house in the diocese of York. He is the author or compiler of a Memoriale, or analysis of history extending from the arrival of Brutus to the year 1225. The earlier portions are merely transcripts from Geoffrey of Monmouth, Henry of Huntingdon, Roger of Hoveden, &c., but for the first quarter of the thirteenth century Walter is a valuable authority.

The Memoriale of Walter of Coventry was first discovered by Leland in the sixteenth century. It has been edited, with most valuable introductions, by Dr. Stubbs (Rolls Series, 1872).

Coventry, THOMAS, 1ST LORD (b. 1578, d. 1640), son of Sir T. Coventry, Judge of the Common Pleas, in 1616 was chosen Recorder of London, and in 1617 was made Solicitor-General, being advanced four years later to the Attorney-Generalship. In 1625, chiefly through Buckingham's interest, he was made Lord Keeper, and in 1628 was created Lord Coventry. He has been accused of advising some of Charles's most arbitrary acts, as the refusal of the summons to Lord Bristol, and the imprisonment of the Earl of Arundel; but Mr. Foss maintains that he was little more than "the messenger of the king and the organ of the House." In 1635 and 1636 he enjoined the judges in their charge to the grand juries to urge the people to pay the ship-money with cheerfulness, but he took no part in the trial of Hampden for refusing to pay his share. One of his last acts was to advise the king to summon Parliament, but he died before the summoning of the Short Parliament.

Clarendon, Hist. of the Rebellion.

Coventry, SIR WILLIAM (b. 1626, d. 1686), was the youngest son of Lord Keeper Coventry. In 1662 he was appointed Commissioner of the Admiralty, in 1665 was knighted and made a Privy Councillor, and 1667 a Commissioner of the Treasury. Having quarrelled with the Duke of Buckingham he challenged him to fight a duel, for which he was banished from the court, and retired into private life. "He was," says Burnet, "the best speaker in the House of Commons, and a man of great notions and eminent virtues." He was the author of several political tracts, the most interesting of which is The Character of a Trimmer, published in 1689.

Coventry, SIR JOHN, was the grandson of Lord Coventry and nephew of Sir William Coventry. He was a member of Parliament in 1670, when, having somewhat freely expressed his opinion about the royal mistresses, he incurred the displeasure of the court, was set upon by a band of ruffians sent by Monmouth, half-murdered, and his nose slit with a penknife. This outrage led to the passing of an Act against unlawful maiming and wounding, which was known as the Coventry Act (1670).

Coverdale, MILLS (b. 1487, d. 1568), was one of the earliest English Reformers. In 1532 he is said to have assisted Tyndale in his translation of the Bible, and three years later issued a version of his own. He was on close terms of friendship with Cromwell, and in 1535 was sent by that minister to Paris to bring out the translation of the New Testament known as the Lord Cromwell's Bible. On Cromwell's fall Coverdale went to Tubingen, and travelled in Denmark and other Continental countries. On Edward VI.'s accession he was appointed chaplain to the king. In 1551 he was made Bishop of Exeter, but was removed from his see and imprisoned by order of Queen Mary. He was subsequently released, and retired to Holland and afterwards to Geneva. He returned to England after the accession of Elizabeth, and assisted at the consecration of Archbishop Parker, though he did not obtain his see again, owing to his Calvinistic views.

Two vols. of selections from Coverdale's numerous works were published by the Parker Soc., 1844-46.

Cowell, JOHN (b. 1554, d. 1611), was a Cambridge civilian who became Master of Trinity Hall and Reader in Civil Law. In 1607 he published a work called The Interpreter, which was an explanation of legal terms and theories. The book gave great offence to the common-lawyers. At the instigation probably of Coke, a great enemy of Cowell, an inquiry into the character of the book was ordered by the House of Commons in 1610, and the king was advised to suppress it, because of the unconstitutional doctrines it contained on the subject of the royal prerogative and the rights of the people.

Cowper, WILLIAM, 1ST EARL (b. 1664, d. 1745), was born at Hertford. After studying at the Temple, he was, in 1688, called to the bar, and from this time rose rapidly in his profession. On the landing of the Prince of Orange, he raised a troop of horse in his support. His abilities as a Chancery barrister soon attracted Somers's notice, and in 1695 he was returned to Parliament for Hertford. In 1696 he supported the bill for the attainder of Sir John Fenwick. In 1702 William Cowper lost his seat for Hertford, owing to the unpopularity caused in the borough by the trial of his brother Spencer for murder. In 1705, on the dismissal of Sir Nathan Wright, he became Lord Keeper and Commissioner of the Scotch Union. In 1707 he was raised to the Upper House, and became the first Lord Chancellor of Great Britain; but the sentence pronounced by him in this capacity on Sacheverell was influenced by party spirit, and unworthy of his reputation. In opposition to the rest of the ministry, he was in favour of making peace with France during the last years of the Succession War; and he vigorously opposed Marlborough's request to be made Captain-General for life. [MARLBOROUGH.] On the fall of the Whigs, Cowper resigned, in spite of the solicitations of Harley, who wished for a composite ministry. On the accession of George I., he received the Great Seal, and was favoured with the king's entire confidence. His sentences on the rebels of 1715 have been censured as too severe. He was one of the chief advocates of the Septennial Act (q.v.). In 1718 he resigned office, probably because George accused him of espousing the Prince of Wales's side in his quarrel with the court. He promptly became leader of the Opposition, and withstood almost alone the Peerage Bill, and the bill of pains and penalties against Atterbury. In his later years he was accused, probably without reason, of tampering with the Jacobites.

Coxe, RICHARD (b. 1499, d. 1581), Bishop of Ely, made Dean of Christ Church and of Westminster by Henry VIII., was one of the tutors of Edward VI., the others being Sir John Cheke and Sir Anthony Cooke. During the reign of Mary he was compelled with the Protestants to take refuge at Frankfurt; but returned to England on the accession of Elizabeth, by whom he was made Bishop of Ely. It was a remonstrance from Bishop Coxe against the injustice done him by the bestowal of his land on Sir Christopher Hatton that drew forth the celebrated letter from Queen Elizabeth: "Proud prelate, you know what you were before I made you what you are. If you do not immediately comply with my request, by God I will unfrock you." Coxe is described as "an honest but narrow-spirited and peevish man."

Coxe, WILLIAM (b. 1747, d. 1828), Archdeacon, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow. He entered the Church, became incumbent of Kingston, Canon of Salisbury, and Archdeacon of Wiltshire, 1805. Coxe travelled a good deal on the Continent, and was a careful student of English and foreign history, especially that of the eighteenth century. His numerous works, though written in a rather uninteresting style, contain a good deal of information, and are of considerable value. The most important are Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole, Memoirs of Marlborough, Memoirs of the Administration of Mr. Pelham, and the History of the House of Austria.

Coyne and Livery was an ancient right or custom in Ireland which enabled the lord or chief to quarter his soldiery on his tenants. The Irish name for it was

"bonaght." Its adoption by the Norman settlers was so general that even the loyal Butlers enforced it. Both branches of the house of Fitzgerald adopted it in Edward III.'s time. This custom was the subject of constant complaints by the Irish Parliament. It was forbidden by the Statute of Kilkenny, 1367, and made treason in 1409, and finally abolished in 1603. Spenser complains of its abolition as a wrong done to the Irish landlord.

Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

Craggs, GEORGE (d. 1721), was Postmaster-General during the earlier years of George I.'s reign. He was accused with his son of frauds in connection with the South Sea Company, and while the accusation was still pending he took poison and killed himself.

Craggs, JAMES (d. 1721), son of George Craggs, was a Whig politician. During the reign of Anne he was employed in minor diplomatic business. He was consulted by Marlborough on the question of the duke's obtaining the appointment of Captain-General for life. In 1714, as the queen lay dying, he was despatched to Hanover, with instructions to bid Lord Stafford to request the States General of Holland to guarantee the Protestant succession. In 1717 he became Secretary at War, and, on the retirement of Addison, Secretary of State (1718). He was accused of fraud in connection with the South Sea Company, but died of small-pox on the day that the report was presented to the Commons. "Whatever," says Lord Mahon, "may have been his conduct in the South Sea affairs (for his death arrested the inquiry), he undoubtedly combined great talents for business with a love of luxury and literature; and his name, were it even to drop from the page of history, would live enshrined for ever in the verse of Pope."

Craig, GENERAL SIR JAMES (b. 1748, d. Jan. 1812), after greatly distinguishing himself in the American War of Independence, especially at the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill (q.v.), was, in 1793, appointed Governor of Jersey. In 1795 he went out to the Cape, and held the post of governor for two years, when he was sent to India, where his military experience was much needed. In 1808 Sir James Craig became Governor-in-chief of British North America, and in that capacity rendered himself extremely unpopular. His measures were arbitrary in the extreme, and it is to his treatment of the Assembly, and his refusal to grant any concessions or to consider the question of any redress of grievances, that the discontent which was so prevalent in Canada at this time was due. His unpopularity induced the Americans in 1812 to attempt an invasion of Canada, under the impression that they would be joined by a large majority of the people.

Craig, JOHN (d. 1600), was the friend and coadjutor of John Knox, on whose death he became for a time the acknowledged leader of the Kirk party, for whom he drew up the National Covenant in 1580. In 1584, however, on the Scotch Estates taking action to restrain the power of the clergy, Craig went over to the opposite side.

Craig, THOMAS (b. 1538, d. 1608), a celebrated Scottish judge, and an author of no little repute, was a great favourite of James VI. He was the writer of a famous treatise on feudal law, Jus Feudale, and a tract on the succession to the throne of England.

Craigmillar Castle, three miles from Edinburgh, was the scene of the murder of the Earl of Mar, brother of James III. It was burnt by Hertford, 1544, but afterwards rebuilt for Queen Mary, who spent a good deal of time there. It was at Craigmillar that Bothwell, Murray, Morton, and Maitland of Lethington, formed their agreement to kill Darnley (1566).

Crampton Question, THE (1856). The Crimean War brought England into some difficulties with foreign powers on account of the attempt to enlist a foreign legion. Mr. Crampton, the English minister at Washington, carried out the instructions of the government in the matter so thoroughly that the United States government dismissed him from Washington, and a coolness arose between the two countries, which was with difficulty healed.

Cranbrook, GATHORNE HARDY, 1st Viscount (b. 1814), son of John Hardy, member for Bradford, was elected member for Leominster in 1856, and defeated Mr. Gladstone for Oxford University in 1866. He was Under-Secretary of State for Home Affairs in 1858, Home Secretary in 1867, Secretary of State for War in 1874, and Secretary of State for India in 1878.

Cranmer, THOMAS (b. 1484, d. 1556), Archbishop of Canterbury, the son of a Nottinghamshire gentleman, at the age of fourteen entered Jesus College, Cambridge, where he was, in 1510, elected to a fellowship. In 1523 he was ordained, and continued at the university, lecturing and teaching. Forced to leave the town to avoid infection in the sweating sickness of 1528, he was accidentally thrown into the company of Foxe and Gardiner, the commissioners engaged on the question of the royal divorce, and in course of conversation mentioned his own conclusion, that the marriage was not merely voidable, but void, being contrary to the law of God, and that its dissolution could therefore be pronounced by the English ecclesiastical courts without reference to Rome. The commissioners were greatly struck, and reported the matter to Henry, who lost no time in sending for Cranmer and ordering him to write a treatise in support of his thesis. Soon after we find him employed as legal adviser to two important embassies to the Pope and the Emperor respectively, which, though unsuccessful, were not fruitless. The Papal mission discovered a singular consensus among Italian jurists in Henry's favour, while in Germany Cranmer's visits to the theologians proved more favourable to his own than to his master's suit, and before his return he was secretly married to Margaret Anne, daughter of Osiander, a prominent Reformer, a marriage which, being uncanonical, though not illegal, put him entirely at the king's mercy when he became Primate. Henry's plans had meanwhile been maturing; further delay would have ruined the legitimacy of Anne Boleyn's offspring, and on the death of Warham the archbishopric of Canterbury was offered to Cranmer. No sooner was the ceremony of installation over than the new archbishop wrote the king a collusive letter, demanding, in the name of the nation, that the scandal should be terminated; and, the case being fairly brought before his court, gave judgment that the marriage was void ab initio, Feb. 23, 1533. He had now performed his task, and withdrew into a literary retirement, which, broken only in 1536 and 1540 to pronounce two more iniquitous sentences of divorce, lasted till the fall of Cromwell, a minister as little inclined to endure a rival as Cranmer to become one. From that date his greater prominence is attested by two plots formed by the reactionary party for his destruction, from which he was preserved only by the unswerving confidence of the king. Yet at no time can he be called a politician: his influence was wholly personal, and confined to Henry, on whose death he again sank into the background. But in this retirement Cranmer was laying the foundations of the new order of things. On his elevation to the primacy he had but two points of sympathy with the continental Protestants—repudiation of the Papal supremacy and the translation of the Scriptures. But the patristic studies with which he maintained the attack on the Papacy gradually unveiled to him the features of a more apostolic and spiritual Christianity, whose truths he accepted, one by one, as conviction was forced upon his mind, till, in 1550, he published his book against Transubstantiation, wherein is maintained the Anglican doctrine of the Real, as against the Corporeal, Presence. Cranmer's reconstitution of the Church services remains his real title to greatness. His was a formative, not a creative, intellect, and, while his revision of the old Uses may be ranked for beauty and dignity with the Authorised Version of the Bible, his attempt to replace the Roman Canon Law is a monument of mistaken energy. Throughout all these reforms, his appeal is not from superstition to reason, but from the Church corrupt to the Church pure; nothing illustrates his catholic position better than his own words before the commission at Oxford:—"If it can be proved by any doctor above 1,000 years after Christ, that Christ's body is there in the eucharist really present, I will give all over."

During Edward's reign Cranmer was concerned in two political acts of great importance. At the coronation the archbishop, on his own responsibility, altered the position of the coronation oath, putting it after the expression of the popular assent. This innovation, by destroying the conditional character of that assent, amounted to the assertion of absolute hereditary right. The second act was the signing of Edward's illegal device for the succession, which was, however, performed with the greatest reluctance, and on the assurance of the judges. It sufficed to secure his condemnation for high treason on Mary's accession. The new government seems at first to have had no desire to shed blood; but Cranmer, the pilot of the Reformation, could not seize the numerous opportunities of escape which were offered; he remained, either overrating his own strength or underrating the impending danger. With his two bosom friends, Latimer and Ridley, he was taken to Oxford (Mar., 1554) to hold an academical disputation. After a parody of controversy, all three were summoned before a synod of presbyters and condemned as heretics. His friends suffered before him: the archbishop's case was delayed by the necessity of application to the Papal court, and by the desire of Cardinal Pole to ruin the cause of heresy by the recantation of the heresiarch. In the latter aim he succeeded. Cranmer was at first induced to accept the Papal supremacy, not as a doctrine, but as a fact, and his defence once broken down, and honour lost, he was led on to sign a detailed abjuration of all his anti-Papal convictions. Fortunately for the Reformation, the queen had resolved on his destruction, and to the public eye Cranmer died a martyr (Mar. 21, 1556). How far repentance preceded the knowledge of his fate must be left to conjecture. At the worst, he should be judged by his life, not by one failure under an overwhelming temptation. He was a man of deep piety and honesty of purpose, and in private life his sweet temper exercised a peculiar fascination; but a certain moral weakness taints his whole career, and leaves his character one of the most difficult to estimate in history.

Crayford is a village in Kent, about thirteen miles from London, and is usually identified with Creccanford, where, in 457 (P), the Britons were entirely routed by Hengist and Æsc.

Anglo-Saxon Chron.

Crecy, THE BATTLE OF (Aug. 26, 1346), was fought between the English, under King Edward III., and the French, commanded by Philip VI. The English army had landed on the coast of Normandy, near La Hogue, on July 12, and Edward had then intended to cross the Seine, march through Picardy into Artois, and there join his Flemish auxiliaries, who had already crossed the French frontier. But when he arrived at Rouen, he found the bridges over the Seine broken, and the French army on the opposite shore. Edward marched along the river almost to the suburbs of Paris, and burnt St. Germain and Neuilly, and at length (Aug. 17) by a stratagem succeeded in crossing the river near Pontoise, advanced towards the Somme, and crossed at Blanchetaque, near Abbeville. Not far from this town, at Crecy, he halted, and allowed the French to come up (Aug. 26). The army was drawn up the following morning in three divisions. The first, under the command of the Black Prince (or rather of the Earls of Warwick and Oxford), consisted of 800 men-at-arms, 1,000 Welshmen, and 2,000 archers. The second division, placed behind them, and slightly on their flank, consisted of 1,200 archers and a body of men-at-arms. The third division was held in reserve under the king, on some slightly rising ground in the rear, and consisted of 2,000 archers and 700 men-at-arms. According to Froissart, the whole army did not amount to more than 8,000 men; but this estimate is probably much too low. The French forces are computed at from 60,000 to 120,000. The French army marched from Abbeville at sunrise, and arrived at Crecy in considerable confusion. The battle was begun by the advance of a large body (stated at 15,000) of Genoese, armed with crossbows. But the Genoese fell into disorder before the shooting of the English archers. The French cavalry, under the Duke of Alençon, then fell upon the English first and second divisions. After a desperate conflict, during which the king was more than once requested to bring up the reserves, the French cavalry retired in the greatest disorder, and Philip himself fled from the field. The French fought on in a desultory manner till night, and not till the following morning was it discovered that the French army was completely scattered and routed. Many thousands of Frenchmen were found dispersed about the field, and were slain. Their whole loss consisted of 1,200 knights and a number of inferior rank estimated at 30,000, the most distinguished being John, King of Bohemia.

The most interesting and detailed account of the battle is in Froissart, c. 136. [S. J. L.]

Creones, THE, were an ancient Celtic tribe, who dwelt on the west coast of Ross.

Cressingham, HUGH (d. 1297), was appointed Treasurer of Scotland by Edward I. in 1296, at the same time that the Earl of Surrey was appointed Guardian. He carried out to the best of his ability the command of the English king that Scotland was to be reduced to a state of order, and as a consequence was hated by the Scotch. He was slain at the battle of Stirling, which was lost by the English in a great measure owing to his precipitancy.

Crevant, THE BATTLE OF (July 31, 1423), was won by the English and Burgundian troops, under the Earl of Salisbury and others, against a combined force of French and Scotch, and levies from Spain and Lombardy. The English were completely victorious, and Buchan, the Constable of France, was taken prisoner. This victory, which was fought on the banks of the Yonne, near Auxerre, saved Burgundy from invasion, and greatly crippled the power of the French.

Crichton, SIR WILLIAM, Chancellor of Scotland, was Governor of Edinburgh Castle at the death of James I. (1437). In his endeavours to get possession of the young king's person, he was brought into rivalry with Sir Alexander Livingston, from whom he carried off James II., only, however, to surrender him again on consideration of receiving certain lands as a reward. In conjunction with Livingston, he planned and carried out the murder of William, Earl of Douglas, and his brother. He was for some time at war with the Douglas family, and was besieged by them in Edinburgh Castle.

Crimean War, fought between Russia on the one hand, and England, France, Turkey, and Sardinia on the other, began in 1854, and lasted till 1856. It is called the Crimean War because the main operation of it consisted in the attack made by the allied forces on the peninsula of the Crimea in the south of Russia. The dispute between Russia and Turkey had ostensibly arisen about the guardianship of the Holy Places, especially the Holy Sepulchre, in Jerusalem; but the cause of it lay much deeper. Turkey, the old enemy of Russia, had gradually retired from the countries she had originally conquered, and, as her power decayed, had become more and more unfit to rule over Christian populations. Russia, who had emancipated herself from Tartar thralldom, was deeply interested in protecting the Slavonic races still under Turkish rule, who were of the same blood and origin as herself. She also had a natural desire to extend her power to the Dardanelles, and to open a way for her commerce into the Mediterranean. The Emperor Nicholas wrote of Turkey as "a sick man dying," and his plan for dividing his possessions included the formation of the Danubian principalities, Servia and Bulgaria, into principalities under the suzerainty of Russia, and the occupation of Egypt and Candia by England. Constantinople was to be held neither by Russia, France, England, nor Greece. Sir Stratford Canning, the English ambassador at Constantinople, was an enemy of Russia. The Emperor of the French was desirous of a European war for the consolidation of his throne. On July 2, 1853, the Russian troops crossed the river Pruth, and occupied the principalities. On November 1, war was declared, and on the 30th of the same month the Turkish fleet was destroyed in the harbour of Sinope. Lord Aberdeen, the Prime Minister, strained every nerve to preserve peace, but Lord Palmerston, Foreign Secretary, declared that he would resign, unless a strong course against Russia were adopted. The country gradually "drifted into war." On Feb. 27, 1854, an ultimatum was sent by our government, which declared that unless the Russian troops retired behind the river Pruth before the end of April, it would be considered as a declaration of war. No reply was made, and the war took its course. Austria and Prussia contracted an offensive and defensive alliance, by which they guaranteed each other's possessions in case of attack. They also prepared their forces in readiness for war. The alliance between England and France was signed on April 10. The plan of operations was very simple. As Russia could be attacked only in her extremities, and England could act only upon a sea base, there were not many places into which the two combatants could come into conflict. A fleet sailed into the Baltic, under Admiral Napier, with great expectations of success, which were not realised. On Sept. 14 the allied forces landed in the Crimea. They consisted of 24,000 English, 22,000 French, and 8,000 Turks. Their object was to capture Sebastopol, a powerful fortress, which the Russians had recently constructed at great expense. On Sept. 20 the Russians were defeated by the allied armies at the passage of the Alma. It might have been possible to have taken Sebastopol by a coup de main, but it was thought more prudent to besiege it from the south. A brilliant flank march was executed, and the harbour of Balaklava was occupied by the English as a base of operations. On October 25 was fought the battle of Balaklava, signalled by the famous charge of the six hundred light cavalry upon the Russian guns, from which few returned alive, and the far more effective charge of the heavy cavalry, under General Scarlett. On Nov. 5 the English troops were attacked in the early morning by large masses of Russians, and held their ground with great steadiness until the afternoon. This was the battle of Inkerman, in which we lost 2,612 killed and wounded, and the Russians, it is said, 12,000. The winter tried our troops severely, encamped as they were on a bleak plateau. Notwithstanding the devotion of Miss Florence Nightingale in nursing the sick, the supply of hospital accommodation was insufficient, and the commissariat broke down. This caused great indignation in England, and Lord Aberdeen was succeeded as Prime Minister by Lord Palmerston. In December the allied fleet in the Baltic was broken up, and returned home; and on March 2 the Emperor of Russia died. This caused but a slight hope of peace; the fleet returned to the Baltic on April 4, and the bombardment of Sebastopol began five days later. On June 7 the French succeeded in carrying the Mamelon, one of the Sebastopol forts, but an attack made by the allied forces on the Redan and the Malakhoff forts, on June 18, was unsuccessful; and on June 28 Lord Raglan, the English commander-in-chief, died. On August 16 the French distinguished themselves greatly in the battle of the Tchernaya. After a month's incessant bombardment, a final attack was made on the works on Sept. 5, the result of which was that the Russians evacuated Sebastopol, and retreated to the north side of the harbour. They blew up their forts as far as they could, and left their wounded behind them. The news reached England on Sept. 10. This practically put an end to the war in the Crimea. Before the end of the year negotiations for peace were begun by the friendly intervention of Austria. The French government were even more anxious for a settlement than the English. The points on which Russia found it most difficult to make concessions were the limitation of her power in the Black Sea, and the cession of a part of Bessarabia to Roumania. The Peace of Paris was signed on Sunday, March 20, 1856. The last English forces left the Crimea on July 12. The English lost 24,000 soldiers during the war, the French 63,500, and the Russians, it is said, 500,000. The war added £41,000,000 to the National Debt.

[O. B.]

The history of the war has been narrated in great detail by Mr. Kinglake, in his Invasion of the Crimea.

Crinan (CRINAN, d. 1045), lay Abbot of Dunkeld, was a powerful and warlike chieftain, who married a daughter of Malcolm I., by whom he had a son, Duncan, King of Scotland 1034—1040. Crinan, who was also known as Hundi Jarl (the hound earl), was slain in battle (1045) whilst fighting against Macbeth. His son Maldred was the father of the famous Gospatrick, Earl of Northumbria.

Crofts (OR CROFT), SIR JAMES (d. 1590), was in 1553 made Deputy of Ireland, his tenure of office being marked by the distress suffered by the country owing to the debasement of coinage. In 1554 he took arms against Queen Mary in Sir Thomas Wyatt's rebellion, and for this was sent to the Tower. Under Elizabeth, Crofts became commander on the Scottish border, and in 1560 crossed the border with the English expedition under Lord Grey, and visited the regent, Mary of Guise, at Edinburgh, with the object of arranging the preliminaries of a peace. His mismanagement at the assault on Leith in 1560 caused the repulse of the English, and in consequence Crofts was deprived of his command and sent to London. He subsequently played a prominent part in parliamentary life, was made Controller of the Queen's Household, and became a paid agent of the King of Spain, to whom he made important revelations, though the influence he had acquired over Elizabeth prevented his paying the just penalty of his treachery. He was a commissioner at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots in 1586.

Cromwell, BRIDGET (b. 1624, d. 1681), was the eldest daughter of Oliver Cromwell. She is described as being "a gloomy enthusiast, and so bigoted a republican that she even grudged her father the title of Protector." She married in 1647 Henry Ireton (q.v.), and subsequently Charles Fleetwood (q.v.).

Cromwell, ELIZABETH (b. 1629, d. 1658), was the second and favourite daughter of the Protector. She is said, notwithstanding her parentage, to have been firmly attached to the Royal cause, and it is certain that she frequently interceded on behalf of Royalist prisoners. She was married in 1646 to John Claypole, a Northamptonshire gentleman, who survived her.

Cromwell, HENRY (b. 1628, d. 1673), was the youngest son of Oliver Cromwell. He entered the Parliamentary army in 1642, and before he was twenty obtained a troop in Fairfax's life-guards. In 1649 he attained the rank of a colonel, and accompanied his father to Ireland. He was a member of the "Barebones" Parliament of 1653, and in 1655, after being sent over to Ireland to observe the condition of affairs in that country, was shortly afterwards made Lord Deputy. His government of Ireland was exceedingly popular, and the moderation and justice of his measures pleased all except the extreme men on either side. On the death of his father he was deprived of much of his power in Ireland, and was made Lord-Lieutenant instead of Lord Deputy, and on the triumph of the Parliamentary party over the Protector he was superseded. He now retired into private life, and at the Restoration was allowed to remain unmolested. He spent most of his time at his estate in Cambridge-shire.

Cromwell, OLIVER (b. April 25, 1599, d. Sept. 3, 1658), was a native of Huntingdon, the son of Robert Cromwell and Elizabeth Steward, and connected by blood with the family of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex.

He was educated at Huntingdon School, and at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, where he entered as a fellow-commoner on April 23, 1616. On his father's death in the following year he returned home, married Elizabeth Bourchier (Aug., 1620), and settled down to farm his own lands. He was elected member for Huntingdon in 1628, and complained against the Bishop of Winchester for silencing controversial preaching. In the Short Parliament and the Long Parliament he represented Cambridge, and soon attained considerable influence. It has been ascertained that within the first ten months of the Long Parliament Cromwell was specially appointed to eighteen committees, exclusive of various appointments which he shared with the knights and burgesses generally of the eastern counties. He moved the second reading of the Annual Parliament Bill (Dec. 30, 1640), and was one of those who drew up the Root and Branch Bill. On religious questions he was specially active, and he had decided to emigrate if the Grand Remonstrance had not passed. He was also one of the foremost in laying hands on the executive power, and moved (Nov. 6, 1641) to entrust the Earl of Essex with power over the trained bands till Parliament should take further order. In the summer of 1642 he commenced arming and drilling the Cambridge Trained Bands, and seized the plate of that university to prevent it from being carried to the king. He served at Edgehill at the head of the troop of horse which he had raised, and is mentioned by Fiennes as doing good service. In January, 1643, he secured the town of Cambridge, and arrested the Royalist sheriff of Hertfordshire. In March he suppressed a rising at Lowestoft; in April he raised the siege of Crowland; on May 13 defeated the Royalists of Newark at Grantham; in July he retook Stamford, captured Burleigh House, and relieved Gainsborough. His services were recognised by his appointment as Governor of the Isle of Ely, and second in command of the army of the Eastern Association, which his activity had made it possible to form (Aug., 1643). Next month he joined the cavalry of Sir Thomas Fairfax, in Lincolnshire, and helped to gain the victory of Wincheby, where he commanded the van (Oct. 11, 1643). In the following year he led the left wing at Marston Moor, which, after driving Prince Rupert's division from the field fell on Newcastle's foot in the centre and decided the victory. He was also present at the second battle of Newbury (Oct. 27, 1644), and a month later charged his commander, the Earl of Manchester, with slackness in making use of the advantages then gained. Lest the war should be protracted by the self-interest or incapacity of members of Parliament, he supported the Self-denying Ordinance, and the formation of a regular army officered by professional soldiers. In spite of that law, his services were too valuable to be dispensed with. In February, 1645, he was sent on an expedition into the west under Waller. When he returned to resign his command he was ordered into Oxfordshire to intercept a convoy going to Oxford, which he performed at Islip (April 24th). On May 10th he was continued in his command for forty days longer, and Fairfax was authorised to appoint him to command the horse, and this appointment was confirmed and extended from time to time. At Naseby he commanded the right wing, totally routed the forces opposed to him, and, keeping his troopers well in hand, led them against the king's centre with equal success. With Fairfax he then went into the west, was present at the storming of Bristol, and at the battle of Langport. Winchester, Basing House, and other fortresses were taken by him, and he took part in the siege of Oxford. During these three years Cromwell had also become the head of a political party. From the moment he took up arms he had sought to enlist men with a religious spirit in them, thinking them the only men able to oppose gentlemen of honour and courage. What their particular form of creed was he cared little. "The state," he declared, "in choosing men to serve it, takes no notice of their opinions; if they be willing to serve it faithfully, that suffices." His enemies termed him "the great Independent," and saw in him the champion of the opposition to the imposition of Presbyterian orthodoxy on England. This question of toleration, with two other questions then at issue between the army and the Parliament—the right of the soldiers to be fairly paid for their services, and their claim to have a voice in making a safe and proper settlement with the king—brought him into opposition with the Parliament. Matters came to a crisis when, in the spring of 1647, Parliament voted the disbandment of the army. Cromwell did his best to prevent a rupture, attempted to mediate and reconcile, and when these attempts failed and he found himself in danger of arrest, cast in his lot with Fairfax and the army (June 3, 1647). After the exclusion of the eleven members he took an active part in the debates of the Commons and the negotiations with the king. There he endeavoured to fix a limit to the establishment of Presbyterianism (Oct. 13), and supported the continuance of the negotiations with the king in spite of his rejection of the nineteen propositions. He hoped to come to an agreement with Charles on the basis of the new propositions, which were a compromise between the demands of the army and the Parliament. Even after the king's flight (Nov. 3) he still continued this policy, until the rejection of the four Bills (Dec. 28, 1647), and the outbreak of the second Civil War, May, 1648, taught him the impossibility of trusting Charles. Probably, in March or April, 1648, at a prayer meeting of the officers at Windsor, where Cromwell was present, it was decided to call the king to account as soon as peace was restored. Then he marched against the Welsh insurgents (May), took Pembroke (July 11), hurried north to meet the Scots, and totally defeated them at Preston and Warrington (Aug. 17—19, 1648). He was still in the north, when the army again seized the king, and put an end to the Newport Treaty; nor had he any part in Pride's Purge, though he approved of both these acts. He was present every day during the king's trial, and his name stands third amongst the fifty-nine attached to the warrant. Naturally he was nominated one of the Council of State, but as he was appointed commander of the army destined for Ireland (March 15), he could not long take part in their sittings. He landed at Dublin August 15, 1649. The storming of Drogheda (Sept. 10) was followed by the massacre of the garrison, which Cromwell justified: first, as a righteous judgment of God; secondly, as tending to prevent the effusion of blood for the future. Trim, Dundalk, and other towns were at once abandoned; Arklow and Enniscorthy terrified into surrender; Wexford held out, and shared the fate of Drogheda; and the campaign closed with the unsuccessful siege of Waterford. In seven months Leinster had been regained. In the following spring, Kilkenny (March 28, 1650) and Clonmel (May 9) were taken. At the end of May Cromwell returned to England, to command—as Fairfax refused to do so—the army ordered to invade Scotland. For about a month the forces of Cromwell and Lesley manoeuvred round Edinburgh, the Scots refusing to give battle, the English declining to attack positions too strong for them. At the end of August Cromwell was forced to retreat to Dunbar, where Lesley attacked him, and was routed with the loss of 3,000 men killed, and 10,000 prisoners (Sept. 3, 1650). Edinburgh and Leith fell into Cromwell's hands; the west of Scotland followed, and before Christmas all the country south of the Forth was in his possession. From February to June, 1651, he was ill, and his army inactive. On June 25th he marched against Lesley, who was posted at Stirling, and failing to dislodge him, crossed into Fifeshire, subsequently capturing Perth (Aug. 2). The king's army marched straight into England, and established itself at Worcester, where Cromwell attacked and destroyed it (Sept. 3, 1652). The great influence these services gave him, Cromwell used to secure as speedily as possible the settlement the country so much needed. In less than a fortnight after his victory he raised the question of a new Parliament (Sept. 16), and succeeded in inducing the House to fix a limit for its own power. He became an active member of the commission for law reform, a very zealous supporter of the "Bill for General Pardon and Oblivion," and the champion of freedom of conscience in the committee for the propagation of the gospel. His great object was to use his influence and his position to secure the speedy meeting of the new reformed Parliament, which, according to the decision of the Rump, was not to meet till Nov., 1654. The impatience of the army urged him on, and a petition from the Council of Officers (Aug. 13, 1652) demanded more alacrity in the necessary reforms. The bill which was to settle the constitution of the new assembly seemed to Cromwell and the officers to be meant rather to perpetuate and recruit the Rump than to secure these reforms. He therefore endeavoured to stop this bill by agreement, or to persuade the Parliament to delegate their powers; and when he found them still hurrying through the objectionable bill, he put an end to their sitting (April 20, 1653). The result of this action was the separation of the civil and military elements of the republican party, and the continued refusal of the former (with some considerable exceptions) to recognise the authority of the other as legitimate. Cromwell and the Council of Officers began by appointing a Council of State of thirteen persons (April 29—July 4, 1653). Then a representative assembly of Puritan notables was summoned by the Council of Officers, to effect the necessary reforms. But its reforming zeal seemed to threaten the foundations of law and religion, so the more conservative members resigned their authority into the hands which had entrusted it to them (July 4—Dec. 12, 1653). The Council of Officers renewed their deliberations under Oliver Cromwell's presidency, and decided to make a single person head of the government. Cromwell was accordingly installed Lord Protector (Dec. 16, 1653), to govern with the aid of a permanent Council and a Parliament, to be summoned every three years. For nine months Protector and Council governed, raised money, and legislated without a Parliament. His first Parliament met on September 3rd, 1654, and immediately called in question the "Instrument" of government, and claimed to revise the constitution and limit the Protector's powers. In spite of the exclusion of a hundred members, it persisted in this claim, and Cromwell dissolved it (Jan. 22, 1655). He had to struggle not only against discontented republicans, but against fresh outbreaks of the Royalists. He replied by a further development of military rule, and by partially abandoning his policy of toleration. England was divided (Aug., 1655) into twelve military districts, governed by major-generals, the expenses of whose administration were supplied by an income tax on Royalists, and the public services of the Church of England were suppressed (Nov., 1655). Abroad, however, the prospect was more favourable.

Cromwell had signalled the first months of his rule by the conclusion of advantageous treaties with Holland (April 5, 1654), Sweden (April 28), Portugal (July 10), and Denmark. Spain and France contended for his alliance. His influence forced Savoy to restore the privileges of the Vaudois (Aug. 19, 1655); the conquest of Jamaica announced his rupture with Spain, and a treaty of commerce sealed his friendship with France (Oct. 24, 1655). These successes, and the desire to obtain some constitutional sanction for his government, led Cromwell to call a second Parliament (Sept. 17, 1656). The preliminary exclusion of about a hundred refractory members secured a more docile assembly, in deference to whose vote Cromwell gave up his institution of the major-generals. They went on to revise the constitution, to establish a new House of Lords, and to offer Cromwell the title of king. His refusal of the title, mainly dictated by the opposition of the army, did not prevent him from accepting their constitutional amendments, and he was again, with legally defined powers, installed as Protector (June 26, 1657). But the House of Commons, whose composition was materially altered by the admission of the excluded members and the absence of the new lords, rejected the authority of the other House, and Cromwell indignantly dissolved it (Jan. 20, 1658). This confusion at home was perhaps compensated by brighter prospects abroad. If his plan for the union of the Protestant powers failed, the alliance with France ripened into an offensive and defensive league against Spain, and the battle of Dunkirk (June 4, 1658) made his arms renowned through Europe. Cromwell's vigour was now beginning to decay, and being attacked by a fever, he died Sept. 3, 1658. Cromwell's person and character are thus described by a gentleman of his household:—"His body was well compact and strong; his stature under six foot (I believe about two inches); his head so shaped as you might see it a store-house and shop both of a vast treasury of natural parts. His temper exceeding fiery, as I have known, but the flame of it kept down for the most part, or soon allayed with those moral endowments he had. He was naturally compassionate towards objects in distress, even to an effeminate measure; though God had made him a heart wherein was left little room for any fear, but what was due to himself, of which there was a large proportion, yet did he exceed in tenderness towards sufferers. A larger soul, I think, hath seldom dwelt in a house of clay than his was." "He was a strong man," adds another observer; "in the dark perils of war, in the high places of the field, hope shone in him like a pillar of fire when it had gone out in all the others." Cromwell, RALPH, LORD (d. 1455), was one of the Council of Regency during Henry VI.'s minority. He sided with Beaufort against Gloucester; in the year 1443 he was appointed Treasurer, and held this important office for ten years, during which time he showed considerable financial ability. In 1449 an attempt was made to assassinate him, which he attributed to Suffolk, to whom he was bitterly opposed. He supported the Lancastrian party, but died shortly after the first battle of St. Albans.

Cromwell, RICHARD (b. 1626, d. 1712), third son of the Protector, was educated at Felstead School, entered at Lincoln's Inn 1647, and married Dorothy Mayor 1649. During his father's life he lived as a private gentleman in the country. In July, 1657, he was elected, after his father's resignation, Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and about the same time he was admitted into the Council of State. His father on his death-bed nominated him as his successor, and he was accepted as such in England and by the European powers. In his new position he is said to have carried himself discreetly, and better than was expected. A Parliament was assembled on Jan. 27, 1659, which recognised him as Protector, but the republican minority, headed by Vane and Haselrig, united with the officers of the army, headed by Lambert, Fleetwood, and Desborough, to force him to dissolve Parliament (April 22, 1659). His supporters urged him to meet force by force, but he replied, "I will not have a drop of blood spilt for the preservation of my greatness, which is a burden to me." He signed a formal abdication (May, 1659), in return for which the restored Rump undertook the discharge of his debts. After the Restoration he fled to the Continent, where he remained for twenty years, returning in 1680.

Cromwell, THOMAS, EARL OF ESSEX (d. 1540). The early life of Thomas Cromwell is obscure, and the various stories told concerning it are scarcely consistent. He is said to have been the son of a blacksmith at Putney. In early youth he served as a common soldier in the wars of Italy. He began a commercial career with a Venetian trader; next he was a clerk at Antwerp, and then a wool merchant at Middleburgh, in Zealand. He returned to England, and did business as a scrivener, being half lawyer, half money-lender. He lent money to the poor nobles, who at the extravagant court of Henry VIII. were often reduced to sore straits. While engaged in these pursuits he showed great aptitude for business, and became widely known. In 1524 he was employed by Cardinal Wolsey to manage the details of business connected with the suppression of the smaller monasteries and the foundation of Wolsey's Colleges at Ipswich and Oxford. In this occupation Cromwell showed himself unscrupulous, and became very unpopular. On Wolsey's fall, in 1529, he showed his extreme cleverness by using his fidelity to a fallen master as a means of promoting his own interests. He advised Wolsey to buy off the malice of his enemies by judicious grants of pensions out of the revenues of his bishopric. In carrying out these arrangements he commended himself to many powerful friends, and prepared the way for passing over to the service of the king. He suggested to Henry VIII. that he should settle the divorce question by declaring himself supreme head of the Church of England, and prosecuting the matter in his own ecclesiastical courts. The advice struck Henry. He made Cromwell a member of the Privy Council, and soon afterwards a Secretary of State. Cromwell devoted his energies to raising the royal power above all other authority, and establishing by its means a new order of things. His political text-book, according to Cardinal Pole, was Machiavelli's Principe. He looked to the strong hand of absolutism to work reforms. By his advice the royal supremacy was declared, appeals to Rome were forbidden, and the king's divorce was pronounced by the Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1534 the Act of Supremacy vested authority in matters ecclesiastical solely in the crown, and in the next year Cromwell was appointed "Vicar-General," or the king's vicegerent in matters ecclesiastical. He was already Chancellor, so that he now held in his own hands the chief authority in things secular and spiritual. Cromwell set himself to reduce the Church into obedience to the crown. He humbled the bishops by treating them as royal officials. He struck at the wealth of the Church by ordering a general visitation of the religious houses. In consequence of the report of the visitors, the lesser monasteries, to the number of 400, were suppressed, and their revenues granted to the crown. Cromwell's hand was felt everywhere. He directed the clergy what they were to preach about, and revoked the licences of those who would not obey. His spies filled the land, and words of discontent were wrested into proofs of conspiracy, and met with condign punishment. The execution of More and Fisher taught men that they were to expect no mercy unless they obeyed. The northern rebellion was crushed, and led to the suppression of the remaining monasteries. But when Cromwell's success seemed certain, there came a reaction. The violence of the advanced Protestant party awakened general discontent. Henry VIII. found that in following Cromwell he had become allied with doctrines which he was not prepared to accept. The Act of Six Articles (1539) marked a Catholic reaction, which seriously affected Cromwell's position. But it was the progress of foreign affairs which brought about his fall. The changes which had been made in England were viewed with anger by the Emperor Charles V., who was hindered from interfering in England only by his war with France. Henry VIII. trusted to his French alliance; but as France also looked suspiciously on the new English policy, Cromwell sought a new alliance with the Lutheran princes of Germany. He hoped to make a strong coalition, by which France, England, and the German Lutherans should unite to crush the power of the house of Austria. As an earnest of this policy, he laboured for the marriage of Henry VIII. with Anne, daughter of the Duke of Cleves, and niece of John Frederick, Elector of Saxony, who was the head of the Smalcaldic League. He carried his point, and received a new sign of the royal favour by being created Earl of Essex. But the marriage with Anne of Cleves was unsuccessful both on personal and political grounds. Henry VIII. was disappointed in his new wife, and conceived an aversion for her. The political schemes of Cromwell did not prosper. France drew nearer to the Emperor; the Lutheran princes still held by their principle of passive resistance, and showed no signs of taking active measures. Henry VIII. was willing to allow his minister full power so long as he succeeded; at the first sign of failure, at the first appearance of difficulty to himself, he remorselessly sacrificed his favourite. Cromwell had few friends, and his disgrace was a sure means of bringing back the king's popularity. On June 10, 1540, Cromwell was arrested in the Council Chamber on the charge of high treason. A bill of attainder was rapidly passed through Parliament. Cromwell was not allowed to speak in his own defence, and was executed on July 28, 1540. Cromwell lived simply, and devoted himself entirely to his political occupations. His influence over the king was supreme while he was in power, and the separation of the English Church from the Papacy was due entirely to his skilfully devised measures. He was resolute and unscrupulous, with a clearly-defined policy. But he advanced too fast, till he stood absolutely alone, and when he lost the royal favour he had nothing on which to fall back. He risked everything on the marriage of Henry VIII. with Anne of Cleves. Had Anne been personally attractive to the king, Cromwell's policy might have developed results of more permanent influence.

Cropredy Bridge, THE BATTLE OF (June 29, 1644), was fought near Banbury, between the Royalists, led by Charles I. in person, and a part of the Parliamentary forces, commanded by Sir William Waller, whose attempt to cross the Cherwell and attack the king's troops in the rear proved unsuccessful. The loss on the side of the Parliament was very considerable.

Crowland, or CROYLAND, a town of Lincolnshire, about eight miles north-east of Peterborough, is the site of a great abbey founded in 714 by Ethelbald of Mercia. It was burnt by the Danes in 870, restored by King Ethelred II., and again burnt in 1091. In 1112 it was a second time restored on a scale of considerable splendour. [For CROWLAND CHRONICLES see INGULPHUS.]

Crown, THE. In England monarchy was one direct product of the Anglo-Saxon conquest in the fifth and sixth centuries. In their German home the Saxons were ruled by elected magistrates (caldormen) in time of peace, and led to battle by elected generals (heretoga), whose authority expired with the war. Unlike their old tribal forays, the expedition to Britain entailed a chronic struggle between natives and invaders, which lasted several generations; and as the duration of the heretoga's exceptional powers were defined by the duration of the war, the mere force of circumstances now rendered those powers permanent. This change, amounting to the creation of a new office, was recognised, and sanctioned by the adoption of a title already in use amongst other Teutonic tribes, the title King, or Cyn-ing (head of the kin). The new king was ealdorman and heretoga in one; he was still elected, but the danger of interregnum in the presence of an endless war leading to the practice of electing his successor in his lifetime, the influence of the victorious general was usually sufficient to secure his son's nomination. The prescription thus established gradually confined the national choice to descendants of the first king, and myth soon explained and hallowed the preference by investing them with the halo of a divine pedigree. Christianity swept away the claim to descent from Woden, but more than compensated by the introduction of Old Testament ideas and the example of the Empire. The king, who had hitherto differed from his subjects only in degree, began to assume the style and arrogate the pretensions of the Byzantine court. The oath of homage taken by his thanes was assimilated to the sacramentum (or Roman oath of military obedience, originally taken by the army alone, but extended later to the holders of civil office, and finally to all subjects), and by the time of the reign of Edmund had become the oath of allegiance exacted from every freeman of full age. The king was now lord of the race (cynne-klaford): plots against his life were punishable, like treason against any klaford (lord), with death and forfeiture; and finally, the Statute of Treasons, 25 Ed. III., by abolishing this penalty for petty treason, left the king on a constitutional pinnacle, no longer the first among equals.

It is from this fusion of Imperial and Teutonic ideas that the theory prevalent in most European systems of law has sprung. The lawyers distinguish carefully between two kings—the ideal and the real. The former is the state: the fountain of legislation, of justice, of honour; i.e., the despot of Imperial law. This ideal person resides from time to time in the real king, who is subject to all the imperfections of human nature, and represents the Teutonic head of the kin, limited by the caprice and free instincts of his subjects. The relation of these two persons forms the main subject of constitutional history, their identification leading to despotism, their separation to limited monarchy. In England that separation is enshrined in the famous resolution of 1642, in which the Lords and Commons declare themselves a “council . . . to provide for the necessities . . . of the kingdom, and to declare the king's pleasure in those things that are requisite thereunto, and that what they do therein hath the stamp of royal authority, although his Majesty, seduced by evil counsel, do in his own person oppose or interrupt.” This victory was mainly the result of financial struggles.

THE REVENUES OF THE CROWN were of two kinds, ordinary and extraordinary: i.e., those which belonged to the crown in its own right, and those which came as a free gift from its subjects; and their history is the history of the absorption of the ordinary by the extraordinary. The former consisted of (1) the rents of crown lands (1,422 manors at the date of the Domesday Survey, 1086); (2) purveyance (the right exercised on royal progresses of buying at the lowest prices, and using forced labour); (3) feudal incidents (the three regular aids, escheat, forfeiture, relief, marriage, wardship); (4) customs on imported goods (price paid by foreign merchants for the protection of the royal peace). The latter consisted of (1) aids granted by the free tenants and clergy; (2) tallage, a tax taken from towns lying in the ancient demeane (its true character is shown by the alternative name, donum). The crusade of Richard I., the wickedness of John, and the weakness of Henry III., impaired the ordinary revenue at a time when difficulties with France were yearly augmenting the expenditure. Edward I. met the deficiency of the one by an expansion of the other. To this end he remodelled Parliament, introducing representatives of the tax-paying classes, the country gentry, and the city merchants; and so rapidly did the power of the new assembly grow, that in 1276 it confirmed to the king the old customs on wool and leather, known thenceforth as “magna et antiqua custuma : ” a grant which at one blow transferred customs from the hereditary to the parliamentary revenue. In 1660, the abolition of feudal tenures and of purveyance narrowed the former down to the proceeds of the crown estates; and these have in their turn been resigned in consideration of a fixed pension. At first the powers of Parliament were limited to the making of the grant, the expending of which lay wholly with the crown; but in 1378, during Richard II.'s minority, that principle of appropriation was introduced (by the provision that the tax granted for the French war should be paid over to two parliamentary treasurers, Philpot and Walworth), which, after a temporary collapse in the period of Tudor and Yorkist despotism, revived under James I., was confirmed by the Commonwealth, adopted as a momentary expedient by the Royalist Parliament (1666), and finally, by the insertion of Lord Somers's Clause (March, 1690), acquired a permanent position as an essential element of the original grant.

THE CROWN WAS THE FOUNT OF LAW. “Lex fit consensus populi, constitutions regis,” the maxim of the Teutonic empire was also the theory of the English constitution, and endured in its original freshness till in Henry VI.'s reign the Commons adopted the form of bill instead of the older petition. Yet though this change practically reversed the legislative position of king and Commons, the old maxim still represents the legal theory. The crown was also the Fount of Justice. This principle is of somewhat later origin, the shire and hundred courts in their earliest form deriving authority, not from the king, but from the nation. Even so late as the reign of Henry III., the king might be sued in his own courts by a writ of the form “Præcipe Henrico Regi Angliæ ; ” nor was it till the present century that the abolition of private appeals in criminal cases left the crown sole prosecutor, and removed the last limitation on the royal right of pardon. The process by which the national courts became the king's courts, and the national peace the king's peace, was the work of Norman centralisation operating through the Curia Regis (q.v.). To strengthen the local courts against feudal encroachment, Henry I. occasionally sent justices of the Curia Regis to preside in them. This practice, brought to a system by Henry II., superinduced, to the mutual satisfaction of king and people, the royal upon the national peace, till in the end the second was entirely overgrown and choked by the first. The crown was further the Fount of Honour. In the days of chivalry any knight could confer the honour of knighthood. But with the decay of feudal service the political nobility of the peerage threw the social nobility of the knights completely into the shade. The class which owed title and privilege to the special writ of the crown became far the most prominent in the state; the legal mind soon concluded that the monopoly enjoyed by the crown of conferring the highest dignity must extend a fortiori to all inferior titles of honour.

CROWN SUPREME LANDOWNER. Like justice, the land belonged originally to the nation, part being divided into alodial holdings for the freemen, the rest preserved, under the name of folk-land, as a common stock for future allotments. These were effected by charters granted by the witan and king, and hence were called doc- or charter-land. The king's influence growing with the number of his thanes, the witan came to be regarded as the witness rather than the author of the deed of grant, the folk-land changed insensibly into terra regis, and the thanes into feudal vassals. The Norman Conquest completed the process. By the simple operation of the law, which punished rebellion with forfeiture, alodial tenure had, by the time of the Conqueror's death, disappeared, and every landholder in the kingdom had become a tenant mediate or immediate of the crown. But the growth of the constitutional system and the abolition of feudal tenures (1660) have degraded this once all-important maxim into a legal pleasantry.

SUCCESSION TO THE CROWN. The king, it has been shown, was in early times elected; elected, that is to say, by the witan and accepted by the people, their choice being limited by unwritten custom to the members of a particular family. Primogeniture, the offspring of feudal tenure, did not affect the succession till the king of the people had become also the feudal lord of the soil. Yet so late as 1199, Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, could assert without contradiction, in his opening speech at the coronation of John, that the English king rules not by hereditary right, but in virtue of his election, and that the national voice which gave could also take back the crown. The old form was observed even at the coronation of Charles I. (1625), of presenting the new king to the crowd at the four corners of a raised platform, and demanding their assent to his nomination. The ground won by the solemn deposition of two kings, Edward II. and Richard II., seemed lost in the Yorkist reaction, but the accession of Henry VII. brought in a fresh parliamentary dynasty, and though the Stuarts for a time forced on the nation the absolutist maxims of the Scotch court, the triumph of the popular party was in the end complete, and the Revolution (1688) established for ever the constitutional principle that the King of England is an official and not a proprietary ruler. [KING.]

CROWN, THE WEARING OF THE. As part of the regalia, the crown seems to have been at first nothing more than a fillet of linen or cloth, intended to represent the halo symbolical of deity. Like most of the other regal ornaments, and the general apparatus of court ceremonial, the gold crown was borrowed from the Emperors of the East, who, on the establishment of Christianity as the state religion, claimed for themselves the theocratic position of the ancient Jewish kings. The crown has been worn by the English monarchs—

(1) At their Coronation. After the administration of the coronation oath by the Archbishop of Canterbury, a special service is celebrated in Westminster Abbey, in the course of which the Dean of Westminster solemnly anoints the new king with holy oil, the great dignitaries invest him with the regalia, the imposition of the crown, performed by the archbishop himself, constituting the essential act of investiture. At that moment "the trumpets sound, the drums beat, and the people with loud and repeated shouts cry 'God save the king!'" A signal is also given from the battlements of the church, at which the twenty-one great guns in St. James's Park are fired, and also the ordnance of the Tower."

(2) In the Norman and Angevin periods at the Courts or Parliaments held on the three great Church festivals of the year, Christmas, Easter, and Michaelmas. Edward I. first omitted the custom, "saying merrily," that "crowns do rather ornerate than honour princes."

The regalia used for the coronation were, till the Reformation, kept in the custody of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, both for security and as an assertion of the national character of investiture. On the dissolution of the monasteries, they were transferred from the national to the royal keeping in the Tower. The Long Parliament destroyed them, as a protest against monarchical government. On the Restoration a new set was made, which exists at the present day.

[H. R. R.]

Crown Lands were in pre-Norman times of wide extent, all the folk-land (q.v.) gradually becoming terra regis, and the amount of this was considerably increased by the confiscations of William I. [CROWN.] The re-grants, however, to the king's followers and friends soon reduced the amount of land held by the crown, and under Henry III. it was necessary to pass an Act of resumption, while in the reign of Edward II. an Act was for some time in force forbidding the alienation of crown lands. The royal demesnes were largely increased by forfeitures in the Wars of the Roses, by the acquisitiveness of Henry VII., and by the ecclesiastical confiscations of Henry VIII.; but the necessities of James I. and Charles I., and the action of the Long Parliament, disposed of all the royal estates, which were only recovered in part by the Parliamentary sales being declared void at the Restoration. The wholesale granting away of the crown lands has a distinct constitutional importance, as having compelled the king to apply to Parliament and the nation for his income, which was often granted only on condition of good government. The lavishness of William III. necessitated an Act in the reign of Anne, by which the alienation of crown lands was greatly checked; though, in 1800, this Act was declared not to apply to the private property of the sovereign, acquired by purchase or inheritance from any one not being a sovereign of England. Since George III., the sovereign on his accession has always surrendered the crown lands to be disposed of by Parliament, like the other revenues of the state, for the public service; their superintendence lies with the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues.

Crusades, THE. The general history of these religious wars does not come within the scope of the present work, but a few words must be said regarding the influence of the Crusades on English history. In the first place, the fact that Robert of Normandy joined the first Crusade and, in his anxiety to raise money for his expedition, pawned Normandy to William Rufus, perpetuated for 120 years the connection of England with that duchy. Again, the eager crusading spirit of Richard I. necessitated his raising money by every expedient. Thus charters were sold to towns many of which thereby obtained privileges which they would otherwise probably never have acquired; the feudal rights of England over Scotland were renounced, and the independence of that kingdom recognised for the first time; offices of all kinds were bought from the king, and the buyers were anxious to recoup themselves out of the pockets of the people. But Richard I.'s Crusade did more than this; not only did the king's absence from England and the oppressive government of his minister Longchamp (q.v.) give John the opportunity of coming forward as the champion of the barons and the people, and thereby of earning for him a popularity which did much to support him when he came to the throne himself, but the heavy taxes imposed in Richard's absence, and the large sum that had to be raised to pay his ransom, combined with the harsh rule of the royal ministers, greatly alienated the people from the king; and whereas, up to this time, there had been an alliance between the king and the people against the oppression and turbulence of the feudal nobles, now parties are changed it is the king who is the oppressor of the people, while the barons come forward as their champions, and thus the way is paved for that alliance which, in the next reign, produced Magna Charta. Of later Crusades the most important in English history is the one led by Richard of Cornwall in 1240; while Edward I., by taking the Cross in 1268, relieves England of the presence of many of the leading nobles whose absence for a while was necessary if the wounds caused by the Barons' War were to be healed. But on the whole the direct influences of the Crusades were felt less in England than in most of the countries of Europe.

Culdees, THE. There has been great controversy both as to the origin and application of the name Culdee. The derivation is probably the Celtic Cele De, worshipper of God (not Cælicola, Cælebs, or Columba, as some have tried to prove). The name does not appear until after the expulsion of the Columban monks from the Pictish kingdom by Nectan Mac Derili in 717; so the Culdees are in no way to be identified with the early Columban monks; they were anchorites rather than monks, practically independent, being under the control of their own abbots, and owing no allegiance to Rome until they were forced to conform by the action of Alexander and David. Mr. Skene says of them, "They originally sprang from that ascetic order who adopted a solitary service of God in an isolated cell as the highest form of religious life, and who were termed Deicolæ. . . . They were finally brought under the canonical rule along with the secular clergy, retaining, however, to some extent, the nomenclature of the monastery, until at length the name of Kaledens or Culdee became almost synonymous with that of 'secular canon.'" The chief Culdee monasteries in Scotland were at Lochleven, St. Andrews, Abernethy, Dunkeld, Brechin, and Dunblane. The Culdees were known in Ireland as early as the ninth century, and continued to exist as a sect of secular priests up to the time of the Reformation. Their chief establishment was at Armagh.

Cullen, CARDINAL (b. 1804, d. 1878), was Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, Primate of Ireland, and Apostolic Delegate. Descended from an ancient Celtic family, he entered the priesthood and became head of the Irish College in Rome, and, for a short time, of the Propaganda. Before he became Primate he had been Archbishop of Dublin. The government owed much to him in the Fenian rising, against which he spoke with great vigour; he also did much to encourage the temperance cause.

Culloden, or DRUMMOSSIE MOOR, was the scene of the closing effort on the part of the Stuarts to regain the English crown.

The Pretender, Charles Edward, commanded an army of Highlanders, who were utterly defeated by the royal troops under the Duke of Cumberland (q.v.). This memorable battle was fought April 16, 1746. [PRETENDER, THE YOUNG; JACOBITES.]

Culpepper, Sir Thomas (d. 1541), was a relative of Catherine Howard, and one of those executed on a confession of having committed adultery with her. Sir Thomas Culpepper, it appears, had not only carried on a criminal correspondence with the queen before her marriage, but had had the hardihood, when the court was staying at Lincoln in 1541, to get introduced, by the agency of Lady Rochford, into the queen's bed-chamber. On inquiries being made as to the queen's conduct both after as well as before her marriage, Culpepper and Lady Rochford were both executed for high treason.

Cumberland, George Clifford, 3rd Earl of (b. 1558, d. 1605), "one of the most remarkable characters of his age," early displayed a taste for naval adventure. In 1586 he inflicted considerable damage on the Portuguese commerce, and two years later commanded a ship in the attack on the Spanish Armada off Calais. He subsequently engaged in several marauding expeditions against the Spaniards, and in 1598 took Porto Rico. The earl, besides being renowned for his dashing exploits by sea, was an accomplished courtier and a great favourite of the queen, by whom he was made a Knight of the Garter, though his character was not altogether free from stain. "Before his death," says Mr. Cunningham, "he had squandered his fortune; nor, high as he may rank as a man of talent, science, enterprise, and chivalry, is his memory as a husband free from the charge of cruelty."

Cumberland, Henry Clifford, 1st Earl of (d. 1542), was famous as the only northern noble who remained loyal to the king's cause during the formidable insurrection of 1536, known as the "Pilgrimage of Grace." His successful defence of Skipton Castle against the vigorous attack of the rebels was an important check to their otherwise triumphant progress through the districts north of the Humber, and considerably advanced him in the confidence and favour of the king. He was created Earl of Cumberland in July, 1526.

Cumberland, William Augustus, Duke of (b. 1721, d. 1766), was the second son of George II. and Queen Caroline. He adopted a military career, and in 1743 was wounded at the battle of Dettingen. In 1745 we find him objecting to his projected marriage with a deformed Dutch princess, and sending to the dying Lord Orford [Walpole] for advice. Orford recommended him to agree, on condition of receiving an ample establishment, which would at once cause the king to drop the project. The plan was successful. In the same year he was appointed commander-in-chief of the allies in Flanders. He fought with distinguished gallantry at the glorious defeat of Fontenoy. He was then recalled to oppose the advance of the Young Pretender through England, and made Lichfield his head-quarters. He was out-maneuvred by the insurgents, however, and the Scotch got between him and London. On their retreat from Derby, he started in pursuit, but was defeated in a skirmish at Clifton, and allowed the Highlanders to retire unmolested. After the defeat at Falkirk, he was appointed commander-in-chief in Scotland, and arrived at Holyrood on Jan. 30, 1746. He utterly defeated Charles Edward at Culloden (q.v.). The defeated Highlanders were treated with great brutality, many of them being put to death in cold blood, and the country was systematically harried. By these cruelties the duke gained the title of "the Butcher." The thanks of Parliament, and a pension of £25,000 a year, were voted him. In 1747 he again commanded in Flanders, but was defeated at the battle of Lawfeldt. Shortly afterwards he transmitted to the French overtures of peace. In 1757 he was sent to command the army in Hanover. He was worsted in July at the battle of Lawfeldt, and his disorganised army being surrounded by the enemy, he was compelled to sign a convention at Closter-Seven. "Here," said George II., when he received him, "is my son, who has ruined me and disgraced himself." The duke promptly resigned his military appointments. For the remainder of his life he lived in seclusion, his chief friend being Henry Fox. In 1766 George III., wishing to rid himself of Grenville and Bedford, applied to his uncle for help. The latter applied to Pitt, but found that statesman, influenced by Temple, inclined to proposals which could not be accepted. The duke, therefore, turned to Whig houses, and prevailed on them to form a ministry, with Rockingham at its head. His death at Windsor was remarkably sudden, although he had previously suffered from a paralytic stroke, and his constitution had been utterly broken. "Of all the members of the royal family," says Mr. Lecky, "with the exception of Queen Caroline, he was the only one who possessed any remarkable ability."

Cumbria—(1) etymologically, is a more correct form of Cambria, and equivalent to Cumberland, i.e., the land of the Cymry or Welsh; (2) historically, is used first in a wider sense to denote the Brythonic district between the Clyde and the Ribble, and west of the Pennine Range and Etrick Forest, which retained its native (Cymric) population after the English Conquest, and became in the sixth century a single state; secondly, in a narrower sense it is confined to the southernmost portion of that district, the modern Cumberland, the northern portion being called Reged and Strathclyde. But Strathclyde (i.e., valley of the Clyde) is also used as equivalent to Cumbria in the wider sense. The dissolution of the Roman power in Britain seems to have led to a reversion to the primitive divisions of the Britons, but the constant pressure of the enemy forced them, no less than the English themselves, to greater union. Hence, by the sixth century, the larger Cumbria was consolidated by Rhydderch Hael (561) into a single state. It had already been, according to one theory, the main seat of the power of Arthur and the Gwledigau, had sent Cunedda to Gwynedd, and had produced the Four Bards, Taliesin, Aneurin, Merddyn, and Llywarch Hen. If the Goidel still ruled in much of North Wales, it was the largest homogeneous British state. In conjunction with the Kings of Scots and North Wales, Rhydderch, in 573, finally defeated the heathen party at the battle of Ardderyd (Arthuret, near Carlisle). He brought Kentigern back from St. Asaph to found the bishopric of Glasgow. Alcluyd, the modern Dumbarton (fort of the Britons), became at once the northernmost stronghold and capital of the state. Carlisle was the chief fortress of its southern portion. The Cumbrian state became so powerful that it attempted before long to attack the Angles of Northumbria; but the terrible Æthelfrith revenged himself by the conquest of Chester and the massacre of the monks of Bangor Iscoed; and as the conquests of Edwin included the two Monas, they could hardly have left out "Strathclyde," as Cumbria was now often called. Whether Cadwallon, the ally of Penda, was or was not a Cumbrian cannot be decided; but his fall, in conjunction with the severance of the communication between Gwynedd and Cumbria, prevented the formation of a single great Welsh state. A long gap in Cumbrian history marks the overlordship of the Northumbrian Bretwaldas. At their fall, kings of the "Strathclyde Wealas" again appear (e.g., their deaths are mentioned in 694 and 722), but they possess only local importance; and the continuance of the Anglian influence in Galloway (q.v.) must have almost cut their state in two. In the ninth century we read of the desolation of Alcluyd by the Danes, and a later Welsh legend speaks of a migration from the Vale of Clyde to the Vale of Clwyd. But the false etymology involved in the identification of two words sufficiently refutes this unlikely story. In the tenth century a line of Scottish princes became rulers of Cumbria, and, in 946, Edmund of Wessex conquered the whole country. He probably annexed the district south of the Derwent, and certainly bestowed all north of that stream on Malcolm, King of Scots, in return for allegiance and help against the Danes. But the connection with England did not cease, at least for the part south of the Solway, which William Rufus, in 1092, annexed to England. Its ruler, Dolfin, was an Englishman, so that, before the possible colonisation of Rufus, which revived Carlisle, almost in ruins since Danish devastations in the eighth century, the Cymric character of the district had not been entirely kept up. The county of Cumberland and bishopric of Carlisle were now founded; but the northern part still remained in the main an appanage of Scotland, and was bestowed by the Scottish kings on their sons. Yet a twelfth century charter speaks of the "Walenses" as a separate race, and it is possible that their speech lingered in remote valleys until the Reformation. The last remnant of Cumbrian independence was confined to the Pictish or Goidelic enclave of Galloway, and their amalgamation with the "Scots" into a single homogeneous nation by the common bond of anti-English feeling was the result of the injudicious legalism of Edward I.

In Celtic Scotland Mr. Skene has collected all that is known of the early political, ecclesiastical, and social history of Cumbria. The same author's Four Ancient Books of Wales collects the remains of the possible Cumbrian bards, and some points of its history are luminously discussed in chap. x. of the Introduction. Curfew, THE, was introduced into England by William the Conqueror. By this custom a bell was rung in every town at eight o'clock in winter and at sunset in summer, when all fires and lights had to be extinguished. This regulation caused a great clamour in England, although the custom was at that time almost universal throughout Europe; it was a call to prayers, an intimation that it was bed-time, and a means of guarding against fire. According to William of Malmesbury, Henry I. allowed candles to be used at court after curfew-bell. The custom of ringing the curfew as an intimation of the approach of night was continued down to the seventeenth century, or even later, though the obligation to extinguish fires had, of course, been long since abandoned.

Curia Regis. The name Curia Regis was at different times applied to three distinct bodies:—(1) The feudal assembly of the tenants-in-chief; (2) the Privy Council, organised under Henry I.; (3) the Court of King's Bench, founded in 1178. (1) In the first signification, the Curia Regis combined the characters of Saxon witan and Norman feudal court, and constituted the Great Council of the Realm, whose consent was required for the imposition of extraordinary taxes and the enactment of new laws, and whose advice on questions of State policy the king was expected at least to consult. In the presence of this body was undertaken every royal measure of national importance, judicial, financial, executive, and legislative, for as yet no distinction between the different functions of government was recognised; and thrice a year, on the great Church festivals, Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, the king wore his crown in a solemn session convened at one of the provincial capitals. (2) But such a body was at once too unwieldy for the prompt despatch of business, and too intermittent to preserve administrative continuity. An inner council soon appeared, the nucleus of which was provided in the royal household, and took shape under Henry I. as the Curia Regis proper. It was practically a committee of the first, entrusted with the administration generally, legislation remaining, of course, with the national council, and composed of the great officers of State, Justiciar, Chancellor, Treasurer; the members of the royal household, Constable, Marshal, &c.; a number of clerks, chosen by the crown. This mixed composition was typical of the character of the body, which in different aspects might be regarded as (a) the Privy Council, (b) a Bureau of Administration, (c) a High Court of Justice, and out of which have sprung all the administrative institutions of the kingdom. In Henry I.'s eyes, finance was at once the end and the means of government. It was in his reign, therefore, that the Curia threw out the first of its many offshoots, the Court of Exchequer, organised by the Great Justiciar, Roger le Poer, Bishop of Salisbury, unless, indeed, the two bodies are parallel developments of the household, sitting in different capacities. From this moment the Curia Regis confines itself mainly to judicial work, and its members are styled Justices. All appeals, such cases of first instance as touched either the royal interest or the rights and conduct of tenants-in-chief, came before this court, whose jurisdiction was further extended by the system of writs to cases in which the customary law of the local courts could give no sufficient remedy. [JUSTICES.] How far the Exchequer and the Curia Regis were co-extensive is uncertain; this at least is known: that every baron of the Exchequer sat also as a justice of the Curia Regis, and that to the intimate connection between the two we owe the system of judicial circuits. The first itinerant visitation by members of the inner council was directed solely to the assessment and collection of the royal dues; but as an important fraction of the revenue was derived from the fines inflicted in criminal cases, one duty of the Treasury officer was to enter the shire court, and hold the pleas of the crown. What was begun by the Exchequer from financial considerations, the Curia Regis continued and extended from motives of policy. It was not, however, till the reorganisation under Henry II., after the anarchy of Stephen's reign, that the system became part of the regular judicial machinery; and on the reservation to the Curia Regis of the three assizes of Novel disseisin (disputed claim to land), Mort d'ancestor (inheritance), Darrein presentation (advowsons), regular circuits were established. [ASSIZES.] (3) The Curia Regis still continued to sit collectively, accompanying the king's movements from place to place. In 1178 the increasing importance of the judicial work induced Henry to establish a separate committee of five judges to hear the pleas of the crown (criminal actions), who were to be fixed to one spot. This is the origin of the Court of King's Bench, the Curia Regis in the third and most restricted sense, "the judicial committee of the conciliar committee of the full Curia Regis." To art. 17 of Magna Charta is due the separation of the third law court, that of Common Pleas (civil actions), which enacts that "The Common Pleas shall not follow our court, but shall be held in some fixed place." But the complete separation of the three bodies by the establishment of a separate staff of justices for each was not accomplished till late in the reign of Henry III.

The Court of Equity is but another offshoot of the Curia Regis. Petitions for redress of the hardships often inflicted by the common law continued to be heard by the king, in the presence of the Privy Council. As these multiplied, it soon became the custom for the Chancellor to arrange them before their submission to the king, and reject the more extravagant. Insensibly, this preliminary sorting assumed greater prominence, till by the reign of Richard II. it superseded the final examination altogether, and the Chancellor's jurisdiction took its place among the regular law courts.

This fecundity, however, did not alter the character, though it impaired the vitality, of the Curia Regis, which, after an intermittent activity during the Lancastrian period, was organised, on the accession of the Tudors, into the Star Chamber, a supreme court, specially directed against the lawlessness of the great feudal houses; and to this day the Privy Council retains, though it never exercises, its ancient judicial competence. As head of the Executive, the Curia Regis is also the lineal ancestor of the present Privy Council, and its infinitely more important offspring, the Cabinet.

CURRAN, JOHN PHILIP (b. 1760, d. 1817), was born of humble parents at Newmarket, county Cork, and in 1776 he was called to the Irish bar. He soon rose to eminence. In 1782 he took silk, and in the following year was returned by a friend for a close borough in Westmeath. He at once took up the popular cause in Parliament, and was soon recognised as one of the most brilliant orators in the assembly. In 1786 Fitzgibbon, the Attorney-General, challenged him to a duel, on account of some sarcastic words which Curran had uttered about him in Parliament. The duel ended without bloodshed, but Fitzgibbon, as Lord Clare, throughout his life did his best to ruin his adversary. In Parliament Curran was, in ability at least, if not in position, the leader of the Whig party, and as such he strongly opposed the measures of Pitt's government with regard to Ireland. During the last four years of the century Curran's voice was constantly heard, both in the courts, defending the leaders of the rebellion, and in Parliament, loudly protesting against the Union. The undying hatred of Lord Clare almost reduced Curran to beggary, since it was a recognised fact that he had no chance of winning a case in Lord Clare's court, and practice rapidly left the great orator. However, in 1806, when Fox came into power, and Ponsonby became Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Curran was appointed Master of the Rolls. In 1814 he retired on a pension. He then visited Paris and London, where he became acquainted with Horne Tooke, Sheridan, and Lord Erskine, his only rival in eloquence at the English bar. He spent the last few years of his life partly in Ireland, partly in this country; but his health was gradually breaking down, and in his enfeebled state his mind gave way, and he put an end to his life at Chelsea on the 13th Oct., 1817. "Mr. Curran's place at the Irish bar," says his biographer, "has not ever been approached since his departure. There is no man, not merely next him, but near him."

Customs first appear in England in the thirteenth century, as the duties levied on wine, wool, and general merchandise. The tax on wine, which was taken in kind, was called prisaige. Wool, the chief source of English wealth, was often made the subject of violent extortion, and the exorbitant toll taken on it was called the maletote. General merchandise was subject to an ad valorem toll. By the Great Charter, art. 41, the king promised liberty of trade according to the ancient and lawful customs, without any maletotes. Much uncertainty prevailed as to the amount which should be levied on merchandise, until the first Parliament of Edward I.,

1275, granted the king a fixed amount on wool, skins, and leather, which is called the custums magna et antiqua. This grant is the constitutional foundation of the customs. To this grant the king, in the Confirmatio Cartarum, 1297, promises to conform. He did not consider that he broke his word by making an arrangement with the foreign merchants for the payment of higher duties both on the export of wool, &c., and on the import of wine and other merchandise. This increase was called the parva, or nova custums. It was abolished and restored in the reign of Edward II., and in the next reign became part of the ordinary revenue, and was recognised by statute. The popularity which attended the early part of the French war caused Parliament to grant the king extraordinary and oppressive customs on wool, which amounted to the maletote. A statute of 1340 provided that this exaction should not be made a precedent, and that the king should take no duties without the consent of his Parliament. During the latter part of his reign he obtained increased customs by arrangement with the merchants. At last, after a considerable struggle, all such arrangements were, in 1362, declared illegal. In the first half of the fourteenth century the customs on wine and merchandise were taken at a certain rate per tun and per pound, by special agreement with merchants and towns. These customs were, in 1373, made the subject of a grant by Parliament, and are then called tunnage and poundage. From the fourth year of Henry IV. to the ninth year of William III. the duty per pound on all export and import merchandise, except wool, &c., was 1s., and for this cause the term subsidy came to denote a general duty of 5 per cent. Henry V. first received the grant of tunnage and poundage for life, and this grant was made to all subsequent sovereigns until the reign of Charles I. In spite of the settlement of the right to levy customs, both Mary and Elizabeth acted on their own authority in the matter. Yet so trifling was the exaction in either case, that the very innovations of these queens seemed to acknowledge the strength of the claim which Parliament had so long upheld. James added fresh "impositions," as these arbitrary customs were called. These impositions were resisted, but were declared legal by the judges in Bate's Case. Their decision was followed by the production in 1608 of a new book of rates, which added imposition to the amount of £70,000 to the lawful customs. Against this usurpation the Commons vigorously protested. When Charles came to the throne, the Commons, for the first time in two hundred years, would not grant tunnage and poundage to the king for life. The king levied the tax without the grant, and (1628) seized the goods of the merchants who refused to pay it. In 1640, however, an Act was passed (16 Car. I., c. 8), declaring that no such payments ought to be imposed without common consent in Parliament. At the Restoration the customs were again granted to the king for life, and a book of rates was authorised by Parliament, and signed by the Speaker. The settlement of the revenue after the Revolution closed the history of the political importance of the customs. By 9 Anne, c. 6, tunnage and poundage became part of the national income, and was made liable for the public debt; and in the reign of George II. the last remnant of the old customs was obliterated by the purchase of the right of prisage from the Duke of Grafton, to whose family it had been granted. The system of levying customs by books of rates, which often caused confusion and loss, was abolished by 27 Geo. III., c. 13, the Customs Consolidation Act, which provided a simple and uniform scheme of taxation. Since that date several alterations have been made in the customs. Among these changes, the most remarkable are those effected by the Customs Tariff Amendment Act of 1860. This was the result of a treaty with France, and by the reduction of the duty on wine effected by Mr. Gladstone, it has made the light wines of France cheap in England. Beneficial as this Act has been, it falls short in two respects of the highest standard of policy as regards customs. It made the regulation of our finances the subject of a treaty with a foreign country, and it introduced an element of uncertainty into a tax, by levying the duty on wine in proportion to the alcohol it contained. The whole subject of duties on merchandise is regarded in a different light now to that which ruled our policy in connection with the customs a century and a half ago. Then taxes on commodities were imposed with a view to protecting native industry, and to benefit particular trades. Now the only principle which causes their imposition is the necessity of obtaining revenue, and no idea exists of trying to favour home produce at the expense of the foreign producer. It was also widely held that a nation acted wisely in prohibiting or checking the export of useful commodities, and for this reason in early times the export customs formed the principal, and even in later times a considerable, part of the taxes on merchandise. Sir R. Walpole saw the fallacy of this theory, and made a step towards free trade by abolishing in one year duties on 106 exports and 38 imports. The system of drawbacks, originally looked on simply as a means of encouraging our shipping, has now been perfected by allowing the repayment of the whole import duty on the re-exportation of foreign goods. By the use of bonded warehouses, the merchant is enabled to pay the custom at the time most convenient to himself. This system was conceived by Sir R. Walpole, and carried out in 1803. The management of the customs is in the hands of a chairman and a board of commissioners (6 Geo. IV., c. 106), who are under the control of the Commissioners of the Treasury.

Custos Rotulorum is an officer of great antiquity who serves the function of keeper of the records of the sessions of a county. Acts were passed in 37 Henry VIII. (1545) and 3 & 4 Ed. VI. (1549) considerably limiting his importance, and the office was finally regulated in 1688. He must be a justice of the peace, and of the quorum, and is now usually the lord-lieutenant of a county, though the two offices are quite distinct, the one being military, the other civil.

Cutch is a native state of India which forms a peninsula to the south of Scinde. The Rao of Cutch entered into an agreement with the East India Company in 1809, and concluded treaties with Great Britain in 1816. Piracy was largely carried on by the inhabitants, and on this account, and in order to check the misgovernment of the province, the English intervened and deposed the Rao. By a treaty with Great Britain made in 1822, the country became tributary to England, and received a Resident appointed by the Bombay government.

Cuthbert, St. (d. 687), was in all probability a native of Northumbria, and born in the district which afterwards became the Lothians. Early in life he became a monk, and afterwards prior, at Melrose, under its first abbot, Eata, one of the disciples of Aidan, and followed him when he was transferred to Ripon. Subsequently, Eata was appointed Abbot of Lindisfarne, and Cuthbert accompanied him thither as prior, whence he retired to a hermitage on the adjacent island of Farne. At the entreaties of Egfréd of Northumbria he quitted his retreat and allowed himself to be consecrated Bishop of Lindisfarne by Archbishop Theodore (685). Before his death, he again retired to his seclusion at Farne, where he died, March 20, 687. Cuthbert's life while at Melrose and Lindisfarne was one long missionary effort. He travelled over all northern Northumbria, and converted great numbers from heathenism. His fame was very great in the north, and many miracles were ascribed to his relics. Throughout the Middle Ages his shrine at Durham was a great centre of pilgrimage, and he continued to be the favourite saint of northern England.

The Life of St. Cuthbert was written by Bede, and there is another Life written by an anonymous and evidently contemporaneous author. See also Bede's Ecclesiastical History.

Cuthred, King of Wessex (740–754), was a kinsman of Æthelheard, whom he succeeded. He restored the position of Wessex to what it had been in the days of Ini. In 743, in conjunction with the Mercians, he defeated the Britons. In 752 Cuthred and his people rose against the yoke of the Mercians, and utterly defeated the Mercian king Ethelbald at Burford, on the borders of Oxfordshire and Gloucestershire. In the next year he once more defeated the Britons, and died in 754 or 755, after a prosperous and victorious career. [WESSEX.]

Cuttack. The country on the Coromandel coast forming the northern portion of Orissa, and lying eastward of Berar. It was conquered by the Maharrattas in 1751, and taken from them by the British at the outset of the campaign of 1803, the fort of Cuttack surrendering on Oct. 14 in that year.

Cutts, JOHN, LORD (d. 1707), served with great gallantry in the wars of the reigns of William III. and Anne. At the battle of the Boyne, he led the English regiments that had served under the States General, and was rewarded by an Irish peerage. He volunteered for the unfortunate expedition against Brest. He led the forlorn hope at the siege of Namur, and for his utter contempt of danger on that occasion obtained the honourable nickname of "the Salamander." In 1702 he led the storming party against Fort St. Michael, the stronghold of Venloo; and at the battle of Blenheim he conducted the assault on the village, but was repulsed with terrible loss. Seeing the strength of the opposition, Marlborough directed him to keep up a feigned attack, while the main effort was made against the French centre. In 1705 he was made Commander-in-chief, and one of the Lord Justices of Ireland.

Cwiclehm (b. 611, d. 636) was the son of Cynegils, King of the West Saxons, and for some time shared the throne of his father. Jealous of the power of Edwin of Northumbria, in 626 he sent off one of his servants with a poisoned dagger to murder that king, whose life was saved only by the devotion of his dependant, Edmer. Two years later Cwiclehm and his father were worsted in a battle near Cirencester by the Mercian king Penda. In 636 Cwiclehm was baptised at Dorchester by Birinus, and died the same year.

Cymbeline (CUNOBELIN) was a British chief, whose capital was at Camulodunum (Colchester) and who, from the number of coins bearing his name, seems to have been a very powerful prince. [COINAGE.] It is said that one of his sons, Adminius, rebelled against him, and having been banished, by his father, sought aid from the Emperor Caligula. Another of his sons was the well-known Caractacus.

Cymry is the native name of the Welsh. [CELTS; BRITONS; WALES.] There are objections to the very common use of this word in a more general sense in contrast to Gael, as denoting that great branch of the Celtic race of which the Welsh are the type.

Cynegils, King of Wessex (611—643), was the son of Ceolric, and nephew of Ceolwulf, whom he succeeded. His son or brother, Cwiclehm, seems to have been associated with him in the government. In 614 they fought against the Britons at Bampton, and routed them. They appear to have been hard pressed by the Northumbrians and Mercians, under Edwin and Penda respectively. In 628 Penda attacked Cirencester, and a treaty was made there which probably circumscribed the boundaries of Wessex on the north-west. In 636 Cynegils was converted to Christianity by Birinus, and was baptised at Dorchester, his sponsor being the Northumbrian king Oswald, who afterwards became his son-in-law.

Cynewulf, King of Wessex (755?—784?), was descended from Cerdic, and became king on the deposition of Sigebert. He engaged in several hard-fought though successful, conflicts with the Britons, but at what place and in what year we are not informed. He had a formidable rival in Offa of Mercia, and in 777 the stronghold of Bensington (near Wallingford) was captured by that king. In 784(?) Cynewulf was murdered at Merton, in Surrey, by Cyneheard, the brother of the former king, Sigebert. This tragedy is very finely related in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, and the story is, as usual, amplified by Henry of Huntingdon.

Cynric (d. 560?), the son of Cerdic, seems to have been recognised as King of the West Saxons, conjointly with his father, in 519. He extended his kingdom after his father's death to the west and north, defeating the Britons at Old Sarum, and afterwards fighting a drawn battle with them at a place which has been plausibly identified with Banbury.

Dacres, LEONARD, OF NAWORTH (d. 1581, "of the crooked back," a powerful gentleman of Northumberland, and the inheritor of the lands of Naworth. Dacres was privy to the Catholic Rebellion of the North in 1569, though he did not take an active part in it, and even sided with the royalists when he saw all was lost. His arrest was, nevertheless, ordered, but could not be carried into execution, owing to the large number of men who assembled at Naworth to protect its lord. On the first opportunity Dacres escaped into Scotland, and subsequently joined the Duke of Alva's army in the Low Countries.

Dacres, LORD OF HURSTMONCEAUX (d. 1541) (Lord Dacres of the South), was a young nobleman who, in company with several friends, had engaged in a deer-stealing expedition to the park of an unpopular neighbour. During the affray which ensued one of the foresters was killed, and the whole party were brought up for trial, and a verdict of wilful murder was returned. Despite all the efforts of Dacres's friends, Henry VIII. would not consent to spare the young man's life, saying he would deal out equal justice to all ranks. Lord Dacres was accordingly executed in 1541.

Dægsastan, or Dawston, was the scene of the great victory won by Ethelfrith of Northumbria (1603) over Aidan, King of the Scots, who was followed by a large force of Irish Picts and Britons. Ethelfrith was assisted by the Dalriads, and gained a signal victory. Dægsastan is probably Dawston in Roxburghshire.

Dalhousie, 9TH EARL OF (b. 1770, d. 1838), distinguished himself as a soldier in the earlier years of his life. For his services in the French War, and especially at the battle of Waterloo, he was raised to a peerage in the United Kingdom. In 1816 he was appointed Governor of Nova Scotia, and four years later Governor-General of Canada. More of a soldier than a statesman, he failed to conciliate the democratic party, who were clamouring for reforms. About this time a select committee of the House of Commons declared the grievances of the Canadians to be real, and in 1828 Lord Dalhousie was recalled.

Dalhousie, JAMES ANDREW BROWN-RAM-SAY, 1ST MARQUIS and 10TH EARL OF (b. 1812, d. 1860), was the third son of the ninth Earl of Dalhousie, and was educated at Harrow and Oxford, where he had for his fellow-students Lord Canning and Lord Elgin, his successors in the Indian Viceroyalty. He entered the House of Commons young, but was soon called to the Upper House, on his father's death. Under Sir Robert Peel's ministry he was successively Vice-President and President (1844) of the Board of Trade—a post in which he perhaps did more than any other statesman for the development of our railway system. On the fall of Sir Robert Peel's government he did not quit office, but was soon appointed Governor-General of India (1848). It was a time of great peril for British India, where the Sikhs were threatening much trouble, and in such an emergency Dalhousie determined to be on the scene of danger. After the victories of Goojerat and Moulton, he re-organised the government of the Punjab, and in 1852, by the capture of Pegu, completed the frontier of British Burmah. The remainder of his term of office was occupied in consolidating the great empire under his rule. Oude and Nagpore, in addition to Pegu and the Punjab, were brought directly under our government, while the Civil Service was more and more thrown open to all natural born subjects of the crown, English and Hindoo alike. The administrative departments received fresh energy from his reforms, and the railway system, the telegraph, and education were fostered by his care. Under the strain of such work his health began to fail, and in 1856 he resigned office, and soon afterwards left Calcutta for Europe. The Indian Mutiny, which so swiftly followed his resignation, was by captious critics of the time attributed to his passion for change; but Parliament passed a vote of thanks to him for his services, and the government showed its sense of his merits by creating him a marquis. He died soon after his return to England, while still comparatively a young man, in Dec., 1860.

Dalriada—Dal-Riada, "the home of the descendants of Riada"—was (1) a district in Ireland, including the northern half of county Antrim, apparently one of the oldest settlements of the Scots among the Picts of Ulster; (2) the name given to the district of Argyllshire, settled by the immigrant Scots from Ireland. [For the history of the Kingdom of Dalriada, see article on Scots.]

Dalry, THE BATTLE OF, was an engagement fought between John of Lorn, a relation of Comyn, and Robert Bruce. In this engagement the Scottish king distinguished himself by the skill with which he moved back his armoured knights from the swarm of half-naked Highlanders, who made the attack upon ground that was essentially unfavourable for the operations of cavalry.

Dalrymple, SIR HEW (b. 1750, d. 1830), obtained an ensign's commission in the 31st Regiment in 1762. After holding various other commands, he was in 1806 appointed Governor of Gibraltar, where he remained until August, 1808, when he was placed in command of the British army in Portugal. He arrived at head-quarters the day after Wellesley's victory at Vimiero, and superseded Burrard, who had already superseded Wellesley, and had prevented him from taking full advantage of his victory. On Junot's proposal, terms were very soon made by Dalrymple with the French, which were embodied in the Convention of Cintra. The news of that convention was received with the loudest indignation in England, and the three commanders were recalled, and put on their trial. Sir Hew was deprived of his command; but his disgrace was of brief duration, and terminated in 1812, when he was restored to the rank of general, while two years later he was made a baronet. In 1818 he was appointed Governor of Blackness Castle, which post he seems to have held up to the time of his death. [VIMIERO; CINTRA.]

Dalrymple, DAVID. [HAILES, LORD.]

Dalrymple, SIR JAMES, Master of Stair (b. 1619, d. 1695), was one of the commissioners sent to London (1689) to offer the crown of Scotland to William III. He was an able and unscrupulous man, so unpopular that the Scotch Parliament endeavoured to pass a measure disqualifying him from holding office, on the ground that he had assailed the liberties of the country in the previous reigns. His name will, owing to the orders issued by him as Secretary for Scotland, ever be execrated in history, in connection with the Massacre of Glencoe (q.v.). After an inquiry into the matter, he was severely censured by the Estates, who "begged that his Majesty would give such orders concerning him as he might deem necessary for the vindication of his government." Lord Macanlay calls him "one of the first men of his time—a jurist, a statesman, a fine scholar, an eloquent orator," and considers that his treacherous cruelty to the Macdonalds arose from the fact that regarding them as he did in the light of enemies of law, of industry, and of trade, he came altogether to forget the turpitude of the means in the excellence of the end.

Dalrymple, SIR JOHN (b. 1726, d. 1810), was born in Edinburgh, educated at Cambridge, and became an advocate at the Scotch bar, and afterwards a judge of the Scotch Exchequer. He wrote, besides some legal works, Memoirs of Great Britain from the last Parliament of Charles II. to the Battle of La Hogue, 3 vols., 1771.

Dalsiel, THOMAS, GENERAL (d. 1685?), distinguished himself as an officer on the royal side in the Parliamentary wars. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and sent as a prisoner to the Tower, from which, however, he managed to escape to Muscovy, where he served against the Poles and Tartars. After the Restoration, he returned home (1665), and was appointed commander-in-chief of Charles II.'s forces in Scotland—a post which he held till his death, excepting for the few days when he was superseded by the Duke of Monmouth, whom Dalsiel is said to have refused to serve. He defeated the Covenanters at the battle of Pentland Hills (1666), only losing five men on his side, and after this victory is said by Burnet to have "acted the Muscovite too grossly," threatening to spit and roast all the disaffected. After the battle of Bothwell Bridge (1679), General Dalsiel arrived at the royal camp with his commission renewed, and reproached the Duke of Monmouth for his leniency towards the insurgents. He was remarkable for the eccentricity of his appearance, and at London, whither he always went once a year to kiss the king's hand, drew around him a rabble of boys to stare at his huge white beard, which, not having been shaved since the death of Charles I., reached to his waist. He died soon after the accession of James II., in the year 1685 or 1686.

D'Amory, ROGER (d. 1322), married one of the three sisters of Gilbert of Clare, Earl of Gloucester. In 1317, when war broke out between the Earls of Lancaster and Warenne, Roger joined with the Earl of Pembroke to obtain supremacy in the king's councils. In 1320 Lancaster received his help in his attack upon the Spencers; and his name is included in a list of peers who received pardon for any illegalities they might have committed in bringing the favourites to justice (1321). His quarrel with the younger Spencer was probably due to their joint claims in the Gloucester inheritance: for they had married sisters. Later in the same year, when Edward II. took arms, Roger D'Amory was one of the first to feel the effects of the king's recovered strength. His castles were attacked, and before long he fell into the hands of his enemies at Tutbury—a misfortune which he did not long survive.

Danegeld, THE, was a tax of two shillings on each hide of land, and was levied primarily as a tribute for the Danes, though it continued long after the occasion for which it was first levied had passed away. It seems originally to have been a tax on cultivated lands, and to have been first levied in the times of Ethelred II., probably for the first time in 991. Edward the Confessor abolished it, but William the Conqueror seems to have revived it again at a threefold rate of six shillings the hide (1084). This tax was continued until the reign of Henry II. An imposition apparently almost identical in character with the Danegeld, of two shillings on the hide, formed one of the earliest points of dispute between Henry II. and Becket in 1163; and as from this very year the Danegeld ceased to be a distinct item in the king's revenue, it is inferred that the Danegeld was thus abolished by the energetic opposition of the archbishop. From this time it was for some years represented in the accounts by a tax, under the name of donum, or auxilium [Aid], which, according to Dr. Stubbs, was still levied on a new computation of hidage, till under Richard I. it acquired the new name of carucage (q.v.).

Danelagh (DANELAW, or DENALAGU). The name given to that part of England where Danish blood, customs, and laws had to a greater or less extent modified, or usurped the place of, the corresponding Anglian features. Roughly speaking, we may say that the Danish influence gradually lessened as the distance from Yorkshire increased. The extent of Daneland varied at different periods. The great stretch of country that was in later times included under the general name of the Danelagh seems to have been due to three, if not four, different colonisations. First came the settlement in Deira, which, beginning with the conquest of York in 867, was consummated when Halfden separated from the southern here in 875, and next year divided Deira among his host. The southern part of this province may be considered as the very heart of the settlement, the district where the Danes were most numerous. Here the typical Danish endings thorpe and caster and by occur in the greatest profusion. But the Danes do not appear to have spread into Lancashire in any numbers, and the Norse names in Cumberland and Westmoreland are probably due to invasions of another time and family. Nor do the Danes seem to have colonised beyond the Tees. Across this boundary river, with a few exceptions, the tons and the hams are the rule, and it is said that only four bys are to be found north of the last-named river. Beyond its banks are Chester-le-Street and Chesterwood; Stockton and Middleham take the place of Doncaster, Whitby, and Barwick. But even within the more strictly Danish districts of the north, we must not suppose an extirpation of the Anglian inhabitants. These, being very near by blood and language to their conquerors, came in merely as new lords, without any violent change, to an entirely fresh state of things. So Collingham lies close by Netherby and Alverthorpe by Wakefield, and Chester House not very far from North Allerton. The second great Danish colony was that of Lincoln, which seems to have spread down to the borders of Holland (a district distinctly non-Danish in its local nomenclature), and is marked by the same general features as the colony in Deira, only in a less degree. The heart of this settlement seems to have been in the Lindsey uplands. The partition of this part of the country took place probably in 877. The colonisation of Lindsey seems to be distinct from that which included Leicester, Nottingham, Derby, and Northampton, and which, in some parts, even extended a few miles beyond Watling Street. In later years this settlement appears in history as embracing Lincoln, and is then known as the "Five Boroughs." The fourth and last important Danish conquest was that of East Anglia and Essex. But here the colonisation must have been very slight. The typical Danish endings are comparatively rare both in Norfolk and Suffolk, and there is only one district that is largely characterised by the by termination: that lying round the mouth of the Yare. Such were the three or four great divisions of the Danish settlements in England, and their furthest extent is marked by the Treaty of Wedmore between Alfred and Guthrum, as up the Thames to the Lee, along the Lee to its source, then to Bedford, and thence up the Ouse to Watling Street. But the whole of this territory can never have been in any strict sense Danish, and the greater part was gradually won back, and incorporated with the West Saxon monarchy. Under Edward the Elder, the greater part of Mercia and Essex was recovered; East Anglia submitted in 921, as did the Danish earldom of Northampton; while in 941, the Five Boroughs were finally won for the West Saxon crown. Meanwhile, the Danish kingdom of the north had been tottering, and was deprived of its independence by Edred (854).

There are, unfortunately, very few materials remaining from which to reconstruct the special features even of those divisions of the Danelagh where the Scandinavian influence was strongest. The two great settlements of Deira and Lindsey were divided into ridings, or trithings, and these again sub-divided into wapentakes—a term which corresponds with the hundreds of the south. The court of the trithing was superior to that of the wapentake, and this arrangement has been considered to point to a systematic division of the land, more especially as, in Yorkshire, all three ridings converge towards the town of York. In Domesday, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire appear as divided into wapentakes, but the trithing, as was to be expected, is not to be found in these counties. Northamptonshire and Rutland had both wapentakes and hundreds; while the East Anglian counties had neither trithing nor wapentake. East Anglia was for a time governed by its own Danish king, as was Deira in the north; but there does not appear to have been any such dignity in Lindsey or the Five Boroughs, though each of the five towns may have had its own army, with its own earl, and the occurrence of twelve laugmen in Lincoln and Stamford may perhaps point to a similar form of government in Leicester and the other two towns. The difference in law between Danish and West Saxon Britain cannot have been very great. "The customs of compurgation, wergeld, and other pecuniary compositions for the breach of the peace, were common to both races. But, while by Alfred's treaty with Guthrum, English and Danes were in East Anglia reckoned equally dear, in Yorkshire, the wergeld of the Danish hold was greater than that of the Anglian or Saxon thegn, Mr. Robertson considers that the Northern Danes "eradicated every vestige of proprietary rights in the districts actually colonised," whereas the Eastern Danes quietly settled down alongside of the earlier Anglian inhabitants; and Dr. Stubbs has noticed how fully the allodial tenure must have been reinstated in Yorkshire and East Anglia. But in any case, however trifling they may have been, certain easily recognisable distinctions did separate the laws and customs of the Danelagh from those of Mercia and Wessex. It is to this fact that Edgar alludes when he wills that "with the Danes, such laws should stand as they best may choose;" or, again, when he bids the Danes inflict punishment "according to their law." Canute recognises the same distinction, which re-appears even after the Conquest, till it vanishes away during the wars of Stephen. With Henry II. the king's justice was in every land, and the historians of his reign, in using the term, show themselves uncertain what shires belong to this division.

The following are the shires reckoned in the Danelagh at different periods:—Yorkshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, Derbyshire, Rutland, Northamptonshire, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire. [DANES.]

[T. A. A.]

Danes (also called NORTHMEN, or WIKINGS) are generically the Scandinavian freebooters and immigrants (not only those from Denmark proper), whose incursions and settlements fill a large space in English history from the eighth to the eleventh century.

Mr. Freeman has distinguished three stages of Danish invasion, in which the objects were plunder, settlement, and conquest respectively. (1) The first stage begins with the devastation of Northumbria, in 787. Every year saw fresh swarms of pirates pillaging the coasts, and sometimes penetrating far inland. Not only England, but all Northern Europe, was exposed to these inroads, and as the triumphs of Charles the Great had made access to North Germany difficult, it was by sea that they commonly went on their forays. Their object was mainly plunder. Settlement or conquest was impossible. Scandinavia was cut up into so many petty states, that the necessary degree of cohesion was hardly yet obtainable for combined efforts. Sated with booty, the sea-kings returned to their native dals and fjords, to rally forth again at the approach of summer. Fierce heathens as yet, they destroyed every Christian shrine and sanctuary, spread universal misery and want, and added a new and terrible danger to the many terrors of early mediæval times.

(2) Within a century of the first inroads of the Vikings, a great revolution in Scandinavia began a new era. Great kings arose in the north, who subjected to themselves the wide districts that became known as Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. The jarls or petty kinglets who ruled each harad (district or county) of Scandinavia were crushed into dependence on a new centralising national power. Harold the Fair-haired (Harfagr) in Norway, Gorm the Old in Denmark, raised themselves by sheer personal vigour into the position of kings of the whole land. Eric of Upsala, to a lesser extent, made every district of Sweden and Gotland acknowledge the political and religious supremacy of the protector of the great sanctuary of Upsala. It was the same process that was consolidating England into a single state, and which afterwards became the source of the national idea. But as in England and Germany, the new development proved a deadly foe to the primitive Teutonic polity, which had survived till the eighth century in Scandinavia, just as it had been described by Tacitus in the first century in Germany. All conservative instincts revolted against the degradation of the sovereign jarl to the condition of personal subordination to the new monarch. The best and bravest of the Northmen abandoned their native land, and sought to win by their swords a new home for their old polity. Hence the great Scandinavian migrations of the ninth century. Again the Northmen poured into England, seeking, like the English themselves three centuries earlier, a definite settlement. The second half of the ninth century is the limit of this period; at its close half Britain was Danish. The formidable alliances of Danes and West Welsh, which Egbert crushed at Hengestesdun, perhaps marks the beginning of the change. Under Ethelred I. of Wessex the crisis was reached. Between 867 and 869 Northumbria, long distracted by anarchy, accepted as monarch the dependent of the pagan invaders. In 868 Mercia was overrun, and in 870 the martyrdom of the sainted King Edmund attested the completeness of their conquest of East Anglia. In 871 the ruling kingdom of the West Saxons was invaded. A brilliant series of hard-fought battles taught the invader that Wessex was not so easy a prey as the subject states. When Ethelred died in the middle of the contest, his brother Alfred kept up the struggle. He succeeded in clearing his own territory at the expense of the overlordship won by Egbert. But Deira, Northumbria, and East Anglia were regularly occupied and symmetrically divided among the conquerors with the same numerical precision as marks the allotment of Iceland. A fresh invasion of Wessex in 878 reduced Alfred to the lowest pitch of degradation, but his marvellous revival led to the Treaty of Wedmore, that acknowledged the status quo, and gave the Danes all the land north-east of Watling Street (i.e., Chester to Hertford), and the Lea and Lower Thames. Within this Danelagh a new Scandinavia arose; and a new swarm of haradskonungr, like Guthorm of East Anglia, seemed to undo the work of the Pendas and Edwins. North of Deira an English line continued to reign in Bamborough. While this was going on in England, other settlements were being effected in the north and west. Fresh swarms of Vikings, who fled "from the tyranny of Harold Fairhair," colonised the Orkneys, Shetland, Faroe, Hebrides, and the southern isles as far as Man, and in Sutherland and Caithness effected a settlement on the mainland. Indignant at their desertion, Harold went in person to subdue them to his sway. The boldest sought a remoter home in the hitherto desert Iceland, and thence in Greenland and Vinland (Massachusetts) are said to have established the first European colonies in the New World. Others went to the east coast of Ireland, where such names as Waterford and Wexford perpetuate the memory of the Wiking state. Thence they inflicted severe blows on Wales and Strathclyde. The abundance of fords, holms, and garths in the region round Milford Haven testifies that the wandering sea-king found amidst the deep inlets of south-western Dyfed the likeness of the fjords of his northern home. Fainter traces of a possible settlement in Anglessea, clearer ones of an occupation of the lands round Solway Firth, mark the ubiquity of the sea-kings' ravages. Sometimes, as in the Orkneys and Shetlands, and in the extreme north of Scotland, they drove away the old Celtic inhabitants. In others they displayed that capacity for assimilation with the subject race that always marked their descendants. Outside the bounds of Britain, similar colonising bands won Normandy from the Carolings, and effected smaller settlements on other parts of the Gaulish coast. Eastwards over the Baltic, Rurik and his Vikings founded a dynasty in Russia, whence the warranger carried the terror of the Scandinavian name to the court of the Eastern Cæsars. The Peace of Wedmore began a new period in the relation between English and Danes. For a century we hear little of fresh invasions from beyond sea, but a constant war went on between the Danes in England and the West Saxon monarchs who endeavoured to subdue them. Even the constant devastations of the "black pagans," which laid waste Carlisle, and harried with fearful effects Wales after the death of Howel Dha, were the work mostly of Danish settlers in Ireland, or of colonists among the Brythons themselves. The steps of this new struggle are as follows: Alfred rested content with the acknowledgment of his overlordship and the recognition of Christianity among the Danish settlers. Edward the Elder and his sister Æthelflæd, the "Lady of the Mercians," went a step farther by building a strong line of fortress along the frontier of the Danelagh, which prevented further invasions of Wessex and West Saxon Mercia, and were starting-points for the subjection of the sons of the Vikings. Athelstan exceeded this by establishing friendly relations with the princes of Scandinavia, by defeating the great confederacy of Danes and Celts at Brunanburh, and by beginning the direct re-conquest of the lands ceded at Wedmore. Edred, or Dunstan his minister, completed the process by the conquest of Northumbria and the assumption of imperial titles. Edgar, called first to power by the northern and Danish half of the nation, consolidated the process by renewing the liberal, yet effectual, policy of Dunstan. Under him, the Danes became Englishmen, and the Danelagh a merely legal distinction. The re-conquest was thus completed. With Ethelred the Unready everything went wrong, and before long the dangers of the eighth and ninth century were revived by fresh plunderings of new Wiking hordes from Scandinavia. But the first stage thus renewed soon led to the second coming back, and the kings of the north were now too powerful to brook subjects establishing new Normandies or Iceland at their expense. Hence they resolved to take part in these expeditions of plunder and settlement, and thus Mr. Freeman's third stage of political conquest, a stage never attained on the Continent, begins. The King of all Denmark now sets to work to conquer all England. After many failures, Sweegen succeeded in his attempt, and handed down his power to his greater son, Canute, who reigned as legal King of England with the assent of the English people, which, if formal at first, became ultimately as real as any such popular recognitions were, and was only withdrawn when the quarrels and misconduct of Harthacanute and Harold led to the restoration of the West Saxon line in Edward the Confessor. The really important Danish period of English history now ends; but Wiking forages were still not unknown, and expeditions of Danish and Norse princes still continued for nearly a century. In England, the great invasion of the heroic Harold Hardrada in 1066 might, if successful, have placed another Danish dynasty on the throne. All through the Conqueror's reign similar, if fainter, assaults were feared in the nominal interest of the English cause. The extraordinary career of Magnus of Norway among the Western Isles, ending in his war in Anglesea with the Earls of Chester and Shrewsbury in 1098, was the last exploit of the Vikings that has any direct relation to English history. Brian Boromhe's victory of Clontarf (1014) was the death-blow to the Scandinavian states in Ireland. But in Scotland, though Caithness was annexed in 1196, it was not till 1263 that the battle of Largs put an end to their capacity for aggression, and led to the annexation of the Western Islands to Scotland; but they retained their ecclesiastical dependence on Trondhjem till the fifteenth century, when also the Orkneys and their dependencies were practically handed over to James III.

Apart from the general misery and want, these plunderings were too irregular to leave any deeply-seated effects behind them. A retrogression towards barbarism, the decline of learning and culture that attended the sack of the Mercian abbeys, a partial forcing on of the feudalising tendency as best adapted for defence, is all that can safely be ascribed to them. Little positively can be affirmed of the results of the Danish Conquest, either on the nation generally or on those special districts which became Danish by the Treaty of Wedmore. That they had a bracing effect upon the nation can safely be conjectured, but Mr. Robertson's argument that "a greater amount of freedom existed in the Danelagh than in Wessex and English Mercia" is based on too imperfect an induction to be safely admitted as a proved fact. Still, there can be no doubt that the advent of a new race, whose very object in emigration was to preserve their old Teutonic polity unstained by the innovations of Harfagr, did largely tend to strengthen at a time of weakness the traditional, national, and Teutonic constitution of England, and so in this respect to retard the territorialising tendency. On the other hand, however, the effect of the increased militarism which foreign invasion necessitated was directly feudal. If the Danes put off the unity of England by undoing the work of Offa, Edwin, and Egbert, they made it more certain in the end by the effacement of tribal distinctions, and by the consolidation of what remained English, which directly followed the struggle with them. But it is very improbable that the Danes introduced many definite changes in law or custom. The peculiar usages of the Danelagh may as much be Anglian as Danish. Anyhow, the fact that the Danelagh was a territory, within which all of whatever race acknowledged the "Danish custom," shows that absence of personal law is important in English history. The Danes never dispossessed the Anglian population; their institutions, so far as we know them, were fundamentally the same as the English. As soon as they became Christians they were practically Englishmen, just as the Normans became Frenchmen, only in both cases there was a superior vigour, a survival of the old Viking days. Traces in local nomenclature; the substitution of "by" for "tun;" the "forces," "nesses," "fords," and "holms" of North England; the division into wapentakes and ridings, are clearly Danish; but such effects are purely superficial. The same thing took a new name. The wite, the doom, the ealdorman, the frith, became the lahsit, lah, jarl, and grith. But as the Northman became French in Normandy, so he became Anglian in Mercia and Goidelic in Man—which, though the very centre of Norse power, retains to this day its Celtic speech, while half the place-names of the island keep their original form. Only in the region of government where a thoroughly Norse institution was superimposed on a Celtic polity, to the extinction of the latter, is the Danish influence clearly displayed. In the Hebrides the clans survived the Norse jarls, although the local names betray Norse influence. We may conjecture that the Danish settlement began the series of events that has made South Pembrokeshire an English-speaking district. In Orkney and Shetland, Caithness and Sunderland, alone did the Conquest extend so thoroughly as to supersede the old language for one which, under later influences, easily became English. Though great changes followed Canute's domination, it is very hard to say what part of them followed on the introduction of Northern customs and institutions. Even the introduction of huscarls added no new element to English development. No one now believes that Canute's "forest-law" was Danish. Canute's idea of a northern empire could more easily be got from the history of Edgar than from any precedents of anarchic Scandinavia. In fact, England had more influence on Denmark and Norway than these latter had on her. Canute's reign is of the greatest political importance, as producing on a small scale the same tendencies that were afterwards developed to a greater extent by the Norman Conquest. But only very indirectly can Danish influence be said to be a factor in this process. The Northern antiquaries, who refer every point of similarity with their own state to Danish influence on England, ignore how much both have in common, and the assimilative capacity of a barbarous but vigorous race in contact with one of superior, though only slightly superior, civilisation.

Worsaae's Danes and Norwegians in England, Scotland, and Ireland is the fullest special work on this subject, but its usefulness is impaired by the readiness with which every English institution is assigned to a Scandinavian original. Stubbs's Constitutional History, i. § 77, gives an exhaustive summary of the general effects of the Danish invasions. Cf. Robertson, Scotland under her Early Kings, ii., Essay on the Dane Law; and Freeman, Norman Conquest, especially for the reign of Canute. Konrad Maurer, whose Island gives the best account of the purest form of Scandinavian polity developed in isolation, has also, in his Kritische Ueberschau, treated parts of the subject with great discrimination. For the Scandinavians at home, Snorro's Heimskringla, translated by Laing, abridged in Carlyle's Early Kings of Norway, is the great authority, and Dahlmann's Geschichte von Dänemark a good modern account. For the islands, Munch's edition of Chronicon Regum Mannis and Anderson's Orkneyinga Saga are important. Cf. Skene's Celtic Scotland, especially i. 302, 325—6, 338, 386, 492.

Dangerfield, THOMAS (d. 1685), the inventor of the "Meal-Tub Plot" (q.v.), was a man of profligate life, who had been more than once branded, whipped, and imprisoned for felony. His disclosures implicating the Presbyterian leaders were not believed, and his retraction and subsequent accusation of the Catholics led fortunately to no judicial murders, as in the case of his fellow-informers, Oates and Bedloe. [POPISH PLOT.] On the accession of James II., Dangerfield was convicted of libel in connection with the Meal-Tub Plot, and was put in the pillory and whipped. On his way back to prison, he was brutally assaulted by a Roman Catholic lawyer named Francis, and a few days afterwards died.

D'Arblay, MADAME (b. 1752, d. 1840), was the marriage name of Frances Burney, the daughter of Dr. Johnson's friend, Charles Burney, and the authoress of Evelina, Cecilia, &c. Her Memoirs, which were first published in 1842, are of some value for the information they afford us concerning the court of George III.

Darcy, THOMAS, LORD (d. 1539), was a faithful subject of the crown throughout the reign of Henry VII. During the Cornish outbreak of 1497, being made one of the royal commissioners appointed for a thorough investigation of the various circumstances of the rebellion, he showed his zeal for the king by the merciless severity of his proceedings. Later on, in the same year, Darcy accompanied the Earl of Surrey in his hasty march to the relief of Norham Castle, then closely besieged by the Scotch under James IV. and Perkin Warbeck; and it was presumably as a reward for his services on this occasion that he was appointed to the Constableness of Bamborough Castle, and in 1498 to the Captaincy of the town of Berwick and the Wardenship of the East and Middle Marches of Scotland. Darcy's suspected sympathy with the insurrection that broke out in Lincolnshire in 1537, and his unmistakable co-operation with the Yorkshire nobles in the popular rising known as the "Pilgrimage of Grace," which immediately succeeded the Lincolnshire revolt, were circumstances which at once singled him out for the vengeance of Thomas Cromwell. A very brief examination was sufficient to prove Darcy's treasonable connection with the rioters of 1537, and he was accordingly beheaded June 20, 1539. [PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE.]

Dardanelles, THE PASSAGE OF—THE, was accomplished in 1807 by Sir John Duckworth, who thus lent considerable aid to the Russian troops invading Moldavia and Wallachia. A desultory fire was opened on the English ships from both the European and Asiatic sides of the Straits, but without much effect. An ultimatum was sent to the Turkish government, which opened negotiations so as to save time. So successful and speedy were their defences that the English admiral determined at last to retrace his steps (March 1, 1807)—a feat which he accomplished under heavy fire. Admiral Duckworth then contented himself with blockading the Straits. This expedition, though unsuccessful in its results, was well planned, and calculated, had it succeeded, to have strengthened very materially the resistance offered by Russia to Napoleon.

Darien Company, THE. After founding the Bank of England in 1694 [BANKING], Robert Paterson conceived the idea of inaugurating a company in which the Scotch should find a field for their enterprise equal to that possessed by the English in the East India Company. The trade with Eastern and Southern Asia had long been passing round by the Cape, and was virtually in the hands of this great Company. Paterson therefore argued that by establishing a colony at Darien, the Eastern world might more directly exchange its products with the Western. In 1695 an Act was passed in the Scottish Parliament, giving to the newly-formed African Company, whose directors were equally divided between England and Scotland, special and peculiar powers to make settlements and build cities, harbours, and fortifications in Asia, Africa, or America. They were likewise authorised to make alliances with distant powers in these three parts of the world, and to defend themselves if attacked; while to restrain private adventurers, all other Scotchmen were prohibited from trading in the districts occupied by the said company. But when the news of this concession reached England the Parliament at Westminster was loud in condemning such unwarranted privileges granted to the Northern kingdom, and William was forced to disown his Commissioner's Act, and withdraw, as King of England, the charter which as King of Scotland, he had granted his representative. The result of this outcry was that the English capital was withdrawn from the scheme, and its whole burden thrown on the Scotch, who soon subscribed a nominal sum of £400,000, of which, however, it appears that only a little more than half was actually paid up. It was not all at once that Paterson made known the exact spot at which he would fix his great station, and even when the fleet was ready to sail, in 1698, its destination was not precisely known. A few vessels had been procured from Amsterdam and Hamburg, the largest of which would have been one of the smallest in the English navy, and the expedition set sail under the guidance of a council of seven. The cargo laid in seems to have been just the things which would not be wanted by the inhabitants of the region to which they were being sent. Huge periwigs, heavy woollen stuffs, and hundreds of English Bibles were scarce likely to meet the wants of the Spaniards or Indians dwelling in a tropical clime. After suffering some privation for lack of provisions, the fleet anchored off the Isthmus of Darien, and taking possession of the country, called it New Caledonia, and at once commenced to dig trenches for their new city of New Edinburgh. Negotiations were opened with the natives, and the representative plan of government which had been decided upon at home was commenced to be carried into effect. Meanwhile the site of the new settlement became known in Europe; the Spanish ambassador was loud in his complaints, and preparations were made in the Spanish ports for an expedition against the intruders. But in Scotland the frenzy increased, and in August, 1699, four more ships were despatched to the isthmus, with thirteen hundred men on board. But by the time the new expedition reached its destination the preceding one had disappeared. Unable to toil in the tropical heat, and unaccustomed to tropical foods, the Scotch settlers perished by scores, till at last the survivors, disregarding Paterson's entreaties to be left with a few companions to welcome the reinforcements from home, put off for New York; and four months later the second expedition found the site of New Edinburgh a wilderness. It was in vain that they attempted to reconstruct the colony. Dissensions broke out, and mortality was high; and to crown all, a Spanish squadron anchored off their walls. With great difficulty a negotiation was opened between men of two nations who seem not to have had any acquaintance with each other's language, and by the middle of April the Scotch party had set sail for home, having already, in little more than four months, lost nearly a quarter of their number.

A striking account is given in Macanlay, Hist. of England.

Darlington, CHARLOTTE SOPHIA KILMANSEGGE, COUNTESS OF (d. 1730), was one of the mistresses of George I. In 1721 she was created Countess of Leinster, and in the following year Countess of Darlington. We find her, with her sister Madame de Platen (in opposition to the rival mistress, the Duchess of Kendal), supporting Carteret in his struggle for power with Townshend and Walpole. "She was," says Lord Stanhope, "younger and more handsome than her rival; but, like her, unwieldy in person and rapacious in character. From her great size she was called 'the Elephant.'"

Darnley, HENRY STUART, LORD (b. 1541, d. 1567), was the son of the Earl of Lennox and Lady Margaret Douglas, a niece of Henry VIII. In 1565 Mary of Scotland, his cousin, saw and at once fell in love with him. The marriage was celebrated in the summer of the same year, in spite of violent opposition on the part of Murray and the Protestants, who viewed the union of their queen with a Roman Catholic family with great distrust. Darnley was created Duke of Albany, and was soon afterwards, by order of his wife, illegally proclaimed King of Scots. Mary soon found her mistake in marrying a man who was at once foolish and profligate. A coldness sprang up between them, and the murder of Rizzio, to which Darnley was a party, only increased it. Loathed as he was by the queen, and endangered by her reconciliation to his bitterest enemies, Darnley endeavoured to escape to France, but was not permitted to leave Scotland. After the birth of his son, afterwards James VI., whose christening he refused to attend, Darnley was seized at Glasgow with a violent illness, from which he had barely recovered when Mary paid him a visit and urged his removal to Edinburgh. He was accordingly conveyed to a small house close to the city walls, in a district known as Kirk-of-Field. In the night (Feb. 10, 1567), the house was blown up with gunpowder, and Darnley's body was found next morning lying in the garden by that of his page; but neither corpse bore traces of violence. Public feeling at once pointed to Bothwell as the murderer, and more than suspected Mary to have been an accomplice in the crime. The strongest circumstantial evidence points to the same conclusion.

Dartmouth, WILLIAM LEGGE, 1ST EARL OF (b. 1672, d. 1750), was a prominent statesman in the reign of Queen Anne. His principles were those of a strong Tory and High Churchman. He married a daughter of the Earl of Nottingham. On the accession of the queen he became a member of the Privy Council; and on the downfall of Godolphin's ministry he was made Secretary of State and Keeper of the Privy Seal of Scotland (1710). It was by making use of him that Marlborough tried to avoid dismissal from his appointments by a close union with the Tory ministry. Dartmouth was one of the persons appointed by Anne to confer with the French envoy Ménéger on the preliminaries for the Treaty of Utrecht. The wholesale creation of twelve peers did not meet with his approval, but he continued in the ministry, and was created Lord Privy Seal (1714). On the accession of George he ceased to take any share in politics. "Dartmouth," says Lord Stanhope, "who was suspected, not without reason, of being inclined to a restoration of the exiled family, was a good-humoured and accomplished nobleman who made no enemies."

Dashwood, SIR FRANCIS, created Baron le Despencer (d. 1781), the son of Sir Francis Dashwood by Lady Mary Fane, obtained his chief claim to celebrity in early life by his reckless immorality and profaneness. From such scenes as those of his "Franciscan Abbey" at Medmenham, Sir Francis was summoned to become Treasurer of the Chamber in 1761, in which office Bute found him so convenient a creature, that on becoming Prime Minister he appointed him Chancellor of the Exchequer. Wilkes well understood the absurdity of the appointment, when he said that "from puzzling all his life at tavern bills he was called by Lord Bute to administer the finances of a kingdom above one hundred millions in debt." To remedy this deficit the new Chancellor proposed to levy a tax on cider, which at once produced an outcry so loud that the proposed tax had to be much reduced. Even then it was productive of much hardship, and served only to add to the unpopularity of Bute's administration. Dashwood had at any rate the good sense to perceive his own incompetence. "People," he said, "will point at me in the streets, and say, 'There goes the worst Chancellor of the Exchequer that ever appeared.'" As a reward for his services he was created Baron le Despencer, and with his elevation to the peerage he retired from the political world.

Daubeney, GILES, LORD (d. 1507), was raised to the peerage in 1486, in recognition of his services during the period of Henry VII.'s exile. Shortly after receiving this proof of royal favour, he was made deputy governor of Calais, and while acting in that capacity he headed the expedition despatched from England with secret instructions to lend all possible assistance to the Emperor Maximilian. These orders Daubeney executed with marked success, and compelled the French to raise the siege of Dixmude. By a well-timed attack on their camp, too, he inflicted upon them severe losses, slaying over 8,000 men, and capturing a considerable quantity of military stores. During the Cornish revolt Daubeney was a trusted leader of the king's forces. His energetic attack on the rebels at Deptford Bridge precipitated the general engagement at Blackheath (1497), which ended so victoriously for Henry.

David I., King of Scotland (s. April 27, 1124; d. May 24, 1153), youngest son of Malcolm Canmore and Margaret, succeeded to the crown of Scotland on the death of his brother, Alexander I. Educated at the English court, owing to the marriage of his sister Matilda with Henry I., he became thoroughly imbued with the spirit of feudalism. On his brother Edgar's death (1107) he returned to Scotland as earl of the country south of the Forth and Clyde. David had at this time married Matilda, daughter of Walthoef, and in her right held the English earldoms of Northampton and Huntingdon. On the death of his brother Alexander (1124), he added the territory north of the Forth and Clyde to that which he already ruled, and thus united the whole of Scotland. The result of his early education speedily became apparent in his introduction of feudal institutions and ideas hitherto unknown in his native land. These innovations, hateful to most of the northern nobles, led, during David's absence in England, to a rebellion, headed by Angus, Earl of Moray, and Malcolm, natural son of Alexander (1130). The insurgents, however, were soon defeated, and their leader slain. Four years later a fresh insurrection was planned, but was defeated by Anglo-Norman aid. In 1136 David entered England at the head of a large army to support his niece Matilda, Empress of Germany, against Stephen, her rival claimant for the English crown. A peace was, however, concluded which lasted until 1138, when David undertook another expedition with the same object in view. He was, however, defeated at the famous Battle of the Standard (q.v.). Shortly afterwards, in 1139, another peace was made at Durham, through the exertions of the Papal legate. In 1141, after the capture of Stephen at Lincoln, David again joined his niece, narrowly escaping capture at Winchester; and in 1149 knighted Henry of Anjou at Carlisle. He died at Carlisle in May, 1153. David I. acquired a very considerable reputation for sanctity. He was the founder of several new abbeys—notably those of Holyrood and Melrose—and was the re-organiser at least of several Scotch bishoprics.

David II., King of Scotland (s. June 7, 1329, d. Feb. 22, 1371), was the son of King Robert Bruce. In accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Northampton, he was married (1328) to the Princess Joanna of England. At the time of his father's death (1329) he was only five years of age, and the kingdom was consequently governed by regents. In 1332, on the invasion of Edward Baliol (q.v.), he fled to France, and did not return till 1341. While in France his hostility to England increased, as well as his friendship for the land that sheltered him, and he was led by these feelings to cross the border in 1346. In Edward's absence the northern barons were hurriedly called to arms, and defeated the invading army at Neville's Cross. David was himself taken prisoner, and was not released till 1357. This long sojourn in England seems to have begotten a love of English ways in the king's mind. An imprudent marriage soon gave disgust to his cousin, the High Steward of Scotland, and this disgust was intensified when he proposed (1363) that Prince Lionel of England should be accepted as his successor, but the Scotch Estates unanimously rejected the proposal. The remainder of his reign was occupied in disputes with his Parliament, which showed a "surly resoluteness" in checking the abuses of the royal prerogative. He died in the year 1371.

David, Prince of Wales, was the brother of Llewelyn, by whom he had been deprived of his patrimony. In revenge for this injustice David called together several Welsh chieftains—among whom Rhys ap Iaredudd, the scion of the ancient princes of South Wales, was the most eminent—to espouse his cause. At the same time he began to intrigue with Edward I. (1276). Next year, when Llewelyn surrendered to the English king, one of the first conditions of the peace was the reconciliation of the two brothers. But David, although Edward had married him to the daughter of the Earl of Forrears, and granted him extensive territories in Wales and England, soon found cause of complaint against his patron. The two brothers united against the stranger. David surprised Hawarden Castle, and the marshes were laid waste. After Llewelyn's death, he was taken prisoner and tried at Shrewsbury (Sept. 30, 1283). Earls, barons, judges, knights of the shires, and twenty borough members, were all present on this solemn occasion; but the baronage alone can be considered as the peers of the culprit. He was condemned to death and executed with circumstances of special horror as a traitor and a murderer.

Davis, JOHN (d. 1605), one of the famous explorers of Elizabeth's reign, was born near Dartmouth. He made three voyages in search of a north-west passage to the Pacific. In the first he coasted round the south of Greenland and Baffin's Land across the strait that now bears his name, and in the third he reached the entrance of Hudson's Strait. In 1591 he accompanied Thomas Cavendish (q.v.) to the South Sea, continuing his voyage when the rest of the expedition had returned. In later years his services were employed in journeys to the East Indies on behalf of the newly founded company; and it was on his return from one of these expeditions that he met with his fate—being killed by Japanese pirates off the coast of Malacca in 1605.

Davis, MARY, or MOLL, was a natural daughter of the Earl of Berkshire, and one of Charles II.'s mistresses. She had by the king one daughter, Mary Tudor, who was married to the Earl of Derwentwater.

Davison, WILLIAM (d. 1608), one of the diplomatists of Queen Elizabeth's reign, was in 1575 sent to the Low Countries to report on the state of affairs; in 1579 he revisited Holland, and four years later was again employed to counteract Scotch influence there. In 1586 he became a principal Secretary of State, and was in favour of the execution of Mary Queen of Scots; it is well known how he was made the scapegoat of the other ministers for his excess of zeal in despatching the warrant for the execution (1587), after he had procured Elizabeth's signature to it. It will always remain a moot point how far the queen was really ignorant of the nature of the paper she had signed, and of its despatch, but it is probable that she found it convenient to act as she did towards Davison in order to clear herself as far as possible of the charge of having desired Mary's death; whilst Davison's repeated declarations that the queen herself had ordered the warrant to be sent off did not tend to pacify her resentment. The unfortunate secretary was brought to trial, Feb., 1587, heavily fined and imprisoned, and in spite of the attempts of Essex and Burleigh to procure his pardon, was never restored to favour.
